However, I would like to congratulate the Boston Symphony management on the first-rate refurbishing job that has been done in staid old Symphony Hall. After the Pops season closed, work began, with the Edward K. Perry Company, who painted the hall 67 years ago, once more on hand for the redecoration. The statues in the niches of the auditorium look whiter than ever; their plaster surfaces have been renewed to give them again the look of marble.

The walls of the auditorium have been repainted as has the ceiling; seven colors were used in all, and these colors match perfectly the originals. Likewise, the ceiling was stripped and repainted so that the auditorium now has been restored to its original look of 1900.

The lovely chandeliers also have been cleaned and polished. Moreover, the organ pipes, the proscenium arch, and the balcony railings, all covered with gold leaf, have been washed and a new protective coat of gelatin added.

Although the handsome hall now looks fresh and shining and although throughout the redecoration special care was taken to make certain that no change would occur in the auditorium's unique acoustics (among the best in the world), there is still work to do. For example, the leather doors to Symphony Hall will gradually be re-covered. In addition, public elevators will be installed later, and a new entrance and foyer will be constructed.

All this refurbishing represents the first expenditure from the $1,500,000 which is being raised as part of the $5,500,000 for the Boston Symphony. In any event, Symphony Hall, long a source of pride to both proper and improper Bostonians, has never looked better.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 63,850

OCT 11 1967 New England Newsclip

Program Is Well-Played By Boston Symphony

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Last night, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, began its 1967-68 Tuesday "B" Series with a program that featured two works by Wagner, "Overture to 'The Flying Dutchman'" and excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," and Schubert's "Symphony No. 9 in C Major."

Obviously, the program offered no musical surprises, but it was well-played. And, inasmuch as Mr. Leinsdorf and his orchestra were in such good form even familiar music often had a quality of freshness and spontaneity.

Wagner's "Overture to 'The Flying Dutchman'" is of interest chiefly because it utilizes some of the ideas and techniques that were to come to full flower in his later work. Alternately meditative and sonorous, it makes for good listening.

From "Die Meistersinger" Mr. Leinsdorf chose the introduction to Act III and the perennially popular prelude to Act I. The introduction is somber and sometimes ominous; the prelude is a sort of cameo version of the opera itself inasmuch as it uses the major themes associated with the principal characters of the work.

It ends with the triumphant and thrilling theme of the meistersingers themselves — conveyed in glorious and rafter-shaking sound by the Boston musicians.

I have no doubt whatsoever that Schubert's Symphony No. 9 is his finest orchestral work — better in brilliance of instrumentation, in variety of melody, in its handling of the symphonic form than the much-played "Unfinished."

It is an irony of fate that Schubert himself never heard this symphony; it was rescued from oblivion a decade after his death by Mendelssohn who found the manscript in the possession of a friend.

Mr. Leinsdorf's reading o fthe work is firm, steady, somewhat rapid in tempo, and never over-romanticized. I thought the orchestra was especially effective in the lilting scherzo and in the magnificent finale which, even when it repeats itself, (and the only weakness of the work is Schubert's tendency to occasional long-windedness) manages, nevertheless, to hold one's attention.

The next concert in the series will be played Oct. 31, with Jorge Metser as guest conductor.

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150

OCT 15 1967 New England Newsclip

4 FRI—SAT III III / CAMBRIDGE I—I

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program

Friday afternoon 13 October at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening 14 October at 8.30

BEETHOVEN

Suite from the ballet Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus op. 43

Overture: Adagio – Allegro molto con brio
Introduction to Act I 'La Tempesta': Allegro non troppo
Adagio – Andante quasi allegretto
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp JULES ESKIN cello
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute GINO CIOFFI clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
Finale: Allegretto – Allegro molto – Presto

SCHOENBERG

Concerto for Piano and Orchestra op. 42

Andante
Molto allegro
Adagio
Giocoso (moderato)

RITA BOUBOULIDI

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

SCHUMANN

Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61

Sostenuto assai–Allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: Allegro vivace–Trio I–Trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

At these performances Mme Bouboulidi is playing the Steinway Piano

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday
and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

First Program

Tuesday evening 17 October at 8.30

BEETHOVEN

Suite from the ballet Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus op. 43

Overture: Adagio – Allegro molto con brio
Pastorale: Allegro – March: Allegro
Adagio – Andante quasi allegretto
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp JULES ESKIN cello
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute GINO CIOFFI clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
Finale: Allegretto – Allegro molto – Presto

SCHOENBERG

Concerto for Piano and Orchestra op. 42

Andante
Molto allegro
Adagio
Giocoso (moderato)

RITA BOUBOULIDI

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

SCHUMANN

Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61

Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio I; Trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

At this performance Mme Bouboulidi is playing the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HELLENIC CHRONICLE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 22,050

OCT 12 1967 New England Newsclip

Greek Pian With Boston

RITA BOUBOULIDI

Rita Bouboulidi of Greece, whose piano has been heard in all parts of Europe, will be guest soloist this weekend with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

For her appearance Friday and Saturday, Miss Bouboulidi will play the Shoenberg Piano Concerto, a work not previously performed by the orchestra. Erick Leinsdorft will direct.

Beginning her musical studies in her native Greece, Miss Bouboulidi was awarded her diploma from Athens Conservatory and completed a full course of classical studies as well. She made her debut with the state orchestra in Athens in 1947, and after receiving a French government award went to France to continue her studies at Conservatoire National de Paris with Lazare-Levy, in piano, and Simone PleGaussade in counterpoint, winning prizes in both.

After taking the top medal in the international competition in Geneva in 1949, she studied for four years with master classes in Lucerne and privately with Edwin Fischer. She made her debut in Paris in 1953 and followed this with a concert tour throughout Europe, the Soviet Union and Africa, playing under the baton of many leading conductors. Her first trip to America was in 1962 for a series of concerts in Latin America. She holds a professional concert piano soloist's card, first class, with the French national radio and television.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

OCT 8 1967 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. Headlines Schoenberg

The Schoenberg Piano Concerto will have its first Boston Symphony performances Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday evening at 8:30, when Rita Bouboulidi is soloist and Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

The program also will include Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet music and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major. An open rehearsal of this program will be held Thursday at 7:30.

Mme Bouboulidi began her musical studies in Greece and made her debut in 1947 with the State Orchestra in Athens. Her Paris debut was in 1953, after study at the Conservatoire.

The orchestra also will give a concert Tuesday evening at 7:30. The program will be made up of the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and excerpts from Act III of "Meistersinger" by Wagner and Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C major.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

OCT 12 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Cambridge Series Begins Next Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give only one concert in Symphony Hall next week as the Orchestra begins its first tour of the season at mid-week.

On Tuesday, Oct. 17, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the first program of the Cambridge series which begins at 8:30. Program includes excerpts from Beethoven's ballet prometheus, Symphony No. 2 by Schumann and Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist.

The Orchestra returns to Symphony Hall for a concert under the direction of Charles Wilson on Tuesday, Oct. 24.

VISITORS GUIDEPOST
BOSTON, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY

OCT 13 1967 New England Newsclip

music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — Backbone of the Boston cultural scene, the BSO makes Symphony Hall a titled seat and performs excerpts from the ballet "Prometheus" by Beethoven, the Schoenberg Piano Concerto with pianist Rita Bouboulidi, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major, on Friday afternoon, October 13, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, October 14, at 8:30 p.m. The program will be repeated for the Cambridge concert series in Sanders Theater, Tuesday, October 17, at 8:30 p.m. On Tuesday, October 24, Charles Wilson, recently appointed assistant conductor of the BSO, will debut at the podium. Thursday, October 26, Erich Leinsdorf will return to conduct an orchestral program.

4 FRI-SAT III / CAMBRIDGE I

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program

Friday afternoon 13 October at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening 14 October at 8.30

BEETHOVEN

Suite from the ballet Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus op. 43

Overture: Adagio – Allegro molto con brio
Introduction to Act I 'La Tempesta': Allegro non troppo
Adagio – Andante quasi allegretto
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp JULES ESKIN cello
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute GINO CIOFFI clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
Finale: Allegretto – Allegro molto – Presto

SCHOENBERG

Concerto for Piano and Orchestra op. 42

Andante
Molto allegro
Adagio
Giocoso (moderato)

RITA BOUBOULIDI

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

SCHUMANN

Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61

Sostenuto assai–Allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: Allegro vivace–Trio I–Trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

At these performances Mme Bouboulidi is playing the Steinway Piano

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday
and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

First Program

Tuesday evening 17 October at 8.30

BEETHOVEN

Suite from the ballet Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus op. 43

Overture: Adagio – Allegro molto con brio
Pastorale: Allegro – March: Allegro
Adagio – Andante quasi allegretto
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp JULES ESKIN cello
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute GINO CIOFFI clarinet
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
Finale: Allegretto – Allegro molto – Presto

SCHOENBERG

Concerto for Piano and Orchestra op. 42

Andante
Molto allegro
Adagio
Giocoso (moderato)

RITA BOUBOULIDI

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

SCHUMANN

Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61

Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio I; Trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

At this performance Mme Bouboulidi is playing the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HELLENIC CHRONICLE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 22,050

OCT 12 1967 New England Newsclip

Greek Pian With Boston

RITA BOUBOULIDI

Rita Bouboulidi of Greece, whose piano has been heard in all parts of Europe, will be guest soloist this weekend with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

For her appearance Friday and Saturday, Miss Bouboulidi will play the Shoenberg Piano Concerto, a work not previously performed by the orchestra. Erick Leinsdorft will direct.

Beginning her musical studies in her native Greece, Miss Bouboulidi was awarded her diploma from Athens Conservatory and completed a full course of classical studies as well. She made her debut with the state orchestra in Athens in 1947, and after receiving a French government award went to France to continue her studies at Conservatoire National de Paris with Lazare-Levy, in piano, and Simone PleGaussade in counterpoint, winning prizes in both.

After taking the top medal in the international competition in Geneva in 1949, she studied for four years with master classes in Lucerne and privately with Edwin Fischer. She made her debut in Paris in 1953 and followed this with a concert tour throughout Europe, the Soviet Union and Africa, playing under the baton of many leading conductors. Her first trip to America was in 1962 for a series of concerts in Latin America. She holds a professional concert piano soloist's card, first class, with the French national radio and television.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

OCT 8 1967 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. Headlines Schoenberg

The Schoenberg Piano Concerto will have its first Boston Symphony performances Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday evening at 8:30, when Rita Bouboulidi is soloist and Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

The program also will include Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet music and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major. An open rehearsal of this program will be held Thursday at 7:30.

Mme Bouboulidi began her musical studies in Greece and made her debut in 1947 with the State Orchestra in Athens. Her Paris debut was in 1953, after study at the Conservatoire.

The orchestra also will give a concert Tuesday evening at 7:30. The program will be made up of the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and excerpts from Act III of "Meistersinger" by Wagner and Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C major.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 20,000

OCT 12 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Cambridge Series Begins Next Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give only one concert in Symphony Hall next week as the Orchestra begins its first tour of the season at mid-week.

On Tuesday, Oct. 17, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the first program of the Cambridge series which begins at 8:30. Program includes excerpts from Beethoven's ballet prometheus, Symphony No. 2 by Schumann and Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist.

The Orchestra returns to Symphony Hall for a concert under the direction of Charles Wilson on Tuesday, Oct. 24.

VISITORS GUIDEPOST
BOSTON, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY

OCT 13 1967 New England Newsclip

music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — Backbone of the Boston cultural scene, the BSO makes Symphony Hall a titled seat and performs excerpts from the ballet "Prometheus" by Beethoven, the Schoenberg Piano Concerto with pianist Rita Bouboulidi, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major, on Friday afternoon, October 13, at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, October 14, at 8:30 p.m. The program will be repeated for the Cambridge concert series in Sanders Theater, Tuesday, October 17, at 8:30 p.m. On Tuesday, October 24, Charles Wilson, recently appointed assistant conductor of the BSO, will debut at the podium. Thursday, October 26, Erich Leinsdorf will return to conduct an orchestral program.

HELLENIC CHRONICLE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 22,050
049
OCT 12 1967 New England Newsclip

CALENDAR NOTES: On Tuesday, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in excerpts from Beethoven's ballet Prometheus and Symphony No. 2 by Schumann with the middle of the program devoted to Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist . . . Miss Bouboulidi will be soloist in the orchestra's appearance in New York City on Wednesday . . .

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
SEP 16 1967 New England Newsclip

Rita Bouboulidi Has Secure Hold Here

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

Rita Bouboulidi is a Greek pianist who specializes in the music of Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms.

She came to Boston to make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Piano Concerto of Schoenberg. This could make an interviewer curious.

"Mr. Leinsdorf suggested it to me," Miss Bouboulidi explained. "He knew I wanted to play the Schoenberg concerto — I have played it three times in Europe — so he asked me to do it."

The Schoenberg work was played by Miss Bouboulidi and the B.S.O. Friday and Saturday and will be repeated Tuesday night in Symphony Hall.

"It is not the only modern work I play," she said. "I play concertos by Jolivet, Rivier and Stravinsky. Also, the Second Piano Concerto of Bartok. Actually, I hate the word 'modern.' What does it mean, really?"

Asked what other works she is interested in learning, Miss Bouboulidi expressed interest in an American piece: "I would like to play the solo part in Leonard Bernstein's 'Age of Anxiety.' A friend in Paris played a recording of it for me. I asked at the American Library in Paris, and they couldn't find the music there. Now I understand there have been some revisions. I will ask when I get to New York."

As part of her 1963 tour of the U.S., Miss Bouboulidi played a recital in Gardner Museum. "I believe I played the E Minor Prelude and Fugue of Bach, the Variations on a Theme of Handel, Bartok's Suite and the four Ballades of Chopin," she recalled.

On the continent she has played a complete cycle of the 32 Beethoven sonatas. "That was in Madrid, in November of 1965," she explained. "It was in seven concerts."

Miss Bouboulidi was the first Greek woman to tour the Soviet Union as a pianist. "On my second tour," she said, "I went to Alma-Ata near the border with China, Tashkent in Azerbaijan, and then after Leningrad I played in Talinn and Riga. The audiences looked like European audiences anywhere else. Their response was very warm."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
OCT 14 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Has a Feeling for Schumann's Second

By McLAREN HARRIS

SYMPHONY

Temptation induces me to state that Friday's Symphony program consisted of three examples of Beethoven's, Schoenberg's and Schumann's second line.

But there is argument with that in at least one case. Opinions vary on which of Schumann's four symphonies should be considered superior, with perhaps the most votes going to No. 4—No. 2 running second (sorry about that). I am inclined to cast my lot with Schumann's Second, and Friday's performance appeared to indicate that Erich Leinsdorf feels likewise.

There are common annoyances to both the Second and Fourth, principally in the somewhat murky maelstrom of the fast movements (the finale of the Second) and in Schumann's over-reliance upon his orchestral right hand, i.e., the violins. Except in the Second's Adagio, he almost never gives them, or our ears, a respite. Yet, the C major symphony has an easier rhythmic motion than No. 4, due largely to the infrequence of displaced accents. Its skipping melodic figures are more brief and the general scoring is lighter.

In the latter regard, a program note mentioning Leinsdorf as having edited some Schumann scores seems to hint that he has done so for No. 2. However that may be, the doubling in Friday's version was held to a minimum, and clarity was the result.

It was not Leinsdorf's editing but his conducting which revealed his regard for Schumann, especially in the Adagio. The principal theme must be one of the most sublime melodies ever written, and the conductor treated it like pure gold, allowing it to flow with utmost grace, lingering but never static. The musicians responded with phrases of exquisite curvature, though when Leinsdorf called for silken high tones from the violins he got only rough-edged facsimiles. The finale, slightly tumbling but with ample forward thrust, ended in triumph.

Arnold Schoenberg's Piano Concerto (1942) is more like a second-line work in comparison with the composer's best efforts. The four-movement piece is in the main stream of his 12-tone writing and its serial organization is lucid enough most of the time. It also has many lyric virtues as well as tasteful, economic orchestration. The general impression is one of technical polish, yet of stifled impulse. The movements seem too short for the abundance of ideas they contain, with a result of apparent under-development and a hurriedness of expression. It is a story of more genius than perseverance.

Rita Bouboulidi, making her first appearance here, played the solo part, which is only partially assertive. Perhaps more rhythmic energy in her performance would have helped cure this imbalance; again, perhaps the size of Leinsdorf's orchestra was overly formidable. At any rate, Miss Bouboulidi's keyboard work was clean, accurate and straightforward. The piano-orchestra exchanges in the concluding rondo (the best of the four) were bright and satisfying.

Excerpts from Beethoven's ballet music to "Die Geschoepfe des Prometheus," Op. 43, opened the program. The "Prometheus" music is best known for its use of the "Eroica" finale theme, though the variations are different. The four sections on Friday's program are spirited and melodious, though relatively inconsequential and in the Adagio, a bit uncharacteristic: it contains the lone example of Beethoven's writing for the harp. Bernard Zighera's work, plus Jules Eskin's on the cello, were excellent, while the orchestral playing as a whole seemed slightly disinterested.

The orchestra tours the New York area next week, and on Oct. 27-28 guest conductor Jorge Mester will direct performances of Verdi's overture to "I Vespri Siciliani," Strauss' "Don Quixote" (Burton Fine and Jules Eskin, soloists), "Le Tombeau de Couperin" of Ravel and Bartok's Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin."

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the third program of the 87th season Friday at Symphony Hall. Rita Bouboulidi was soloist for the Schoenberg concerto.

Suite from the ballet, "Die Geschoepfe des Prometheus," Op. 43 — Beethoven
Piano Concerto, Op. 42 — Schoenberg
Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61 — Schumann

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250
OCT 20 1967 New England Newsclip

THE NEW YORK TIMES, FRIDAY, OCTOBER

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SERIES HERE

The Schoenberg Piano Concerto is a rare item hereabouts, and so it was a special disappointment that it was not heard to better advantage at the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night at Philharmonic Hall.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted and the Greek pianist, Rita Bouboulidi, was the soloist. In this work, soloist and orchestra must be separate and intact. The drama between their widely diffent roles is what keeps the concerto going.

Miss Bouboulidi was quite often drowned out by the orchestra, and at those moments the concerto lost direction. And Mr. Leinsdorf let the orchestra ramble where it should be strikingly intense.

What with Miss Bouboulidi's sometimes unemphatic playing, the concerto as a whole came out pale gray.

The biggest plus at the concert was the full-bodied, burnished Bostonian sound. It barely saved Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" Overture and Schubert's "Great" C major Symphony from the fate of the Schoenberg.

Wednesday night's was the opening concert in the Boston's series at Philharmonic Hall.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
OCT 15 1967 New England Newsclip

One Concert By Symphony Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give only one concert in Symphony Hall next week as the orchestra begins its first tour of the season at mid-week.

On Tuesday Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the first program of the Cambridge series which begins at 8:30. For this concert the music director has chosen excerpts from Beethoven's ballet "Prometheus" and Symphony No. 2 by Schumann. The middle portion of the program will be devoted to Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist.

Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Philharmonic Hall, New York, with Mme. Bouboulidi as soloist in her first appearance in that city. Other concerts on this initial tour of the season will be given in Brooklyn, Newark and a second concert at Philharmonic Hall Friday evening. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct all performances on this tour.

The orchestra returns to Symphony hall for a concert under the direction of Charles Wilson on Tuesday, Oct. 24.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
OCT 14 1967 New England Newsclip

Schoenberg Work Deserves Better

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: Erich Leinsdorf conducting excerpts from Beethoven's music for the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Arnold Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, written in 1942, introduced here two years ago at a New England Consevatory concert and now played at the Boston Symphony, is a beautiful work, romantic in sentiment and rich in texture and color, though neither thick nor flashy, concentrated, exploring the compositional and expressive possibilities of its material in amazingly diverse ways.

It is quite short. Its four joined movements—a lyric Andante, with a rather tough Scherzo and Adagio, and a Roundo Finale—take a little less than 20 minutes to play. It has neither the virtuoso character nor the glittering coloration of the violin concerto, and it is unpretentious, nonoratorical and, indeed, quite intimate. The orchestral writing is, in Virgil Thomson's phrase, "like chamber music for a hundred players," which is true of most of Schoenberg's mature music for orchestra. The piano part, too, relates to the orchestra in a chamber musical fashion, and, except for the long and lovely melody that opens the work and the cadenza in the Adagio, it hardly asserts itself in a pointedly soloistic manner at all.

With its warmth of feeling, its retisence, its way of being staggeringly brainy and at the same time quite unostentatious about it, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto suggests that its godparent is Brahms, the Brahms of the late intermezzos, not the grandiloquent one of the concertos.

Rita Bouboulidi, a great pianist whom I take to be in her late 30s, has a thorough intellectual and musical grasp of the work, and she gets its notes, too. She even played it from memory, which is rare with difficult contemporary concertos. She had not much flair for projecting the work convincingly. The piece is one that, like the Beethoven Fourth Concerto, has to cast a spell from the beginning, but just then Miss Bouboulidi's playing was particularly cold and uninviting. The phrasing became more flexible later, but the dynamic range stayed compressed, and her fortissimo was insufficient even for clear audibility through the orchestra.

In so far as the right notes were played at the right times, the orchestral playing was accurate, and the principal voices came through clearly. In another sense, though, the dynamics were only approximate, with only rare moments of really strong playing and almost none that were really quiet, nearly everything being squashed together into a monotous medzoforte. Moreover, intelligibility suffered from Leinsdorf's failure to get the orchestra to articulate repeated notes clearly.

The performance was serious, though not beautiful, a sufficient reminder of the piece to someone who already knew it, but not at all the persuasive case that should have been made.

Beethoven's attractive "Prometheus" music was well paced, unless it was the speed of the overture that kept Leinsdorf from articulating and phrasing its running notes. The Schumann C Major Symphony was unsettingly discontinuous. Most of the orchestral playing in both was gritty in sound, not together, and out of tune.

HELLENIC CHRONICLE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 22,050
OCT 12 1967 New England Newsclip

CALENDAR NOTES: On Tuesday, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in excerpts from Beethoven's ballet Prometheus and Symphony No. 2 by Schumann with the middle of the program devoted to Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist . . . Miss Bouboulidi will be soloist in the orchestra's appearance in New York City on Wednesday . . .

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
SEP 16 1967 New England Newsclip

Rita Bouboulidi Has Secure Hold Here

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

Rita Bouboulidi is a Greek pianist who specializes in the music of Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms.

She came to Boston to make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Piano Concerto of Schoenberg. This could make an interviewer curious.

"Mr. Leinsdorf suggested it to me," Miss Bouboulidi explained. "He knew I wanted to play the Schoenberg concerto — I have played it three times in Europe — so he asked me to do it."

The Schoenberg work was played by Miss Bouboulidi and the B.S.O. Friday and Saturday and will be repeated Tuesday night in Symphony Hall.

"It is not the only modern work I play," she said. "I play concertos by Jolivet, Rivier and Stravinsky. Also, the Second Piano Concerto of Bartok. Actually, I hate the word 'modern.' What does it mean, really?"

Asked what other works she is interested in learning, Miss Bouboulidi expressed interest in an American piece: "I would like to play the solo part in Leonard Bernstein's 'Age of Anxiety.' A friend in Paris played a recording of it for me. I asked at the American Library in Paris, and they couldn't find the music there. Now I understand there have been some revisions. I will ask when I get to New York."

As part of her 1963 tour of the U.S., Miss Bouboulidi played a recital in Gardner Museum. "I believe I played the E Minor Prelude and Fugue of Bach, the Variations on a Theme of Handel, Bartok's Suite and the four Ballades of Chopin," she recalled.

On the continent she has played a complete cycle of the 32 Beethoven sonatas. "That was in Madrid, in November of 1965," she explained. "It was in seven concerts."

Miss Bouboulidi was the first Greek woman to tour the Soviet Union as a pianist. "On my second tour," she said, "I went to Alma-Ata near the border with China, Tashkent in Azerbaijan, and then after Leningrad I played in Talinn and Riga. The audiences looked like European audiences anywhere else. Their response was very warm."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 210,030
OCT 14 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Has a Feeling for Schumann's Second

By McLAREN HARRIS

SYMPHONY

Temptation induces me to state that Friday's Symphony program consisted of three examples of Beethoven's, Schoenberg's and Schumann's second line.

But there is argument with that in at least one case. Opinions vary on which of Schumann's four symphonies should be considered superior, with perhaps the most votes going to No. 4—No. 2 running second (sorry about that). I am inclined to cast my lot with Schumann's Second, and Friday's performance appeared to indicate that Erich Leinsdorf feels likewise.

There are common annoyances to both the Second and Fourth, principally in the somewhat murky maelstrom of the fast movements (the finale of the Second) and in Schumann's over-reliance upon his orchestral right hand, i.e., the violins. Except in the Second's Adagio, he almost never gives them, or our ears, a respite. Yet, the C major symphony has an easier rhythmic motion than No. 4, due largely to the infrequence of displaced accents. Its skipping melodic figures are more brief and the general scoring is lighter.

In the latter regard, a program note mentioning Leinsdorf as having edited some Schumann scores seems to hint that he has done so for No. 2. However that may be, the doubling in Friday's version was held to a minimum, and clarity was the result.

It was not Leinsdorf's editing but his conducting which revealed his regard for Schumann, especially in the Adagio. The principal theme must be one of the most sublime melodies ever written, and the conductor treated it like pure gold, allowing it to flow with utmost grace, lingering but never static. The musicians responded with phrases of exquisite curvature, though when Leinsdorf called for silken high tones from the violins he got only rough-edged facsimiles. The finale, slightly tumbling but with ample forward thrust, ended in triumph.

Arnold Schoenberg's Piano Concerto (1942) is more like a second-line work in comparison with the composer's best efforts. The four-movement piece is in the main stream of his 12-tone writing and its serial organization is lucid enough most of the time. It also has many lyric virtues as well as tasteful, economic orchestration. The general impression is one of technical polish, yet of stifled impulse. The movements seem too short for the abundance of ideas they contain, with a result of apparent under-development and a hurriedness of expression. It is a story of more genius than perseverance.

Rita Bouboulidi, making her first appearance here, played the solo part, which is only partially assertive. Perhaps more rhythmic energy in her performance would have helped cure this imbalance; again, perhaps the size of Leinsdorf's orchestra was overly formidable. At any rate, Miss Bouboulidi's keyboard work was clean, accurate and straightforward. The piano-orchestra exchanges in the concluding rondo (the best of the four) were bright and satisfying.

Excerpts from Beethoven's ballet music to "Die Geschoepfe des Prometheus," Op. 43, opened the program. The "Prometheus" music is best known for its use of the "Eroica" finale theme, though the variations are different. The four sections on Friday's program are spirited and melodious, though relatively inconsequential and in the Adagio, a bit uncharacteristic: it contains the lone example of Beethoven's writing for the harp. Bernard Zighera's work, plus Jules Eskin's on the cello, were excellent, while the orchestral playing as a whole seemed slightly disinterested.

The orchestra tours the New York area next week, and on Oct. 27-28 guest conductor Jorge Mester will direct performances of Verdi's overture to "I Vespri Siciliani," Strauss' "Don Quixote" (Burton Fine and Jules Eskin, soloists), "Le Tombeau de Couperin" of Ravel and Bartok's Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin."

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the third program of the 87th season Friday at Symphony Hall. Rita Bouboulidi was soloist for the Schoenberg concerto.

Suite from the ballet, "Die Geschoepfe des Prometheus," Op. 43 — Beethoven
Piano Concerto, Op. 42 — Schoenberg
Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61 — Schumann

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 20 1967 New England Newsclip

THE NEW YORK TIMES, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1967

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SERIES HERE

The Schoenberg Piano Concerto is a rare item hereabouts, and so it was a special disappointment that it was not heard to better advantage at the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night at Philharmonic Hall.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted and the Greek pianist, Rita Bouboulidi, was the soloist. In this work, soloist and orchestra must be separate and intact. The drama between their widely diffent roles is what keeps the concerto going.

Miss Bouboulidi was quite often drowned out by the orchestra, and at those moments the concerto lost direction. And Mr. Leinsdorf let the orchestra ramble where it should be strikingly intense.

What with Miss Bouboulidi's sometimes unemphatic playing, the concerto as a whole came out pale gray.

The biggest plus at the concert was the full-bodied, burnished Bostonian sound. It barely saved Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" Overture and Schubert's "Great" C major Symphony from the fate of the Schoenberg.

Wednesday night's was the opening concert in the Boston's series at Philharmonic Hall.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
OCT 15 1967 New England Newsclip

One Concert By Symphony Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give only one concert in Symphony Hall next week as the orchestra begins its first tour of the season at mid-week.

On Tuesday Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the first program of the Cambridge series which begins at 8:30. For this concert the music director has chosen excerpts from Beethoven's ballet "Prometheus" and Symphony No. 2 by Schumann. The middle portion of the program will be devoted to Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist.

Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Philharmonic Hall, New York, with Mme. Bouboulidi as soloist in her first appearance in that city. Other concerts on this initial tour of the season will be given in Brooklyn, Newark and a second concert at Philharmonic Hall Friday evening. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct all performances on this tour.

The orchestra returns to Symphony hall for a concert under the direction of Charles Wilson on Tuesday, Oct. 24.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
OCT 14 1967 New England Newsclip

Schoenberg Work Deserves Better

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Erich Leinsdorf conducting excerpts from Beethoven's music for the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Arnold Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, written in 1942, introduced here two years ago at a New England Conservatory concert and now played at the Boston Symphony, is a beautiful work, romantic in sentiment and rich in texture and color, though neither thick nor flashy, concentrated, exploring the compositional and expressive possibilities of its material in amazingly diverse ways.

It is quite short. Its four joined movements—a lyric Andante, with a rather tough Scherzo and Adagio, and a Roundo Finale—take a little less than 20 minutes to play. It has neither the virtuoso character nor the glittering coloration of the violin concerto, and it is unpretentious, nonoratorical and, indeed, quite intimate. The orchestral writing is, in Virgil Thomson's phrase, "like chamber music for a hundred players," which is true of most of Schoenberg's mature music for orchestra. The piano part, too, relates to the orchestra in a chamber musical fashion, and, except for the long and lovely melody that opens the work and the cadenza in the Adagio, it hardly asserts itself in a pointedly soloistic manner at all.

With its warmth of feeling, its retisence, its way of being staggeringly brainy and at the same time quite unostentatious about it, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto suggests that its godparent is Brahms, the Brahms of the late intermezzos, not the grandiloquent one of the concertos.

Rita Bouboulidi, a great pianist whom I take to be in her late 30s, has a thorough intellectual and musical grasp of the work, and she gets its notes, too. She even played it from memory, which is rare with difficult contemporary concertos. She had not much flair for projecting the work convincingly. The piece is one that, like the Beethoven Fourth Concerto, has to cast a spell from the beginning, but just then Miss Bouboulidi's playing was particularly cold and uninviting. The phrasing became more flexible later, but the dynamic range stayed compressed, and her fortissimo was insufficient even for clear audibility through the orchestra.

In so far as the right notes were played at the right times, the orchestral playing was accurate, and the principal voices came through clearly. In another sense, though, the dynamics were only approximate, with only rare moments of really strong playing and almost none that were really quiet, nearly everything being squashed together into a monotous medzoforte. Moreover, intelligibility suffered from Leinsdorf's failure to get the orchestra to articulate repeated notes clearly.

The performance was serious, though not beautiful, a sufficient reminder of the piece to someone who already knew it, but not at all the persuasive case that should have been made.

Beethoven's attractive "Prometheus" music was well paced, unless it was the speed of the overture that kept Leinsdorf from articulating and phrasing its running notes. The Schumann C Major Symphony was unsettingly discontinuous. Most of the orchestral playing in both was gritty in sound, not together, and out of tune.

6

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

OCT 14 1967

New England Newspaper

Gifted Greek Pianiste In Schoenberg Concerto

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Rita Bouboulidi, gifted Greek pianiste, was featured soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, yesyesterday afternoon. She She played Arnold Schoenberg's tortuous piano concerto (Op. 42) with clarity and superb insight, in a first Symphony Hall performance, without benefit of miniskirt.

Twenty-odd years ago, this work was regarded by pianists as bewildering, if not downright incomprehensible. It still is, though, when heard without the crutch of musical intellectualism, its austerities appear to have been imposed upon a substratum of tempered romanticism, with lacelike, featherlight, coloristic effects which Schoenberg seldom shed.

Written in 1942, when its composer was nearing 70, it represents his vicarious talents at the peak. Its technical logic is fascinating, with lyricism pourin lyricism pouring through its bars. Its colors reflect the old, underlying the Inded, the keyed instrument almost intrudes into orchestral territory.

aSchoenberg

Solo virtuosity is stated politely. While fantasy is implied by the single movement, it is divided into variations, scherzo, slow movement and rondo. There are reflections of relative tonality, though lean and angular, shadowing this music.

The twelve-tone bogey has been banished and it can be heard as any other music, without obscure intellectual analyses. Though it is astoundingly difficult, it received exemplary exposition from both soloist and orchestra.

To raise the curtain were the overture and three scenes from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus" ballet (Op. 43). It was first presented in 1801, again in 1802, lying dormant until 1929, with choreography by Serge Lifar. In toto, it comprises an overture and 16 episodes.

This music is of great beauty, with attractive opportunities for a choreographer. Perhaps some venturesome ballet troupe will get around to producing this long-neglected masterpiece.

After the interval came Schumann's second symphony (Op. 61 in C), whose expansive spread indicates the composer felt he had something very special to say. Regrettably, not all parts of this work are of equal merit and, ajacent to wondrous mo-ments, are disappointing ones.

However, the introduction to the opening allegro is greatly significant. The great sostenuto segment is a veritable Faustian struggle, searching for clarity, fighting for truth; while the scherzo is veritable Schumann, an enchanting movement, conjuring up all Nature's poetry. The adagio is this symphony's climax, one of Schumann's more beautiful movements, erected upon a single theme, conveying a wondrous feeling of peace and encouragement.

Dr. Leinsdorf stressed the dynamic qualities inherent in this patched symphony with good effect. His was a valid conception of this score, imparted to his musicians with strength and elokuence.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 838,000 SUN. 1,500,000

OCT 19 1967

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SERIES HERE

The Schoenberg Piano Concerto is a rare item hereabouts and so it was a special disappointment that it was not heard to better advantage at the Boston Symphony's concert last night at Philharmonic Hall.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted and the Greek pianist, Rita Bouboulidi, was the soloist. In this work, soloist and orchestra must be separate and intact. The drama between their widely diffent roles is what keeps the concerto going.

Miss Bouboulidi was quite often drowned out by the orchestra, and at those moments the concerto lost direction. And Mr. Leinsdorf let the orchestra ramble where it should be strikingly intense.

What with Miss Bouboulidi's sometimes unemphatic playing, the concerto as a whole came out pale gray.

The biggest plus at the concert was the full-bodied, burnished Bostonian sound. It barely saved Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" Overture and Schubert "Great" C major Symphony from the fate of the Schoenberg.

Last night's was the opening concert in the Boston's series at Philharmonic Hall.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 195,400

OCT 16 1967

New England Newspaper

Schoenberg's Piano Concerto

Bouboulidi soloist

By Craig Stinson

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Like many other modern classics, the Schoenberg Piano Concerto was a long time in coming before the public. Its first Boston performance took place only two years ago at the New England Conservatory. The Boston Symphony did not get around to it until last Friday.

The soloist at Symphony Hall, a Greek pianist named Rita Bouboulidi, deserves commendation first for choosing the work. Although an extremely lyrical and potentially popular piece, the Schoenberg still presents problems to many listeners. While its technical demands are considerable, it is not a flashy concerto; aside from a brief cadenza in the third movement, there is nothing demonstrative about it. Any number of other solo vehicles would have assured Miss Bouboulidi, by elementary Pavlov, a greater success with the audience.

Accurate and articulate

Her performance was both accurate and articulate. She played with a sure sense of what she was doing and communicated a genuine love for the work. The orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, sounded well prepared and interested in what was going on.

For the audience, the Schoenberg was without doubt the most challenging item on the season thus far. Though this concerto was composed almost a quarter century ago, during which time serial techniques have produced far more difficult pieces to listen to, these later developments have not diminished the amount of concentration required for this work. The collaboration of Mr. Leinsdorf and Miss Bouboulidi, however, demonstrated that Schoenberg's music, when well done, can activate a listener's entire range of response mechanisms—intellectual as well as emotional.

A suite from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," opened the program in an adequate, if not very fire-breathing run-through. The andante movement was notable for some lovely bassoon playing by Sherman Walt.

The Schumann Symphony No. 2, in contrast to the rest of the program, sounded quite limp and incohesive. Familiarity seems to breed overconfidence as well as lack of respect.

A review of the Guarneri String Quartet will appear on this page Tuesday.

TWES AA-II

7

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Tuesday evening 24 October at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS
Academic Festival Overture op. 80

HENZE
Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto — Tempo giusto — Piu mosso

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV
Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso: Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento: Andantino: Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto: Recitativo: Vivo

The Academic Festival Overture has been recorded by the Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

OCT 19 1967 New England Newsclip

Two Premieres at BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PETER DAVISON

There were two premieres at the second weekend series of Boston Symphony concerts on October 6 and 7. The first was that of Charles Wilson, the young assistant conductor of the orchestra, who acquitted himself well. The second was Hans Werner Henze's Symphony No. 1, which, like Mr. Wilson, underwent its first public trial in Boston.

Mr. Wilson conducted, in addition to the Henze Symphony, Brahms' Academic Festival Overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade. The Brahms was competently performed, but not very astringent, and another conductor might perhaps have attended more particularly to its tensions. Mr. Wilson's reading seemed to me a bit muted, a trifle timid. Perhaps in the stress of getting the Henze symphony prepared, and of readying Sheherazade (which had not been performed since 1946!), the familiar Brahms overture went under-rehearsed.

Though the Symphony players had been spared Sheherazade (except for excerpts at pop concerts, no doubt) for twenty-one years, there was a lot of foot-tapping and head-nodding in the audience as the familiar tunes took place. To play Sheherazade is to play beautiful melodies beautifully: the piece has little shape and much wind. The orchestra did right by the melodies, but I got no particular sense that Mr. Wilson had brought any particular insight to the performance. The solo violin passages were brilliantly performed by Joseph Silverstein.

Hans Werner Henze, for those who have not heard of him, is a highly successful German composer of forty-one, who has come into great prominence in recent years, particularly as composer of opera and ballet. Perhaps has most noted work is The Bassarids, an opera performed at Salzburg and Covent Garden last year. This work, not yet performed in the U.S., is adapted from Euripides' Bacchae by W. H. Auden and Chester Kallman. His Symphony No. 1 was composed when Henze was only twenty, but he revised the score radically in 1963 and it was this second version that Bostonians heard last week. It is a subtle and accomplished work and its three movements circled around an absorption with the major second.

I found the first movement a bit more elusive and could not tell at one hearing whether this was my inability to hear or a certain timidity in the conducting or some other reason. The second movement, Lento (Notturno) derived from Stravinsky's lyrical style of the thirties and forties: much use of basso ostinato; a beautiful viola-flute duet, a long lyrical line. The third movement more dissonant and challenging, also shared Stravinsky's idiom of those years: percussive use of piano, harp and strings.

Despite its derivation, however, this short symphony is no pallid imitation by a student of a master. I have not heard enough of Henze's music to be able to discriminate between what was derived and what was a sign of the future; but this is virile and powerful music.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

OCT 7 1967 New England Newsclip

'Chas. Wilson Makes Debut In Conducting The BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his official debut on the local podium yesterday afternoon. He took his first bow after a stirring performance of Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, more festive than academic. It was warm and sincere, though more humor could have been injected into the pawkier porations of this rollicking score.

Brahms employs no fewer than ten themes, making this overture somewhat of a potpourri, and, though not in strict sonata-form, it does come off when well played. 4 tunes are genuine German student songs; the others are of the composer's own creation.

Brahms Strolling

There followed the first performance in Boston of any Henze, once described as the of the music of Hans Werner greatest hope of the post-war eGrman composers. Long ago he passed that "White Hope" description with his five symphonies, eight operas, four cantatas and three ballets, as well as several instrumental concerti ad orchestral suites.

His first symphony was composed in 1947 for full orchestra, but the version presented yesterday was that of 1963, for chamber orchestra. It is in the serial format, though not strictly twelve-toned, and completely listenable. As for the performance ,it was thoroughly the peer of the composer's own, recorded by DGG with the Berlin Philharmonic.

After the interval, there was a rousing performance of the symphonic suite "Sheherazade" (Op. 35), by Rimsky-Korsakoff. It had not been presented by the BSO for 21 years.

Why this should be is easily explained, for the orchestral tricks are as old as a cossack's moth-eaten busby. When "Sheherazade" was first presented in 1888, it made a profound impace, but since Stravinsky, Respighi and the Hollywooden decompositors took over its orchestral tricks, it has become horribly dated.

"Sheherazade' - required, for 75% of its effectivene ss, a batteary of first-desk players of consummate virtuosity. Above all, in the personating of the herione, was Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, but the oboe, bassoon, trombone, French horn, clarinet also were superb. However, this music is not for the concert hall, but the ballet theater, where it is unzipped, with the corset off.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

OCT 1 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Concerts

Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson will lead the Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. He will conduct Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Henze's Symphony No. 1 and "Sheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Last week-end's concert of excerpts from "Der Fliegende Hollander," "Die Meistersinger," and "Die Walkuere" will be repeated Tuesday by conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra with singers Claire Watson, Jess Thomas and Kenneth Smith.

Thursday night at 8:30 a concert of Wagner and Tchaikovsky will be played in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence, led by Leinsdorf.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

OCT 25 1967 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Symphony Hall Debuts

By Peter M. Knapp

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, is taking his first turns directing the orchestra in Symphony Hall.

Wilson is not exactly a beginner apprenticed to Erich Leinsdorf; he has had six years' conducting experience with the New York City Opera Company and has been chorus master for the Philadelphia Lyric Opera Company. He has made an excellent impression through his preparation of choruses at Tanglewood this summer.

Wilson has a number of obvious assets, including an ability to draw a clear, lean sound from the orchestra much of the time, to get sharp, decisive rhythms, and crisp attacks and releases. He does, though, have a considerable way to go in experience with an orchestra. He overconducts, and in his podium contortions and arm-flapping outdoes even Leinsdorf, who is more graceful about it.

His program last night began with Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, continued with Hans Werner Henze's Symphony No. 1, and concluded with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade." The Brahms was capably handled, though somewhat stiff and raw-boned.

Henze Symphony

Henze's symphony presents new material for Symphony-goers. Although Henze has a big reputation in Europe, his works have been rarely performed in the United States. He is an interesting composer, prolific, leaning toward theatrical rather than purely instrumental compositions, a musician working within traditional forms using 20th century harmonic language (the 12-tone system) with a highly-individual way of mixing instrumental sounds. He is something of an eclectic, yet has passed the point of mere derivation.

Henze's First Symphony (of five) was written in 1947. He later called it "an utter failure," and rewrote it for chamber orchestra in 1963, "reorganizing the material, attempting to reconstruct what I had originally intended; acting like a teacher helpfully correcting his pupils."

Atmospheric 'Notturno'

In three succinct movements, the symphony fits a tight, related structure in which basic motifs recur in different guises in all three movements. Henze is fond of counterpoint and romantically-inclined lyricism. The "Notturno" of the second movement is a lovely musical moment, framed by trademark woodwind chords in tight intervals, spiced by muted trumpets, and featuring delightful duets for flute and violin, flute and viola.

In the finale, the material becomes atomized in percussine fragments in complex rhythmic patterns a la Stravinsky. In programming this piece, Wilson showed enterprise. However, the performance was not entirely fluent — the Notturno making the best impression — the first movement was somewhat muddled and the tempo was on the quick side.

"Sheherazade" had its moments of freshness and vigor, notably in the latter part of the second movement, and featured elegant violin solos by Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein. But it, too, had awkward moments and times when the interpretation seemed coarse.

TUES A -II

7

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Tuesday evening 24 October at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS
Academic Festival Overture op. 80

HENZE
Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto – Tempo giusto – Piu mosso

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV
Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso: Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento: Andantino: Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto: Recitativo: Vivo

The Academic Festival Overture has been recorded by the Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 337,000
OCT 1 1967
New England Newsclip

BSO Concerts

Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson will lead the Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. He will conduct Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Henze's Symphony No. 1 and "Sheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Last week-end's concert of excerpts from "Der Fliegende Hollander," "Die Meistersinger," and "Die Walkuere" will be repeated Tuesday by conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra with singers Claire Watson, Jess Thomas and Kenneth Smith.

Thursday night at 8:30 a concert of Wagner and Tchaikovsky will be played in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence, led by Leinsdorf.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 25,000
OCT 19 1967
New England Newsclip

Two Premieres at BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PETER DAVISON

There were two premieres at the second weekend series of Boston Symphony concerts on October 6 and 7. The first was that of Charles Wilson, the young assistant conductor of the orchestra, who acquitted himself well. The second was Hans Werner Henze's Symphony No. 1, which, like Mr. Wilson, underwent its first public trial in Boston.

Mr. Wilson conducted, in addition to the Henze Symphony, Brahms' Academic Festival Overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade. The Brahms was competently performed, but not very astringent, and another conductor might perhaps have attended more particularly to its tensions. Mr. Wilson's reading seemed to me a bit muted, a trifle timid. Perhaps in the stress of getting the Henze symphony prepared, and of readying Sheherazade (which had not been performed since 1946!), the familiar Brahms overture went under-rehearsed.

Though the Symphony players had been spared Sheherazade (except for excerpts at pop concerts, no doubt) for twenty-one years, there was a lot of foot-tapping and head-nodding in the audience as the familiar tunes took place. To play Sheherazade is to play beautiful melodies beautifully: the piece has little shape and much wind. The orchestra did right by the melodies, but I got no particular sense that Mr. Wilson had brought any particular insight to the performance. The solo violin passages were brilliantly performed by Joseph Silverstein.

Hans Werner Henze, for those who have not heard of him, is a highly successful German composer of forty-one, who has come into great prominence in recent years, particularly as composer of opera and ballet. Perhaps has most noted work is The Bassarids, an opera performed at Salzburg and Covent Garden last year. This work, not yet performed in the U.S., is adapted from Euripides' Bacchae by W. H. Auden and Chester Kallman. His Symphony No. 1 was composed when Henze was only twenty, but he revised the score radically in 1963 and it was this second version that Bostonians heard last week. It is a subtle and accomplished work and its three movements circled around an absorption with the major second.

I found the first movement a bit more elusive and could not tell at one hearing whether this was my inability to hear or a certain timidity in the conducting or some other reason. The second movement, Lento (Notturno) derived from Stravinsky's lyrical style of the thirties and forties: much use of basso ostinato; a beautiful viola-flute duet, a long lyrical line. The third movement more dissonant and challenging, also shared Stravinsky's idiom of those years: percussive use of piano, harp and strings.

Despite its derivation, however, this short symphony is no pallid imitation by a student of a master. I have not heard enough of Henze's music to be able to discriminate between what was derived and what was a sign of the future; but this is virile and powerful music.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 413,250
OCT 7 1967
New England Newsclip

'Chas. Wilson Makes Debut In Conducting The BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his official debut on the local podium yesterday afternoon. He took his first bow after a stirring performance of Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, more festive than academic. It was warm and sincere, though more humor could have been injected into the pawkier porations of this rollicking score.

Brahms employs no fewer than ten themes, making this overture somewhat of a potpourri, and, though not in strict sonata-form, it does come off when well played. 4 tunes are genuine German student songs; the others are of the composer's own creation.

Brahms Strolling

There followed the first performance in Boston of any Henze, once described as the greatest hope of the post-war German composers. Long ago he passed that "White Hope" description with his five symphonies, eight operas, four cantatas and three ballets, as well as several instrumental concerti and orchestral suites.

His first symphony was composed in 1947 for full orchestra, but the version presented yesterday was that of 1963, for chamber orchestra. It is in the serial format, though not strictly twelve-toned, and completely listenable. As for the performance it was thoroughly the peer of the composer's own, recorded by DGG with the Berlin Philharmonic.

After the interval, there was a rousing performance of the symphonic suite "Sheherazade" (Op. 35), by Rimsky-Korsakoff. It had not been presented by the BSO for 21 years.

Why this should be is easily explained, for the orchestral tricks are as old as a cossack's moth-eaten busby. When "Sheherazade" was first presented in 1888, it made a profound impace, but since Stravinsky, Respighi and the Hollywooden decompositors took over its orchestral tricks, it has become horribly dated.

"Sheherazade" required, for 75% of its effectivene ss, a batteary of first-desk players of consummate virtuosity. Above all, in the personating of the herione, was Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, but the oboe, bassoon, trombone, French horn, clarinet also were superb. However, this music is not for the concert hall, but the ballet theater, where it is unzipped, with the corset off.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900
OCT 25 1967
New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Symphony Hall Debuts

By Peter M. Knapp

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, is taking his first turns directing the orchestra in Symphony Hall.

Wilson is not exactly a beginner apprenticed to Erich Leinsdorf; he has had six years' conducting experience with the New York City Opera Company and has been chorus master for the Philadelphia Lyric Opera Company. He has made an excellent impression through his preparation of choruses at Tanglewood this summer.

Wilson has a number of obvious assets, including an ability to draw a clear, lean sound from the orchestra much of the time, to get sharp, decisive rhythms, and crisp attacks and releases. He does, though, have a considerable way to go in experience with an orchestra. He overconducts, and in his podium contortions and arm-flapping outdoes even Leinsdorf, who is more graceful about it.

His program last night began with Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, continued with Hans Werner Henze's Symphony No. 1, and concluded with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade." The Brahms was capably handled, though somewhat stiff and raw-boned.

Henze Symphony

Henze's symphony presents new material for Symphony-goers. Although Henze has a big reputation in Europe, his works have been rarely performed in the United States. He is an interesting composer, prolific, leaning toward theatrical rather than purely instrumental compositions, a musician working within traditional forms using 20th century harmonic language (the 12-tone system) with a highly-individual way of mixing instrumental sounds. He is something of an eclectic, yet has passed the point of mere derivation.

Henze's First Symphony (of five) was written in 1947. He later called it "an utter failure," and rewrote it for chamber orchestra in 1963, "reorganizing the material, attempting to reconstruct what I had originally intended; acting like a teacher helpfully correcting his pupils."

Atmospheric 'Notturno'

In three succinct movements, the symphony fits a tight, related structure in which basic motifs recur in different guises in all three movements. Henze is fond of counterpoint and romantically-inclined lyricism. The "Notturno" of the second movement is a lovely musical moment, framed by trademark woodwind chords in tight intervals, spiced by muted trumpets, and featuring delightful duets for flute and violin, flute and viola.

In the finale, the material becomes atomized in percussine fragments in complex rhythmic patterns a la Stravinsky. In programming this piece, Wilson showed enterprise. However, the performance was not entirely fluent — the Notturno making the best impression — the first movement was somewhat muddled and the tempo was on the quick side.

"Sheherazade" had its moments of freshness and vigor, notably in the latter part of the second movement, and featured elegant violin solos by Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein. But it, too, had awkward moments and times when the interpretation seemed coarse.

8

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 340,000

OCT 7 1967 New England Newsclip

THE SYMPHONY

Wilson in Debut on Podium

By McLAREN HARRIS

"I am by nature somewhat conservative," said Charles Wilson recently. "I am more concerned about communication with an audience than about considerations as such." At the assistant conductor's official debut on the podium at Friday's Symphony, we found out that as he preaches, he practices.

Wilson chose three works for this week: Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, perhaps out of a touch of personal nostalgia; Hans Werner Henze's Symphony No. 1 (a Boston first), partly because he just plain likes it; and Scheherezade by Rinsky-Korsakov, for that factor of communication. The idioms are varied but not diametric opposites, and the conductor held a secure rein over all three.

Neat Approach

Wilson's approach with the baton is neat and methodical. His motions are economical, though never to the point of allowing his ensemble to fend for itself; his beats are distinct, his cues clear and his general manner unhurried. His guidance was sufficient to deal with all contingencies from extracting clarity from the staggered accents in the Brahms overture to controlling a runaway tambourine in Schherezzade.

As the results were calm and collected, it must also be said that the results were rather unspectacular. Brahms' overture was worked out more in the manner of an exercise than a festive piece. There was not much lightness in the tempos, insufficient dynamic contrast and not enough bite in the dotted rhythms.

Linear Fashion

Yet lack of spectacle has a positive side, for I suspect that Henze's First Symphony is no more pretentious than Wilson made it out to be. Originally composed in 1947, the work was revised in 1963 downward almost to chamber orchestra proportions. It eschews the avangarde technique of tonal incidence, working motives of softly-dissonant second and seventh intervals into lyric lines only

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Wilson conducting, presented the second program of the 87th season Friday at Symphony Hall.

Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80	Brahms
Symphony No. 1	Henze
Scheherazade, Op. 35	Rimsky-Korsakov

moderately angular, often diatonic.

Henze lets us hear his work harmonically as well as in a linear fashion. His polytonal concurrences and juxtapositions or triads are saved from muddiness by light and balanced orchestration — muted strings for the nocturne-like second section, splashes of brass and woodwind color in the energetic finale. Not spectacle, Henze's work is unified and polished, an alliance of sense and sensitivity.

Whatever the orchestra's rendition of Scheherezade lacked in passionate fire, it nevertheless served to remind us that Rimsky-Korsakov meant it primarily as a symphonic creation, the programmatic significance being a more oblique

Certainly the violin cadenzas, interjected brass fanfares, augmented-second melodic modes and lyric tenderness contribute to a mood of Oriental fantasy; but Scherezade sacrifices nothing in traditional elements of formal organization or taste in orchestration.

Its cyclic use of themes binds the movements into a tightly-unified whole, and the variation of texture and mood provides sufficient dramatic impulse to be understood without extra-musical motivation. Arabic in inspiration, perhaps, but European in discipline; and if Charles Wilson made Scherezade no world-beater, he kept it intelligible.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf returns to conduct excerpts from Beethoven's ballet music, "Prometheus"; Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, Op. 42 with Rita Bouboulidi as soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

OCT 7 1967 New England Newsclip

Charles Wilson's debut and . . .

. . . a Henze première

By Harold Rogers

Yesterday Charles Wilson achieved the dream of all understudies—a whack at the leading role. As associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, he is understudy to Erich Leinsdorf. And Mr. Leinsdorf has graciously turned over a weekend to Mr. Wilson, who is doubtless, as a young conductor, grateful for the compliment.

He is a man of ability. He is no grandstander; his technique is neat and clean; his lithe figure is graceful in non-Terpsichorean ways. Yet it was soon evident, after he had opened with the Brahms "Academic Festival" Overture, that the musicians were going to play with that devil-may-care insouciance they generally reserve for the Pops.

Possible causes

This may have been due to one of two reasons or a little of both: lack of respect on behalf of the musicians for the second man, or Mr. Wilson's inexperience in maintaining a disciplined control.

Whatever the cause, precision was not always the order of the day, and crescendos had a way of spilling over like water when the waiter puts too much in the glass too soon.

Easy atonality

To Mr. Wilson we owe the first Boston performance of the Symphony No. 1 by Hans Werner Henze, one of the two major forces today in the avant garde of Germany's younger composers. The other is Karlheinz Stockhausen.

Mr. Henze composed his symphony in 1947 when he was 21; then in 1963 he revised the score to bring it more in line with his maturing style.

Cast in three movements for small orchestra, the work sounds neoclassical in an easy atonal way—something of a marriage, one might say, of Stravinsky and Schoenberg. It surely employs a Stravinskian orchestra — bright colors, peppery rhythms, clear melodies that leap out of the tapestry and then quickly plow under again. But the fabric itself is largely Schoenbergian — nontonal, astringent, acerb in a lyrical fashion.

All in all, it was pleasant listening, and Mr. Wilson guided the musicians through a commendable reading.

For his final selection Mr. Wilson revived a score I never expected to hear in revival at Symphony Hall — Rimsky-Korsakov's chestnut, "Shéhérazade." Here again the ensemble left something to be desired, yet the individual soloists all turned in elegant performances, especially Joseph Silverstein when his liquid fiddle played the role of Shéhérazade's tongue as she told her science-fiction tales for 1001 nights.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

NOV 3 1967 New England Newsclip

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases With New Conductor

Charles Wilson, newly-appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had his evening of acclaim by the Providence audience Thursday in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

His aplomb on the podium is persuasive to his musicians more than dynamic, and their response gave the music of Brahm and Rimsky-Korsakov an enchantment that held the large audience fascinated. To the audience, his mannerisms are gently convincing and admirably discreet. They responded with prolonged applause.

As often as we hear the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture" it is still a treat to hear these Bostonians phase and emphasize the gaiety and wit of the "collegiate" songs of the students of Breslau University in Brahms' day. Embellishing the folk simplicity of those tunes with golden bass chords against the silver and crystal of the woodwinds and strings, it becomes more than just an overture; almost an anthem.

It was the closing work on the program, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade" supposedly depicting the 1001 Nights Arabian tales, that brought rapture to the listeners with the "tales" narrated, supposedly, by the solo violin, flute, horn, oboes and bassoons. The horn and flute in dialogue, building the tension of the stories, the solo violin whispering the "cliff-hanging" suspense, and the glorious chords of the entire orchestra, brought memories of Ali Baba and the 40 Thieves and Sinbad the Sailor.

The beautiful third movement, andantino quasi allegretto, evoked visions of the dancers of the seraglio, and you feel that if the voice of the Sultana was as soothing and persuasive as the music, no wonder the Sultan allowed her to remain alive for 1001 Nights.

Served between the Academic Festival Overture and Sheherazade was Henze's "Symphony No. 1." Beginning with the first movement, allegretto con grazia, it was neither allegretto (happy) nor gracious. There was no motion or connection to the thin, squealing, disjointed harmonies in the woodwinds, nor any purpose in the tub-thumping on the tympani. When all the instruments played, they disputed each other in pitch and rhythm.

There was one moment of suspense. Just before the second movement, which was marked Lento (Notturno) (nocturnal), there was a single sound of a slap which may have been an accidental falling of a book or folio. It sounded like a shoe dropped on the floor. This built the suspense, waiting for the other shoe to drop, and was the only clue that the mood was nocturnal.

THURS A - II

9

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

First Program

Thursday evening 26 October at 8.30

BEETHOVEN

Suite from the ballet Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus op. 43

Overture: Adagio – Allegro molto con brio
Pastorale: Allegro – March: Allegro
Adagio – Andante quasi allegretto
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JULES ESKIN cello
GINO CIOFFI clarinet
Finale: Allegretto – Allegro molto – Presto

WAGNER

Tannhäuser – Overture

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY

Symphony no. 6 in B minor op. 74 Pathétique

Adagio; allegro
Allegro con grazia
Allegro molto vivace
Finale: Adagio lamentoso

There are recordings of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony by the Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Newark Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 275,716 SUN. 427,240

OCT 23 1967

Boston Symphony

Fine Concert By Leinsdorf

By ALAN BRANIGAN

Should an orchestra play old chestnuts? Most decidedly, if the playing is as elegant, expressive and thoroughly likeable as the performance turned in Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The event, one of the Moe Septee concert series, was held in Symphony Hall in the presence of an overflow house more than 3,500 strong.

"Chestnut" is perhaps not the exact word for the suite from the ballet, "Prometheus," by Beethoven, which headed the program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The work is rarely heard, with the exception of the famous overture, one of the prettiest pieces in the Beethoven catalogue.

Music for Cello

It turned out to be lovely, entertaining music, especially in a six-eight time section scored for harp, cello (beautifully played by Jules Eskin) and flute (ditto Doriot Dywer). The interweaving melodic strains were a delight. For the rest, it seemed to be a hodge-podge of pieces Beethoven used other places, as in the "Eroica" Symphony and the "Contra Dances." The effect throughout was ravishing.

Next came a genuine old warhorse, Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture, a favorite of park bands for many a long year. But to hear it as Leinsdorf and his immense orchestra put it together was to get a totally new impression of its form, its harmonic beauties, its intensity and emotional force.

The hymn-like chorale on horns and bassoons was as stately and spiritual as one could wish, a complete contrast to the following section depicting wild happenings at the Venusberg. The themes went sizzling along, sensuous in texture and pagan in their abandon. And the climax was an organ-like paean, as the brass roared out the hymn and the strings tirelessly poured forth their serpentine accompaniments. Altogether, a triumph, for Leinsdorf — and Wagner.

Exciting Work

Next and last on the old timers' parade was Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, the "Pathetique," which Leinsdorf conducted this summer in Tanglewood, with great success. There was the same puzzling rubato in the lyrical sections and such a frantic racket in the scherzo that the audience broke down and applauded just from sheer excitement.

But these were minor facets in a fascinating and memorable reading. Just the string tone alone, shimmering and richly shaded, would have carried the piece, especially in the weird five-four time section, like a broken-legged waltz, or the sobbing, desolate chord progressions of the finale.

But there were also great moments in the rest of the orchestra, especially the clarinet, percussion, horns and trombones. The tuba, especially was heard to great advantage in this hall's fine bass response.

Maybe the old favorites are not so bad, after all.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS PRESS
W. 4,500

OCT 26 1967

Music by Sellars

by James Sellars

Seth Faison gave Eric Leinsdorf a gold baton last Thursday night to commemorate the Boston Symphony's 80th consecutive year at the Brooklyn Academy. Mr. Faison gave the baton on behalf of the governing committee of the Academy and Mr. Leinsdorf accepted, with a touching, though perhaps not as extemporaneous as it sounded, speech on the Symphony's behalf. Unfortunately the program added little to complement the festive evening. It opened with the symphonist Beethoven's ballet music, PROMETHEUS, included the ballet composer Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, and the opera composer Wagner's orchestral selections from DIE MEISTERSINGER. Music history has lavished today's music lovers with at least five or six distinct periods of music, therefore I contest programs of three scoops of sherbet. It is not that I didn't enjoy this program — I did, but I would have enjoyed any one of these three pieces more had they been set in relief by a baroque, classical, or newer work.

When judging the performance, remember that we are speaking of the Boston Symphony and their playing is always excellent. What degree of excellence, is the only valid approach. PROMETHEUS is not difficult music, nor great Beethoven, and certainly does not consternate the Bostonians. The brass balance was bad in the Wagner and Tchaikovsky; the tuba much too overpowering. Me ears head the bass line as the melody during the MEISTERSINGER theme. In the forte chord that opens the development section in the Tchaikovsky, the tuba forte fooomph usurped all of the harmony and punch. There was also a lack of precision on the playing of the afterbeats in the allegro following the symphony's introduction, but accurate playing in this section is like throwing dice; the lucky seven doesn't always come up. The playing of the last movement was perfection. The right rubato and expression attended every phrase . . .

THURS A - I

9

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

First Program

Thursday evening 26 October at 8.30

BEETHOVEN

Suite from the ballet Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus op. 43

Overture: Adagio – Allegro molto con brio
Pastorale: Allegro – March: Allegro
Adagio – Andante quasi allegretto
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JULES ESKIN cello
GINO CIOFFI clarinet
Finale: Allegretto – Allegro molto – Presto

WAGNER

Tannhäuser – Overture

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY

Symphony no. 6 in B minor op. 74 Pathétique

Adagio; allegro
Allegro con grazia
Allegro molto vivace
Finale: Adagio lamentoso

There are recordings of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony by the Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Newark Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 275,716 SUN. 427,240

OCT 23 1967

Boston Symphony

Fine Concert By Leinsdorf

By ALAN BRANIGAN

Should an orchestra play old chestnuts? Most decidedly, if the playing is as elegant, expressive and thoroughly likeable as the performance turned in Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The event, one of the Moe Septee concert series, was held in Symphony Hall in the presence of an overflow house more than 3,500 strong.

"Chestnut" is perhaps not the exact word for the suite from the ballet, "Prometheus," by Beethoven, which headed the program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The work is rarely heard, with the exception of the famous overture, one of the prettiest pieces in the Beethoven catalogue.

Music for Cello

It turned out to be lovely, entertaining music, especially in a six-eight time section scored for harp, cello (beautifully played by Jules Eskin) and flute (ditto Doriot Dywer). The interweaving melodic strains were a delight. For the rest, it seemed to be a hodge-podge of pieces Beethoven used other places, as in the "Eroica" Symphony and the "Contra Dances." The effect throughout was ravishing.

Next came a genuine old warhorse, Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture, a favorite of park bands for many a long year. But to hear it as Leinsdorf and his immense orchestra put it together was to get a totally new impression of its form, its harmonic beauties, its intensity and emotional force.

The hymn-like chorale on horns and bassoons was as stately and spiritual as one could wish, a complete contrast to the following section depicting wild happenings at the Venusberg. The themes went sizzling along, sensuous in texture and pagan in their abandon. And the climax was an organ-like paean, as the brass roared out the hymn and the strings tirelessly poured forth their serpentine accompaniments. Altogether, a triumph, for Leinsdorf — and Wagner.

Exciting Work

Next and last on the old timers' parade was Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, the "Pathetique," which Leinsdorf conducted this summer in Tanglewood, with great success. There was the same puzzling rubato in the lyrical sections and such a frantic racket in the scherzo that the audience broke down and applauded just from sheer excitement.

But these were minor facets in a fascinating and memorable reading. Just the string tone alone, shimmering and richly shaded, would have carried the piece, especially in the weird five-four time section, like a broken-legged waltz, or the sobbing, desolate chord progressions of the finale.

But there were also great moments in the rest of the orchestra, especially the clarinet, percussion, horns and trombones. The tuba, especially was heard to great advantage in this hall's fine bass response.

Maybe the old favorites are not so bad, after all.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS
PRESS
W. 4,500

OCT 26 1967

Music by Sellars

by James Sellars

Seth Faison gave Eric Leinsdorf a gold baton last Thursday night to commemorate the Boston Symphony's 80th consecutive year at the Brooklyn Academy. Mr. Faison gave the baton on behalf of the governing committee of the Academy and Mr. Leinsdorf accepted, with a touching, though perhaps not as extemporaneous as it sounded, speech on the Symphony's behalf. Unfortunately the program added little to complement the festive evening. It opened with the symphonist Beethoven's ballet music, PROMETHEUS, included the ballet composer Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, and the opera composer Wagner's orchestral selections from DIE MEISTERSINGER. Music history has lavished today's music lovers with at least five or six distinct periods of music, therefore I contest programs of three scoops of sherbet. It is not that I didn't enjoy this program — I did, but I would have enjoyed any one of these three pieces more had they been set in relief by a baroque, classical, or newer work.

When judging the performance, remember that we are speaking of the Boston Symphony and their playing is always excellent. What degree of excellence, is the only valid approach. PROMETHEUS is not difficult music, nor great Beethoven, and certainly does not consternate the Bostonians. The brass balance was bad in the Wagner and Tchaikovsky; the tuba much too overpowering. Me ears head the bass line as the melody during the MEISTERSINGER theme. In the forte chord that opens the development section in the Tchaikovsky, the tuba forte fooomph usurped all of the harmony and punch. There was also a lack of precision on the playing of the afterbeats in the allegro following the symphony's introduction, but accurate playing in this section is like throwing dice; the lucky seven doesn't always come up. The playing of the last movement was perfection. The right rubato and expression attended every phrase . . .

10

FRI-SAT – IV / TUES B – II

Fourth Program

Friday afternoon 27 October at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening 28 October at 8.30

JORGE MESTER guest conductor

VERDI

Les vêpres siciliennes – Overture

First performance at these concerts

STRAUSS

Don Quixote op. 35

Introduction; Theme with variations; Finale

JULES ESKIN cello
BURTON FINE viola

INTERMISSION

RAVEL

Le tombeau de Couperin

Prélude
Forlane
Menuet
Rigaudon

BARTOK

Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin op. 19

The concert will end at about 3.45 on Friday and at about 10.15 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

OCT 19 1967 New England Newsclip

3 Maestros Lead Next Week's BSO Concerts

The Symphony Hall next week three conductors will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson conducts on Tuesday evening, Oct. 24, Erich Leinsdorf on Thursday, Oct. 26 and guest conductor Jorge Mester conducts at the Friday-Saturday performances, Oct. 27 and 28.

For his programs next weekend Mr. Mester has invited two of the Orchestra's principal players, Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello, to be soloists in performances of Don Quixote by Strauss. Programs will also include the Overture to Verdi's I vepri Siciliani, Le tombeau de Couperin by Ravel and the Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin by Bartok.

Tuesday evening's, Oct. 24 concert under the direction of Charles Wilson will include Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Symphony No. 1 by Henze and Rimsky-Kossakov's Sheherazade.

For Thursday's Oct. 26 concert Mr. Leinsdorf will include excerpts from Beethoven's ballet music, Prometheus, the orchestral excerpts from Die Meistersinger by Wagner and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6.

Second Program

Tuesday evening 31 October at 7.30

JORGE MESTER guest conductor

VERDI

Les vêpres siciliennes – Overture

First performance in this series

STRAUSS

Don Quixote op. 35

Introduction; Theme with variations; Finale

JULES ESKIN cello
BURTON FINE viola

INTERMISSION

RAVEL

Le tombeau de Couperin

Prélude
Forlane
Menuet
Rigaudon

BARTOK

Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin op. 19

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

OCT 28 1967 New England Newsclip

Too Much Sound, Too Little Thought in a Flashy Program

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

The ARTS

Jorge Mester, a conductor from Mexico, is director of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra. Friday in Symphony Hall he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert of glittering show-off pieces which might have come off if he had not tried so hard to make them flashy.

The old saw about "impulsive Latin nature" might be dredged up to explain the peculiarities of Mester's conducting — extreme changes of dynamics and tempo occurring in usual and not so usual places, and a preference for melodic vehemence as opposed to other musicianly virtues.

The superficiality of the guest conductor's approach to the works he performed can hardly be explained by geography.

He applied all the better-known means of emphasis to music whose excellence lies in the art of its rhetoric. To make a big splash with it, one must observe the written amenities.

The overture from Verdi's "I Vespri Siciliani" was most susceptible to Mester's touch, and provided the ten most satisfying minutes of the afternoon.

Strauss's imposing "Don Quixote" music also was sufficiently expansive and romantic to absorb Mester's innovations without mortal damage, although the playing got pretty sloppy in the fast parts, and a lot of contrapuntal felicity was passed by in the rush.

First cellist Jules Eskin and principal Violist Burton Fine, seated at stage front as soloists, contributed some of the brightest moments of the performance. Eskin's tone was marvelously strong, and could be heard clearly throughout the piece, but his interpretation was a little too self-effacing and colorless and he tended to slide between notes. Fine brought a strong, smooth tone from his viola, and used it to project his solos with briskness and angularity, virtues neglected elsewhere as Mester sought to make Strauss's spiky outbursts flow.

Problems of musicianship dogged "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a quiet but tricky neo-classic suite by Ravel. No two wind soloists agreed in interpretation of the beat (some siimply had trouble keeping up with Mester's tempo), and attention to dynamics was on the cavalier side. The music is lovely when these things are done correctly.

The rhythmic backbone of Bartok's "Miraculous Mardarin Suite" was broken in several places and the fast tempos were frenetic.

More regrettable than Mester's superficial habits was the fact that his objectives were pursued at the expense of the solid playing and secure ensemble which could have made the showcase pieces really spectacular.

10

FRI-SAT-IV / TUES B-II

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program

Friday afternoon 27 October at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening 28 October at 8.30

JORGE MESTER guest conductor

VERDI

Les vêpres siciliennes – Overture

First performance at these concerts

STRAUSS

Don Quixote op. 35

Introduction; Theme with variations; Finale

JULES ESKIN cello
BURTON FINE viola

INTERMISSION

RAVEL

Le tombeau de Couperin

Prélude
Forlane
Menuet
Rigaudon

BARTOK

Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin op. 19

The concert will end at about 3.45 on Friday and at about 10.15 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 26,000
OCT 19 1967
New England Newsclip

3 Maestros Lead Next Week's BSO Concerts

The Symphony Hall next week three conductors will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson conducts on Tuesday evening, Oct. 24, Erich Leinsdorf on Thursday, Oct. 26 and guest conductor Jorge Mester conducts at the Friday-Saturday performances, Oct. 27 and 28.

For his programs next weekend Mr. Mester has invited two of the Orchestra's principal players, Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello, to be soloists in performances of Don Quixote by Strauss. Programs will also include the Overture to Verdi's I vepri Siciliani, Le tombeau de Couperin by Ravel and the Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin by Bartok.

Tuesday evening's, Oct. 24 concert under the direction of Charles Wilson will include Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Symphony No. 1 by Henze and Rimsky-Kossakov's Sheherazade.

For Thursday's Oct. 26 concert Mr. Leinsdorf will include excerpts from Beethoven's ballet music, Prometheus, the orchestral excerpts from Die Meistersinger by Wagner and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Tuesday evening 31 October at 7.30

JORGE MESTER guest conductor

VERDI

Les vêpres siciliennes – Overture

First performance in this series

STRAUSS

Don Quixote op. 35

Introduction; Theme with variations; Finale

JULES ESKIN cello
BURTON FINE viola

INTERMISSION

RAVEL

Le tombeau de Couperin

Prélude
Forlane
Menuet
Rigaudon

BARTOK

Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin op. 19

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 231,100
OCT 28 1967
New England Newsclip

Too Much Sound, Too Little Thought in a Flashy Program

The ARTS

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

Jorge Mester, a conductor from Mexico, is director of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra. Friday in Symphony Hall he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert of glittering show-off pieces which might have come off if he had not tried so hard to make them flashy.

The old saw about "impulsive Latin nature" might be dredged up to explain the peculiarities of Mester's conducting — extreme changes of dynamics and tempo occurring in usual and not so usual places, and a preference for melodic vehemence as opposed to other musicianly virtues.

The superficiality of the guest conductor's approach to the works he performed can hardly be explained by geography.

He applied all the better-known means of emphasis to music whose excellence lies in the art of its rhetoric. To make a big splash with it, one must observe the written amenities.

The overture from Verdi's "I Vespri Siciliani" was most susceptible to Mester's touch, and provided the ten most satisfying minutes of the afternoon.

Strauss's imposing "Don Quixote" music also was sufficiently expansive and romantic to absorb Mester's innovations without mortal damage, although the playing got pretty sloppy in the fast parts, and a lot of contrapuntal felicity was passed by in the rush.

First cellist Jules Eskin and principal Violist Burton Fine, seated at stage front as soloists, contributed some of the brightest moments of the performance. Eskin's tone was marvelously strong, and could be heard clearly throughout the piece, but his interpretation was a little too self-effacing and colorless and he tended to slide between notes. Fine brought a strong, smooth tone from his viola, and used it to project his solos with briskness and angularity, virtues neglected elsewhere as Mester sought to make Strauss's spiky outbursts flow.

Problems of musicianship dogged "Le Tombeau de Couperin," a quiet but tricky neo-classic suite by Ravel. No two wind soloists agreed in interpretation of the beat (some siimply had trouble keeping up with Mester's tempo), and attention to dynamics was on the cavalier side. The music is lovely when these things are done correctly.

The rhythmic backbone of Bartok's "Miraculous Mardarin Suite" was broken in several places and the fast tempos were frenetic.

More regrettable than Mester's superficial habits was the fact that his objectives were pursued at the expense of the solid playing and secure ensemble which could have made the showcase pieces really spectacular.

11

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
OCT 22 1967
New England Newsclip

Busy Week Ahead For The Symphony

A rarity will take place in Symphony Hall this week as three conductors will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Four concerts are scheduled with Charles Wilson conducting on Tuesday evening, music director Erich Leinsdorf Thursday and guest conductor Jorge Mester making his Boston debut with the orchestra at the Friday-Saturday performances.

Beginning his first season as musical director of the Louisville Symphony, Mexican-born Jorge Mester began his serious music studies in this country at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center where he was a violin student.

Later he studied conducting at the Music Center and received a Master's degree in conducting from Juilliard School of Music where he also served on the faculty. In 1965 he served as musical director for the PDQ Bach Series in New York. Mr. Mester conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time last summer at Tanglewood.

For his programs next weekend Mr. Mester has invited two of the orchestra's principal players, Burton Fine, viola and Jules Eskin, cello, to be soloists in performances of "Don Quixote" by Strauss. Also to be heard at these concerts will be the overture to Verdi's "I vespri Siciliani;" "Le tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, and the Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

Tuesday evening's concert under the direction of Charles Wilson will include: Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Symphony No. 1 by Henze, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sheherazade."

For Thursday's concert Mr. Leinsdorf will begin with excerpts from Beetoven's ballet Music, "Prometheus," and continue with the orchestral excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner. The concert will close with a perfromanec of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250
OCT 28 1967
New England Newsclip

Jorge Mester on Podium For Hub Debut With BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Jorge Mester, Mexican-born of Hungarian parentage) musical director of the Louisville Orchestra, made his local debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. He conducted the BSO for the first time at Tanglewood last summer.

High point of his well-chosen program undoubtedly was his concluding offering—Bela Bartok's "Wondrous Mandarin" (Op. 19) ballet suite, music heard in its entirety here last Spring in a danced presentation by the Opera Company of Boston. It is definitely not for squeamish matriarchs, who scurried out beforehand.

Bela Bartok

It tells a sordid, scaborous story of tramps in a hovel who persuade a strumpet to dance lasciviously to lure victims into their clutches. The principal dance concerns a mandarin who falls under her spell, but who thereupon casts his spell upon her only to die from wounds inclicted by the thugs.

This was an exemplary performance, eliciting all the savage brutality of this barbaric score which owes not a little to Stravinsky's "Springtime Sacrifice."

Curtain-raiser was Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers" overture, most symphonic of his few operatic preludes. It is etched dark colors with delicate melodies, giving way to a typically Italian march theme, forming a transition to the stretto ending the piece. Conducting was potent; there was surging dramatic impact in the disciplined orchestral execution.

Many musicologists regard "Don Quixote," Richard Strauss' 35th opus, as his most significant orchestral work. In these "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character," the tone-poet entered the more explicit field of program music, aiming to picture events.

There is a theme for the titular character, clear at first then becoming obscure and illogical, to show that he loses his sanity. The Don is depicted by a solo cello (Jules Eskin), while his faithful squire, Sancho Panza, is personated by the viola (Burton Fine).

Each variation treats of a single misadventure. Windmills are assaulted, with disastrous results, sheep bleat in full chorus until routed, pilgrims are dispersed as banditti. The blindfold ride through the air is propelled by the wind machine. Other episodes follow and, at the end, the knightly theme occurs in clarified for to show Don Quixote's return to reason and death.

Eskin did splendidly by the solo passages, Fine was agile and tonally impeccable, while Senor Mester contributed a reading of matchless clarity and profound dignity and penetration.

Maurice Ravel's own orchestral transcription of his "Tomb of Couperin" piano suite was the only letdown, for one missed the grace and lucidity so long part of the French instrumental tradition. It was a rather erratic exposition of music that requires delicacy and finesse. Surely it did not sound this way when Pierre Monteux led its American premiere with the BSO on Nov. 20, 1920.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
OCT 30 1967
New England Newsclip

everyone is welcome.

Jorge Mester at Symphony

By Craig Stinson

The program for Jorge Mester's local debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a pot-luck assortment — four stylistically unrelated compositions, three of them about equal in size though varying in specific gravity. There is nothing inherently wrong with this arrangement (after all, one can eat well at a pot-luck), but it was the kind of concert that leaves a reviewer wondering what to talk about first.

If soloists make the news, the most important item Friday afternoon was Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," for it featured two of the orchestra's own first-chair players. Jules Eskin, cellist, and Burton Fine, violist, represented knight and squire, respectively.

It was a sympathetic portrayal, in which Don Quixote emerged as a lovable fellow, despite a few unlovable sounds from the upper end of Mr. Eskin's instrument and the rhythmic inaccuracies of an errant tuba. The orchestra, under Mr. Mester's direction, provided generally strong support, with the brass section making a particularly fine band of bleating sheep.

'Miraculous Mandarin'

A more substantial musical treat, certainly a more uncommon one, was the suite from Bartok's "The Miraculous Mandarin." Program annotater James Lyons may be correct in calling the plot—love versus crime on the seamy side of the street—unsuitable for ballet. The concert suite, however, is one of the most effective pieces of modern dramatic music.

It is a difficult work, both of execution and comprehension. (A number of patrons testified to the latter by walking out of Symphony Hall before and during the performance.) But the young Mexican conductor kept it clear, controlled, and, at the same time, exciting in the extreme.

His reading of Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," on the other hand, was marred by lack of clarity. Unlike other orchestrated piano pieces, this one sounds best in the original version, since its beauty is more a matter of design than sonority. Still, an orchestra needn't cover the melodic lines so thoroughly as the Boston Symphony did in the Prelude. Mr. Mester's eccentricities of rubato in the Minuet only further obscured the classical character of the work.

The program began with an adequate performance of the Overture to Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers."

12 NOVEMBER

FRI – SAT IV – V

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program

Friday afternoon 3 November at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening 4 November at 8.30

KRAFT
Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra
Recitativo quasi senza misura
Allegro con brio
Cadenza e variazioni
EVERETT FIRTH — CHARLES SMITH
HAROLD THOMPSON — ARTHUR PRESS
THOMAS GAUGER
First performance in this version

MOZART
Symphony no. 36 in C major K. 425 'The Linz'
Adagio; Allegro spiritoso
Poco adagio
Menuetto
Presto

INTERMISSION

DVORAK
Romance for violin and orchestra op. 11
ITZHAK PERLMAN
First performance in Boston

TCHAIKOVSKY
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major op. 35
Allegro moderato
Canzonetta: Andante
Finale: Allegro vivacissimo
ITZHAK PERLMAN

Henryk Szeryng has recorded the Violin Concerto of Tchaikovsky with the Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch

The concert on Friday will end at about 4.05 and at about 10.35 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
NOV 6 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Announces Changes

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced changes in the orchestra's programs scheduled for Tuesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Rather than the previously announced Overture to Prometheus by Beethoven, the Tuesday and Thursday concerts will begin with William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion, a work already programmed for these concerts and performed for the first time in a new version at last week's Friday-Saturday concerts.

The Tuesday and Thursday programs will continue with Lilian Kallir as soloist in performances of Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 449 and conclude with Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

On Friday and Saturday Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with Mozart's Divertimento in D major, K. 205 continue with Webern's Variations, and these concerts will now end with Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7. The Haydn Symphony No. 79, announced for this weekend, will be heard at the concerts on Nov. 17 and 18.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400
NOV 6 1967
New England Newsclip

Perlman's violin sparks Symphony

By Harold Rogers

Erich Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony concerts over the weekend were marked by at least three points of interest, the most important being Itzhak Perlman's appearance as violin soloist.

Next in significance was the fact that Mr. Leinsdorf had dispensed with the use of risers on stage whereby the musicians are elevated in a kind of stadium seating. One had almost forgotten how well the orchestra sounds while on "le même niveau," as Charles Munch used to say. On Friday afternoon the orchestral balance was extraordinarily fine — the brasses sang out serenely without being all muffled in their stands, and the woodwinds sounded clear and untroubled. Hard to explain, of course, why this is so, but so it was, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Leinsdorf will now give orders to dispense with the risers forever.

Stunning timpanist

Third in importance was the Boston première of William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, a work evidently supposed to display the manifold effects possible to the battery. While it did no such thing (the effects, in fact, can hardly hold a candle to those devised by Bartók in his Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion) yet the piece had its pleasantries.

Since Mr. Kraft gave large sections to the marimba, the xylophone, and the glockenspiel, the piece generally sounded more melodic than percussive. It tinkled with other wordly nocturnal moods, punctuated from time to time with expostulations from the brass. There is some delightfully rhythmic fugal writing, plus some portions that churn with great activity, building both momentum and tension to an impressive finale.

Yet its final impression was of something neither terribly good nor terribly bad. More commendable than the piece itself was Everett Firth's stunning work on the timpani.

Already a giant

Mr. Perlman, a young Israeli violinist now only 22, is already an artist of the first order. He has both a gorgeous tone and magnificent powers of expression. He first played the Dvořák Romance for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 39, a piece of pretty writing that sings its simple yet heartfelt melody. And he then gave us a radiant traversal of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, filled with poetic insights and struck off with technical élan.

The presence of Mr. Perlman and the non-presence of the risers did much to offest the non-felt performance of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony. It was accurate, balanced, suave, and—let's face it—dull.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 9 1967
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO PERFORMS KRAFT CONCERTO

The first Boston performance of the Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra by William Kraft and Itzhak Perlman's reading of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto featured last weekend's Symphony program.

Tympanists turned composer seem constrained to memorialize their quondam calling with concert pieces for the battery. So too William Kraft, who heads the percussion section of the Los Angeles Symphony and who has sought to carry on the tradition in his longish composition, complete with three movements, five soloists and considerable embroidery in the orchestral accompaniment—veritably a Concerto Grosso.

The notion is provocative, but it does not wash. The scope of expression and sound of the percussion array is limited only less than, say, a duo for two piccolos, and the novelty of the various percussion sounds is effective only for about ten mintes or so. After that, it all begins to be reminiscent of the Sugar Plum Fairy Dance from the Nutcracker Suite, interspersed with some stunning perorations by the tympani. To be sure, there was a short combo-like jazz section in the middle which carried considerable potential, but Mr. Leinsdorf is not one to go after such moments with orgiastic abandon and the promise rather died aborning. The construction of the piece seemed securely knit, though, and the orchestral writing was occasionally effective, especially in the numerous contrapuntal passages. The work was especially rewritten for and played by the five Boston Symphony Orchestra percussionists, Everett Firth, Harold Thompson, Thomas Gauger, Charles Smith, Arthur Press, all of whom addressed themselves to their labors with seeming love and certainly with unflappable aplomb.

Then there was Itzhak Perlman. His performances of the Prokofieff Second and the Sibelius Concertos last year convinced many that this twenty-two year-old Israeli is destined to be one of the great violinists of the era, if he isn't already. This, of course, is no mean assertion but the performance of the Tchaikovsky last week-end was ample justification for it. This youngster's inventory so far seems to have everything, but a beautiful sound is its most salient endowment. That sound is silken, mellow and large, and it permeates the entire range of his violin. The Tchaikovsky has been in the refrigerator for nine years for local programming purposes, and it emerged from quasi-retirement as a remarkably sturdy and rich masterpiece of its genre.

Mr. Perlman did not ham it up with prolonged meditations here and lightening gymnastics there and kazatski-like flavorings elsewhere. On the contrary, his collaboration with Mr. Leinsdorf was notable for its straightforwardness and integrity a quality only too notable for its absence in so many renditions of this particular concerto.

The Tchaikovsky was preceded by the first local performance of Dvorak's Romance for Violin and Orchestra, op. 11. Like the present writer, probably precious few people in the audience even knew the work existed, let alone had ever heard it. Gentle, one-dimensional, typical early Dvorak, it displayed the marvelous Perlman sound to the fullest advantage.

On this rather curiously assorted program was Mozart's "Linz" Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf used a reduced orchestra. Correct balances, sharp edges and solidly shaped phrases there were. The true effervescence of spirit that permeates the great score, however, there was not.

This week the program includes Mozart's Divertimento in D major, K. 205, Webern's Variations Op. 30 and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E major. Mr. Leinsdorf will again conduct.

12 NOVEMBER

FRI – SAT V V

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program

Friday afternoon 3 November at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening 4 November at 8.30

KRAFT
Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra
Recitativo quasi senza misura
Allegro con brio
Cadenza e variazioni
EVERETT FIRTH — CHARLES SMITH
HAROLD THOMPSON — ARTHUR PRESS
THOMAS GAUGER
First performance in this version

MOZART
Symphony no. 36 in C major K. 425 'The Linz'
Adagio; Allegro spiritoso
Poco adagio
Menuetto
Presto

INTERMISSION

DVORAK
Romance for violin and orchestra op. 11
ITZHAK PERLMAN
First performance in Boston

TCHAIKOVSKY
Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major op. 35
Allegro moderato
Canzonetta: Andante
Finale: Allegro vivacissimo
ITZHAK PERLMAN

Henryk Szeryng has recorded the Violin Concerto of Tchaikovsky with the Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch

The concert on Friday will end at about 4.05 and at about 10.35 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 140,000
NOV 6 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Announces Changes

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced changes in the orchestra's programs scheduled for Tuesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Rather than the previously announced Overture to Prometheus by Beethoven, the Tuesday and Thursday concerts will begin with William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion, a work already programmed for these concerts and performed for the first time in a new version at last week's Friday-Saturday concerts.

The Tuesday and Thursday programs will continue with Lilian Kallir as soloist in performances of Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 449 and conclude with Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

On Friday and Saturday Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with Mozart's Divertimento in D major, K. 205 continue with Webern's Variations, and these concerts will now end with Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7. The Haydn Symphony No. 79, announced for this weekend, will be heard at the concerts on Nov. 17 and 18.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 6 1967
New England Newsclip

Perlman's violin sparks Symphony

By Harold Rogers

Erich Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony concerts over the weekend were marked by at least three points of interest, the most important being Itzhak Perlman's appearance as violin soloist.

Next in significance was the fact that Mr. Leinsdorf had dispensed with the use of risers on stage whereby the musicians are elevated in a kind of stadium seating. One had almost forgotten how well the orchestra sounds while on "le même niveau," as Charles Munch used to say. On Friday afternoon the orchestral balance was extraordinarily fine — the brasses sang out serenely without being all muffled in their stands, and the woodwinds sounded clear and untroubled. Hard to explain, of course, why this is so, but so it was, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Leinsdorf will now give orders to dispense with the risers forever.

Stunning timpanist

Third in importance was the Boston première of William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, a work evidently supposed to display the manifold effects possible to the battery. While it did no such thing (the effects, in fact, can hardly hold a candle to those devised by Bartók in his Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion) yet the piece had its pleasantries.

Since Mr. Kraft gave large sections to the marimba, the xylophone, and the glockenspiel, the piece generally sounded more melodic than percussive. It tinkled with other wordly nocturnal moods, punctuated from time to time with expostulations from the brass. There is some delightfully rhythmic fugal writing, plus some portions that churn with great activity, building both momentum and tension to an impressive finale.

Yet its final impression was of something neither terribly good nor terribly bad. More commendable than the piece itself was Everett Firth's stunning work on the timpani.

Already a giant

Mr. Perlman, a young Israeli violinist now only 22, is already an artist of the first order. He has both a gorgeous tone and magnificent powers of expression. He first played the Dvořák Romance for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 39, a piece of pretty writing that sings its simple yet heartfelt melody. And he then gave us a radiant traversal of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, filled with poetic insights and struck off with technical élan.

The presence of Mr. Perlman and the non-presence of the risers did much to offest the non-felt performance of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony. It was accurate, balanced, suave, and—let's face it—dull.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 9 1967
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO PERFORMS KRAFT CONCERTO

The first Boston performance of the Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra by William Kraft and Itzhak Perlman's reading of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto featured last weekend's Symphony program.

Tympanists turned composer seem constrained to memorialize their quondam calling with concert pieces for the battery. So too William Kraft, who heads the percussion section of the Los Angeles Symphony and who has sought to carry on the tradition in his longish composition, complete with three movements, five soloists and considerable embroidery in the orchestral accompaniment—veritably a Concerto Grosso.

The notion is provocative, but it does not wash. The scope of expression and sound of the percussion array is limited only less than, say, a duo for two piccolos, and the novelty of the various percussion sounds is effective only for about ten mintes or so. After that, it all begins to be reminiscent of the Sugar Plum Fairy Dance from the Nutcracker Suite, interspersed with some stunning perorations by the tympani. To be sure, there was a short combo-like jazz section in the middle which carried considerable potential, but Mr. Leinsdorf is not one to go after such moments with orgiastic abandon and the promise rather died aborning. The construction of the piece seemed securely knit, though, and the orchestral writing was occasionally effective, especially in the numerous contrapuntal passages. The work was especially rewritten for and played by the five Boston Symphony Orchestra percussionists, Everett Firth, Harold Thompson, Thomas Gauger, Charles Smith, Arthur Press, all of whom addressed themselves to their labors with seeming love and certainly with unflappable aplomb.

Then there was Itzhak Perlman. His performances of the Prokofieff Second and the Sibelius Concertos last year convinced many that this twenty-two year-old Israeli is destined to be one of the great violinists of the era, if he isn't already. This, of course, is no mean assertion but the performance of the Tchaikovsky last week-end was ample justification for it. This youngster's inventory so far seems to have everything, but a beautiful sound is its most salient endowment. That sound is silken, mellow and large, and it permeates the entire range of his violin. The Tchaikovsky has been in the refrigerator for nine years for local programming purposes, and it emerged from quasi-retirement as a remarkably sturdy and rich masterpiece of its genre.

Mr. Perlman did not ham it up with prolonged meditations here and lightening gymnastics there and kazatski-like flavorings elsewhere. On the contrary, his collaboration with Mr. Leinsdorf was notable for its straightforwardness and integrity a quality only too notable for its absence in so many renditions of this particular concerto.

The Tchaikovsky was preceded by the first local performance of Dvorak's Romance for Violin and Orchestra, op. 11. Like the present writer, probably precious few people in the audience even knew the work existed, let alone had ever heard it. Gentle, one-dimensional, typical early Dvorak, it displayed the marvelous Perlman sound to the fullest advantage.

On this rather curiously assorted program was Mozart's "Linz" Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf used a reduced orchestra. Correct balances, sharp edges and solidly shaped phrases there were. The true effervescence of spirit that permeates the great score, however, there was not.

This week the program includes Mozart's Divertimento in D major, K. 205, Webern's Variations Op. 30 and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E major. Mr. Leinsdorf will again conduct.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 4 1967
New England Newsclip

Percussion and Strings Featured by BSO

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

A percussion concerto of recent date and a popular violinist were featured at the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; in other respects, it was a routine afternoon under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

The percussion concerto, that written in 1964 by William Kraft, tympanist of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, is no monument of contemporary style, but it did bring the sounds and some of the procedures of today's music into Symphony Hall.

The piece filled too much time with faded orientalism and obvious serial manipulations, but for long stretches dwelt lovingly upon quiet prolongation of metal reverberations, and gave a glimpse into the world of subtle dying sounds which so much of today's music occupies.

The work was originally written for four soloists, but was rewritten for this performance to accommodate all five of the B.S.O.'s percussionists.. Everett Firth, Charles Smith, Harold Thompson, Arthur Press, and Thomas Gauger made Kraft's intriguing mixture of sounds expertly; Leinsdorf did well with the sometimes rudimentary orchestra part, except when the rhythms became lively.

The appearance on stage of paraplegic violinist Itzhak Perlman brought an immediate response from the audience, a response which grew stronger as he played Dvorak's brief Romance, Op. 11, and the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto.

Perlman plays with a strong phrase outline and a big tone, and is obviously a formidable violinist. But his tone is a little grainy by front-rank standards, and sudden rapid passages upset his intonation.

Leinsdorf countered Perlman's sweet, slow approach by conducting the orchestral passages of the Tchaikovsky briskly and emphatically, except in the slow movement, which took on a deep lyric glow.

The orchestra was reduced to 50 for Mozart's C major "Linz" symphony, but finer points of the style eluded Leinsdorf. Even the smaller group made too much sound.

Hurried Passages Mar Perlman Violin Playing

By McLAREN HARRIS

SYMPHONY

My first musical acquaintance with violinist Itzhak Perlman came last December when he performed the Prokofiev Second Concerto with the Symphony. It turned out to be a very happy occasion. His second appearance with the orchestra was last summer at Tanglewood and added weight to a rising reputation.

I am glad to have received these prior impressions, for they counterbalance his less-than-prodigious efforts with the Tchaikovsky Concerto on Friday. It is always dangerous to venture guesses about situations of under or over-preparation, but in the present case I suspect the latter. Perlman, who began with his characteristically serene tonal beauty, showed a tendency to hurry certain passages, especially more relaxed ones, as if they had sat with him to long and he was impatient.

TONE UNSETTLED

Without ample time for consideration, his tone became unsettled, his attacks occasionally scratchy and intonation leaaned toward the flat side. The tempos, too (which always come in for some liberty), were given more than their usual latitude, and each section of the first movement proceeded at a different pace. Perlman's cadenza was virtuosic excellence; he seemed to have been pointing toward it from the first note. His tonal opulence and lyric sense returned for the Canzonetta, winning us back for a while, but the finale brought back the roughness in even greater measure, if anything. Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra, reputed as fine accompanists, did their best, which was good—considering.

Incidentally, this was announced as an uncut performance. I was not armed with a score and spotted some, though not all, of the restored material. It apparently consists of rather brief spinning passages here and there in the first and last movements. Its presence or absence does not appreciably alter the concerto's balance or impact.

Mr. Perlman also performed Dvorak's Romance, Op. 39 (Op. 11 in the old system), and evoked much tenderness in its quiescent strains. The piece is based on the Andantino from the composer's early F minor Quartet; Sir Thomas Beecham would have labeled it a "lollipop."

The orchestra's percussionists — Everett Firth, Harold Thompson, Thomas Gauger, Charles Smith and Arthur Press—took over solo roles for the opening work, William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra. Kraft makes intelligent use of virtually the entire battery in his three hovements, using definite-pitch instruments (timpani, glockenspiel, xylophone, etc.) to distinct advantage and entrusting the rhythmic structure to the others. His effects are engagingly varied and his intentions are clear, from the opening unmeasured recitative through a catchy ostinato in the Allegro to the alternate percussion-and-orchestra variations of the finale. Kraft's work is still an esthetic question mark, for percussion instruments are by nature non-lyric and can muster only limited expression; nevertheless, the Concerto must be fun to play.

Talk about pointing to things. Mr. Leinsdorf's and the orchestra's aim toward the Dvorak and Tchaikovsky works was somewhat obvious throughout the first half. The orchestra's performance in Kraft's Concerto was now and then uncertain, convincing only in the brass. Mozart's Symphony No. 36, the "Linz," was given workmanship of only average quality. The The rhythms and attacks lacked punch and the strings had no sheen in the high end or robustness in the low. It was no failure, of course, for these are excellent musicians and can do amazing things even when bored; but Morzart deserves better.

Next week, in a program change, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Divertimento in D, K. 205; Webern's Variations, Op. 30; and the Bruckner Seventh Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 210,000
NOV 4 1967
New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 118,250
NOV 4 1967
New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900
NOV 8 1967
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950
NOV 5 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Sets Program of New Work

BOSTON — For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts next weekend, Friday and Saturday, Erich Leinsdorf will begin the concerts with a performance of the rarely heard Symphony No. 79 by Haydn, continuing with Variations by Webern.

Not Previously Played

The Haydn and Webern music have not been played previously by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The weekend concerts will conclude with The Divine Poem by Scriabin.

Later in the season Leinsdorf will schedule two other Haydn symphonies which are among the lesser known of the composer's works.

For the orchestra's concerts on the 7th, at 8:30 p.m. and Thursday at 8.30 p.m. Leinsdorf has invited pianist Lilian Kallir to play Mozart's Concerto, K. 449 with the orchestra.

These concerts will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Prometheus" and also include William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra which had its initial performances in a new version written especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's percussion section.

The Tuesday and Thursday programs will conclude with the Symphony No. 2 by Schumann. Thursday's concert will be the opening of the three-concert Series B programs, and Tuesday's will be the third of the Series A concerts.

The complete programs: Tuesday, the 7th, 8 30 p.m. and Thursday, the 9th, 8.30 p.m.

Beethoven, Overture to Prometheus

Mozart, Concerto for Piano and Orchestra: Lilian Kallir, soloist

Kraft, Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra: Everett Firth, Charles Smith, Harold Thompson, Arthur Press, Thomas Gauger

Schumann, Symphony No. 2

Friday afternoon, the 10th, 2 p.m. and Saturday evening, the 11th at 8.30 p.m.

Haydn, Symphony No. 79 in F Major.

Webern, Variations

Scriabin, The Divine Poem

Itzhak Perlman Violin Dominates at Symphony

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Itzhak Perlman, phenomenal Israeli virtuoso, dominated the latter part of yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Crippled by polio, this brilliant young violinist plays in a seated position.

It was the concluding offering, Tchaikovsky's desultory violin concerto (Op. 35, in D), which bestirred the greatest audience enthusiasm. It was played as originally written by the "Russian Weeper," without the customary cuts. In most performances a certain amount of repetitive material is eliminated, mainly from the finale, and many solo passages are altered so as to be more effective.

Itzhak Perlman

Only a veritable virtuoso can put this superficial, but brilliant, concerto across in a way that will make it wear with repeated hearings. That Perlman can do this was made distinctly apparent.

However, it is one of Tchaikovsky's less-distinguished scores, with only the delectable canzonetta of the slow movement to recommend it. The finale is the last word in technical brilliance, smacking of Russian leather and the lethal knout, with a haunting second theme, though the other two are rather conventional.

When played by a virtuoso who is technically proficient, equal to the challenge, this long movement evokes powerful effects. Perlman's playing of the rapid passages of the opening movement was a coruscating technical exposition.

Preceding the concerto, there was a BSO premeire —Antonin Dvorak's romance for violin and orchestra (Op. 39, in F minor, in the revised listing).

It is a charming morsel, dating from 1873, based upon the second movement of the Czech master's F-minor quartet. Performance left nothing to be desired either artistically or technically.

Curtain-raiser was the day's novelty, William Kraft's concerto for percussion and orchestra, originally composed for fewer percussion instruments by the Los Angeles Philharmonic's percussionist. It was reworked for the five members of the BSO's percussion battery—Everett Firth, principal tympanist, and Charles Smith, Harold Thompson, Arthur Press and Thomas Gauger. There is a wondrous rataplan of drums—kettle, assorted sizes, snare and bass, plus all manner of orchestral kitchen utensils. Yet, there is little sound and fury, reminding one of Harvard football cheers—loud enough to be heard but not loud enough to be vulgar.

Mozart's ebullient 36th symphony (KV-425, in C), nicknamed "Linz," was presented after the Kraftsman-like opus. It is a small work, both in proportions and style. Though scored for small orchestra, it has much of the atmosphere of a chamber work and demands great care in execution if its delicate and carefully calculated beauties are not to be vitiated in performance. Dr. Leinsdorf took good care to see that this did not happen; orchestral exposition was spirited and brisk.

The Sound of Music

More Than Rat-A-Tat

By Peter M. Knapp

The fellows at the rear of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a chance to come down front last night to demonstrate their skill on an imposing array of percussion instruments.

The occasion was the Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra by William Kraft, timpanist and head of the Los Angeles Philharmonic's percussion section, composer and conductor. Kraft's concerto, written in 1964 and premiered by his orchestra last March, was specially adapted for the Boston Symphony soloists.

Everett Firth, Charles Smith, Harold Thompson, Thomas Gauger and Arthur Press are instrumental specialists in their own right. They make up one of the finest percussion sections found anywhere, and Kraft's concerto gave them an opportunity not only to display their talents, but also the unique qualities of the various percussion, or struck, instruments.

More Than Rhythm

A lot of noisy battering? By no means. Kraft instead allows us to hear the varied melodic and aural qualities of glockenspiel, xylophone, vibraphone, chimes, timpani, even down to differently-pitched wood blocks, drums, cymbals. There is more than rhythm to a percussion section.

Kraft's concerto opens with a whirr of strings and a tinkling melody on the glockenspiel, moves through extensive interplay for the percussion group, introduces a brief fugal section for woodwinds spiced with brass interjections to a syncopated jazz beat, and concludes with a set of variations flanked by outbursts of timpani brilliantly played by Firth. An interesting and attractive work, through spare on the orchestral side.

Next on Erich Leinsdorf's program came Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 14 in E-flat, K. 449, for which Lilian Kallir was soloist. The concerto, written for Mozart's pupil Barbara von Ployer in 1784, is an intimate-scaled work and Leinsdorf achieved excellent results with his scaled-down forces — half on risers, the rest on stage level because of the space needed for the Kraft concerto.

Miss Kallir, wife of pianist Claude Frank, is an attractive brunette born in Prague of Austrian parents. Her best playing came in the second movement, where her phrasing created exceptionally well-modelled lines and continuity. In this movement, musicianship triumphed over the lack of tonal distinction.

Otherwise, her playing seemed to lack much character and grace of expression, through the notes fell crisply into place, and she was reticent to bring out the contributions of the left hand. The rondo movement, notable for its counterpoint and the customary Mozartian banter between soloist and orchestra, needed more sparkle and dash from the Steinway.

Leinsdorf concluded with a rather perfunctory version of Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C. Major in a performance that often was hard and hurried. The strings sounded steely, hard-edged even in Schumann's impassioned violin melodies in the third movement, where the first set of trills came through like the buzz from a metallic beehive. It was a relief to hear some smooth, mellow violin scales in the finale, but over-all the symphony produced the impression that no one really was emotionally involved.

14

TUES A - III / THURS B - I

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program

Tuesday evening 7 November at 8.30

KRAFT

Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra

Recitativo quasi senza misura
Allegro con brio
Cadenza e variazioni

EVERETT FIRTH — CHARLES SMITH
HAROLD THOMPSON — ARTHUR PRESS
THOMAS GAUGER

First performance in this series

MOZART

Concerto for Piano and Orchestra no. 14 in E flat K. 449

Allegro vivace
Andantino
Allegro ma non troppo

LILIAN KALLIR

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

SCHUMANN

Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61

Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio I; Trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

Miss Kallir plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

NOV 9. 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Doesn't Match Pianist in Concerto

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Filling gaps unaccountly left in the Boston Symphony's repertory over the years is one of the tasks Erich Leinsdorf has set himself as the orchestra's Music Director. A list of Mozart piano concertos never played by the Boston Symphony, or not played for 40, 60, 80 years, is dismayingly large, and so it came that the E flat Concerto, K.449, was heard for the first time at a Boston Symphony concert.

K.449 is short and it is one of the lightly scored concertos, with just pairs of oboes and horns added to strings, but it is anything other than a slight work. Even by Mozart's standards, it is melodically rich, and it is one of the concertos—the D minor is the most famous example—in which Mozart, after beautiful first and second movements, produces a finale that goes off onto a still higher level with a prodigal and absolutely dazzling display of wit and invention.

Lilian Kallir, who had previously played with the Symphony in Tanglewood though not in Boston, brought to the Concerto animation and a delicious grace as well as a sensitively inflected lyric line. She is not the sort of pianist to move about within the work possessively and with bold imaginativeness, and it seems to me that Mozart is really fulfilled in performance only when he is so treated; however, given this more reticent approach, the playing was lovely. Mr. Leinsdorf's contribution with the orchestra failed to match the pianist's vitality, and it was insufficiently integrated besides, indeed, often not even punctual.

The other works were repeats from earlier Friday-Saturday programs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting: Kraft: Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, with Everett Firth, Charles Smith, Harold Thompson, Arthur Press, and Thomas Gauger, soloists; Mozart: Piano Concerto in E flat, K.449, with Lilian Kallir, soloist; Schumann: Symphony No. 2 in C. Tuesday evening in Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

NOV 8 1967 New England Newsclip

Symphony Introduces Pianist

By McLAREN HARRIS

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose to introduce both pianist Lilian Kallir and Mozart's Concerto in E flat, K. 449, to their audiences last night in Boston.

While it may seem strange that a concerto of such a major composer should not enter the repertory of the Symphony until now, this happens from time to time. These works are simply overshadowed by greater musical monuments.

But Mozart himself was not inclined to slight the E flat Concerto; James Lyons' notes state that it was Mozart's first entry in his own thematic index.

K. 449 exists as an early example in which the piano emerges as an integral partner, not to say competitor, in the concerto's structure and expression. The double exposition, first for orchestra, then for piano, is in evidence. The protagonists share exchanges throughout the development, and thematic treatment in the finale is particularly expert.

There are tinges which lack Mozart's full maturity, of course: some of the phrasing is regular, even cut and dried, while the harmonic coloring has not the variety of later works. But the flashing arpeggios and rapid scale-work of the solo part must have impressed classical audiences, and they yet retain a measure of that original charm.

Miss Kallir (wife of another pianist, Claude Frank) demonstrated a poetic sensitivity, never for a moment taking Mozart's notes casually. Her care in dynamics and nuance in tempo were particularly engaging, adding overtones of cleverness to what could be otherwise stock phrasing.

This performance of a concerto which is not Mozart's most challenging should certainly whet the local audience's appetite to hear more of her.

The program's other works, William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra and the Schumann Symphony No. 2, were reviewed on previous occasions.

14

TUES A – III / THURS B – I

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program

Tuesday evening 7 November at 8.30

KRAFT

Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra

Recitativo quasi senza misura
Allegro con brio
Cadenza e variazioni

EVERETT FIRTH
HAROLD THOMPSON
THOMAS GAUGER

CHARLES SMITH
ARTHUR PRESS

First performance in this series

MOZART

Concerto for Piano and Orchestra no. 14 in E flat K. 449

Allegro vivace
Andantino
Allegro ma non troppo

LILIAN KALLIR

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

SCHUMANN

Symphony no. 2 in C major op. 61

Sostenuto assai; Allegro ma non troppo
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio I; Trio II
Adagio espressivo
Allegro molto vivace

Miss Kallir plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 231,100

NOV 9. 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Doesn't Match Pianist in Concerto

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Filling gaps unaccountly left in the Boston Symphony's repertory over the years is one of the tasks Erich Leinsdorf has set himself as the orchestra's Music Director. A list of Mozart piano concertos never played by the Boston Symphony, or not played for 40, 60, 80 years, is dismayingly large, and so it came that the E flat Concerto, K.449, was heard for the first time at a Boston Symphony concert.

K.449 is short and it is one of the lightly scored concertos, with just pairs of oboes and horns added to strings, but it is anything other than a slight work. Even by Mozart's standards, it is melodically rich, and it is one of the concertos—the D minor is the most famous example—in which Mozart, after beautiful first and second movements, produces a finale that goes off onto a still higher level with a prodigal and absolutely dazzling display of wit and invention.

Lilian Kallir, who had previously played with the Symphony in Tanglewood though not in Boston, brought to the Concerto animation and a delicious grace as well as a sensitively inflected lyric line. She is not the sort of pianist to move about within the work possessively and with bold imaginativeness, and it seems to me that Mozart is really fulfilled in performance only when he is so treated; however, given this more reticent approach, the playing was lovely. Mr. Leinsdorf's contribution with the orchestra failed to match the pianist's vitality, and it was insufficiently integrated besides, indeed, often not even punctual.

The other works were repeats from earlier Friday-Saturday programs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting: Kraft: Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, with Everett Firth, Charles Smith, Harold Thompson, Arthur Press, and Thomas Gauger, soloists: Mozart: Piano Concerto in E flat, K.449, with Lilian Kallir, soloist: Schumann: Symphony No. 2 in C. Tuesday evening in Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 210,000

NOV 8 1967 New England Newsclip

Symphony Introduces Pianist

By McLAREN HARRIS

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra chose to introduce both pianist Lilian Kallir and Mozart's Concerto in E flat, K. 449, to their audiences last night in Boston.

While it may seem strange that a concerto of such a major composer should not enter the repertory of the Symphony until now, this happens from time to time. These works are simply overshadowed by greater musical monuments.

But Mozart himself was not inclined to slight the E flat Concerto; James Lyons' notes state that it was Mozart's first entry in his own thematic index.

K. 449 exists as an early example in which the piano emerges as an integral partner, not to say competitor, in the concerto's structure and expression. The double exposition, first for orchestra, then for piano, is in evidence. The protagonists share exchanges throughout the development, and thematic treatment in the finale is particularly expert.

There are tinges which lack Mozart's full maturity, of course: some of the phrasing is regular, even cut and dried, while the harmonic coloring has not the variety of later works. But the flashing arpeggios and rapid scale-work of the solo part must have impressed classical audiences, and they yet retain a measure of that original charm.

Miss Kallir (wife of another pianist, Claude Frank) demonstrated a poetic sensitivity, never for a moment taking Mozart's notes casually. Her care in dynamics and nuance in tempo were particularly engaging, adding overtones of cleverness to what could be otherwise stock phrasing.

This performance of a concerto which is not Mozart's most challenging should certainly whet the local audience's appetite to hear more of her.

The program's other works, William Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra and the Schumann Symphony No. 2, were reviewed on previous occasions.

FRI - SAT VI VI

15

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program

Friday afternoon November 10 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 11 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART Divertimento in D major K. 205

Large - Allegro
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Finale: Presto

First performance at these concerts

WEBERN Variations op. 30

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 7 in E major

Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell - Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday
and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

NOV 11 1967

New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

.047

Awesome Gulf Separates Music of Webern, Bruckner

By McLAREN HARRIS

For more than 200 years Vienna has been generally considered the musical center of the Western world. Rightly so, for it has nurtured more of our best-loved composers, more styles and probably more musical innovations than any other: To make a specific example, what other city could have produced a pair of such opposite-minded composers as the two Antons—Webern and Bruckner?

Webern's Variations, Op. 30, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 both appear on the weekend's Symphony programs, and the gulf between them is indeed awesome. Webern was perhaps the world's most thorough musical economist. He based his compositions (excepting some early, uncharacteristic pieces, there are only 31 of them) on specific sets of tones, thence working them out in ingenious and extremely meticulous fashions. There is simply no extraneous materials in Webern's pieces, and when the working-out is complete they end. Thus the brevity of his works; the average length is under six minutes.

Only on Paper

I do not mean to imply that Bruckner said things in his symphonies that he had not intended or was unconscious of saying. He merely took much longer to say anything. In one respect Bruckner seems occasionally to ask for one thing and mean another. One hears the Seventh, for example, begin as a smoothly-eloquent Andante, then notices the tempo indication is Allegro moderato and can't believe it! Actually it's an Allegro only on paper; Bruckner gives the instruments whole notes, ties them together in strings, delivers the beats one to a measure and the effect is Andante.

But Andante or Allegro, it is a beautiful, viable and rich beginning, one whose spirit is sustained through the succeeding Adagio. In spite of its great length I enjoy that Adaio for the depth of its sonorities and the proportion marked by the triple-forte climax. I have never quite been able to reconcile the minor-key Scherzo with its predecessors, and the finale, although its mood is well-set, tends to make the entire symphony long-winded.

Erich Leinsdorf, whose reputation with Bruckner is secure, molded the dynamic outline of the first two movements into as strong-willed an expression as could be wished. Only in the finale did this control appear to escape him, causing a slightly anti-climactic conclusion; but maybe Bruckner had a hand in that. The orchestral work was superb throughout, save for an overly-prominent tuba near the end and careless violin bowing in the Adagio.

By the Book

The Variations have unassailable internal cohesion and beauty in certain tonal combinations and orchestration, they are not the most satisfying of Webern's work. I think it is that the beginning and end fail to give a sense of proportion to the whole. Webern's row, presented in four groups of three notes each, winds various paths in inverted patterns, reverse direction (retrograde), augmented or diminished note-values and ever-transparent scoring. But when it ends we have the feeling that the elapsed time ran out and Webern simply quit. Undoubtedly he was correct in his choices of the moment, for he knew what symmetry and balance were, yet he neglected to notify us by any means of dynamic marking, tempo change or tonal trait. As Webern might say, it's by the book.

Mozart's five-movement Divertimento in D. K. 205, opened the program. The cheerful outlook of its early movements seems to grow to positive distinction with even a tinge of heroism in the later ones as the pair of horns come to the fore. Until the final Presto the orchestra couldn't seem to stir more than a trifle of enthusiasm, a similar situation to last week's "Linz" Symphony. I hope this doesn't become a habit.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf, will conduct the Haydn Symphony No. 79 in F, Prokofiev's Concerto No. 4 with pianist John Browning, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D.

FRI - SAT VI VI

15

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program

Friday afternoon November 10 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 11 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART Divertimento in D major K. 205
Large - Allegro
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Finale: Presto

First performance at these concerts

WEBERN Variations op. 30

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 7 in E major
Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell - Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday
and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

NOV 11 1967

New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Awesome Gulf Separates Music of Webern, Bruckner

By McLAREN HARRIS

For more than 200 years Vienna has been generally considered the musical center of the Western world. Rightly so, for it has nurtured more of our best-loved composers, more styles and probably more musical innovations than any other. To make a specific example, what other city could have produced a pair of such opposite-minded composers as the two Antons—Webern and Bruckner?

Webern's Variations, Op. 30, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 both appear on the weekend's Symphony programs, and the gulf between them is indeed awesome. Webern was perhaps the world's most thorough musical economist. He based his compositions (excepting some early, uncharacteristic pieces, there are only 31 of them) on specific sets of tones, thence working them out in ingenious and extremely meticulous fashions. There is simply no extraneous materials in Webern's pieces, and when the working-out is complete they end. Thus the brevity of his works; the average length is under six minutes.

Only on Paper

I do not mean to imply that Bruckner said things in his symphonies that he had not intended or was unconscious of saying. He merely took much longer to say anything. In one respect Bruckner seems occasionally to ask for one thing and mean another. One hears the Seventh, for example, begin as a smoothly-eloquent Andante, then notices the tempo indication is Allegro moderato and can't believe it! Actually it's an Allegro only on paper; Bruckner gives the instruments whole notes, ties them together in strings, delivers the beats one to a measure and the effect is Andante.

But Andante or Allegro, it is a beautiful, viable and rich beginning, one whose spirit is sustained through the succeeding Adagio. In spite of its great length I enjoy that Adaio for the depth of its sonorities and the proportion marked by the triple-forte climax. I have never quite been able to reconcile the minor-key Scherzo with its predecessors, and the finale, although its mood is well-set, tends to make the entire symphony long-winded.

Erich Leinsdorf, whose reputation with Bruckner is secure, molded the dynamic outline of the first two movements into as strong-willed an expression as could be wished. Only in the finale did this control appear to escape him, causing a slightly anti-climactic conclusion; but maybe Bruckner had a hand in that. The orchestral work was superb throughout, save for an overly-prominent tuba near the end and careless violin bowing in the Adagio.

By the Book

The Variations have unassailable internal cohesion and beauty in certain tonal combinations and orchestration, they are not the most satisfying of Webern's work. I think it is that the beginning and end fail to give a sense of proportion to the whole. Webern's row, presented in four groups of three notes each, winds various paths in inverted patterns, reverse direction (retrograde), augmented or diminished note-values and ever-transparent scoring. But when it ends we have the feeling that the elapsed time ran out and Webern simply quit. Undoubtedly he was correct in his choices of the moment, for he knew what symmetry and balance were, yet he neglected to notify us by any means of dynamic marking, tempo change or tonal trait. As Webern might say, it's by the book.

Mozart's five-movement Divertimento in D. K. 205, opened the program. The cheerful outlook of its early movements seems to grow to positive distinction with even a tinge of heroism in the later ones as the pair of horns come to the fore. Until the final Presto the orchestra couldn't seem to stir more than a trifle of enthusiasm, a similar situation to last week's "Linz" Symphony. I hope this doesn't become a habit.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf, will conduct the Haydn Symphony No. 79 in F, Prokofiev's Concerto No. 4 with pianist John Browning, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D.

16

CAMBRIDGE II

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Tuesday evening November 14 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART Divertimento in D major K. 205
Largo - Allegro
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Finale: Presto

WEBERN Variations op. 30

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 7 in E major
Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell - Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 16 1967
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: ALT WIEN PANOPLY

Like Antolus touching the soil, Mr. Leinsdorf seems to find it necessary every so often to return to the great figures of his native Vienna for spiritual refreshment and musical inspiration. Such was the case in the most preeminent sense last weekend when the orchestra's offerings consisted of the Mozart Divertimento in D major, K 205, Webern's Variations, opus 30, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

The two works that vied with each other for overwhelming interest were one that takes just less than ten minutes and the other that takes just less than an hour and ten minutes. The Webern, the last of that small but fateful series that began with the Six Pieces a generation before it, concludes a spate of compositions that has had a stupefying effect upon composers of the present day. Indeed, it may be said that virtually everyone composing in series nowadays is employing just so many Webern cliches. Yet, the music of the master himself has for some reason remained almost taboo until very recently. Thus it was that the Six Pieces last year and the Variations on the instant occasion were both first performances locally.

What the art of Webern seeks to embody is now well known: total dissonance, a distillation of nuance which reaches the ultimate in concision and infinitely subtle hues of coloration. The question arises, how meaningful is the first statement after our myriad exposures to its followers? As with the Six Pieces last year, had I not known to whose music I was listening I would have left with the feeling that here on first acquaintance was another gifted exponent of a well known school and let it go at that.

It can be argued that if there had been scores of rehearsals and ample time to work out literally every note in terms of shading, attack, timbre and cohesion, the reactions of a listener like myself would be different, and that what we heard was, perforce, only adequate carpentry, not the infinitely painstaking craftsmanship of woodworking. The subject of Webern, it seems to me, is vital enough for some foundation to make a grant to provide sufficient rehearsal for performances to put that theory to the test.

There was no absence of craftsmanship in Mr. Leinsdorf's very strong performance of the Bruckner. The sprawling of the gigantic symphony was arrested with the firmest hand at numerous transition passages, particularly at those cluster points where Bruckner simply stops and changes direction. The orchestral sound was magnificent, with the brass standing to particular advantage in piling sonority upon sonority. One could differ here and there with Mr. Leinsdorf about some of his tempi — for example, there was the second theme in both the Adagio and the Scherzo — but no one could fail to apprehend the warmth and commitment and understanding that permeated his conception as a whole, nor the sparkling qualities of an infinity of detail. There is little doubt that Bruckner is one composer that Mr. Leinsdorf does as well as anyone around.

The Mozart Divertimento opened the program. Mostly a Mannheim-like occasion piece, yet with symphonic intimations peeping out everywhere, an incredible amount of Mozart boyhood genius lies in this work. Mr. Leinsdorf read it literally, which means that buoyancy and relaxation were the stiff price paid for clarity and balance. The strings were quite live throughout and one wonders what they could have done had they been allowed really to loosen up a bit.

This week's program includes Hadyn's Symphony No. 79 in F major, Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 and Dvorak's Sixth Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf is conducting and the piano soloist is John Browning.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250
NOV 11 1967
New England Newsclip

Bruckner's 7th Presentation

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Anton Bruckner's seventh symphony in E major concluded yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. His was a virile interpretation, lyrical and light in texture.

Triumph and victory are the principal characteristics of this monumental symphony, though, naturally, a work of such scope sounds the entire gamut of human emotions, from deep suffering to triumphant joy.

There are some moments when Bruckner's music seems transmuted into supramundane realms, defying description in words, requiring experience in performance. In return for these transcendental moments, anlytical listeners may spot a variety of weaknesses.

Bruckner Hails
Hans Richter

The notable adagio, which has been described as Bruckner's most celebrated symphonic movement, is played by five tubas, doubled by the lower strings. The finale ends with a triple fortissimo on the chief theme of the first movement, a poetic inspiration said to have come to the composer in a dream. Its climbing arpeggio discloses a world resembling Shelley's "crags and silver towers of battlemented clouds."

There was wondrous orchestral proficiency in the playing and a rich feeling for the organist-composer's craftmanship in Dr. Leinsdorf's devoted reading. There was implicit emphasis on the more dramatic portions of this noble score.

Curtain-raiser was Mozart's seventh divertimente (KV-205, in D), composed at Vienna in 1773. It is a charming place, with four light, gay movements encompassing one of the Swan of Salzburg's more beautiful slow movements. Dr. Leinsdorf offered a congenial conception of this music, with fine orchestral execution.

Sandwiched between this classical and romantic music was Anton von Webern's variations for orchestra (Op. 30), his last purely orchestral music, with austere 12-tone syntax and rapid coloristic changes. Details of construction are highly involved, with cabalistic London Times intellectualized crossword-puzzle scoring.

16

CAMBRIDGE II

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Tuesday evening November 14 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART Divertimento in D major K. 205

Largo - Allegro
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Finale: Presto

WEBERN Variations op. 30

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 7 in E major

Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell - Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

NOV 16 1967 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: ALT WIEN PANOPLY

Like Antolus touching the soil, Mr. Leinsdorf seems to find it necessary every so often to return to the great figures of his native Vienna for spiritual refreshment and musical inspiration. Such was the case in the most preeminent sense last weekend when the orchestra's offerings consisted of the Mozart Divertimento in D major, K 205, Webern's Variations, opus 30, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

The two works that vied with each other for overwhelming interest were one that takes just less than ten minutes and the other that takes just less than an hour and ten minutes. The Webern, the last of that small but fateful series that began with the Six Pieces a generation before it, concludes a spate of compositions that has had a stupefying effect upon composers of the present day. Indeed, it may be said that virtually everyone composing in series nowadays is employing just so many Webern cliches. Yet, the music of the master himself has for some reason remained almost taboo until very recently. Thus it was that the Six Pieces last year and the Variations on the instant occasion were both first performances locally.

What the art of Webern seeks to embody is now well known: total dissonance, a distillation of nuance which reaches the ultimate in concision and infinitely subtle hues of coloration. The question arises, how meaningful is the first statement after our myriad exposures to its followers? As with the Six Pieces last year, had I not known to whose music I was listening I would have left with the feeling that here on first acquaintance was another gifted exponent of a well known school and let it go at that.

It can be argued that if there had been scores of rehearsals and ample time to work out literally every note in terms of shading, attack, timbre and cohesion, the reactions of a listener like myself would be different, and that what we heard was, perforce, only adequate carpentry, not the infinitely painstaking craftsmanship of woodworking. The subject of Webern, it seems to me, is vital enough for some foundation to make a grant to provide sufficient rehearsal for performances to put that theory to the test.

There was no absence of craftsmanship in Mr. Leinsdorf's very strong performance of the Bruckner. The sprawling of the gigantic symphony was arrested with the firmest hand at numerous transition passages, particularly at those cluster points where Bruckner simply stops and changes direction. The orchestral sound was magnificent, with the brass standing to particular advantage in piling sonority upon sonority. One could differ here and there with Mr. Leinsdorf about some of his tempi — for example, there was the second theme in both the Adagio and the Scherzo — but no one could fail to apprehend the warmth and commitment and understanding that permeated his conception as a whole, nor the sparkling qualities of an infinity of detail. There is little doubt that Bruckner is one composer that Mr. Leinsdorf does as well as anyone around.

The Mozart Divertimento opened the program. Mostly a Mannheim-like occasion piece, yet with symphonic intimations peeping out everywhere, an incredible amount of Mozart boyhood genius lies in this work. Mr. Leinsdorf read it literally, which means that buoyancy and relaxation were the stiff price paid for clarity and balance. The strings were quite live throughout and one wonders what they could have done had they been allowed really to loosen up a bit.

This week's program includes Hadyn's Symphony No. 79 in F major, Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 and Dvorak's Sixth Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf is conducting and the piano soloist is John Browning.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

NOV 11 1967 New England Newsclip

Bruckner's 7th Presentation

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Anton Bruckner's seventh symphony in E major concluded yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. His was a virile interpretation, lyrical and light in texture.

Triumph and victory are the principal characteristics of this monumental symphony, though, naturally, a work of such scope sounds the entire gamut of human emotions, from deep suffering to triumphant joy.

There are some moments when Bruckner's music seems transmuted into supramundane realms, defying description in words, requiring experience in performance. In return for these transcendental moments, anlytical listeners may spot a variety of weaknesses.

Bruckner Hails
Hans Richter

The notable adagio, which has been described as Bruckner's most celebrated symphonic movement, is played by five tubas, doubled by the lower strings. The finale ends with a triple fortissimo on the chief theme of the first movement, a poetic inspiration said to have come to the composer in a dream. Its climbing arpeggio discloses a world resembling Shelley's "crags and silver towers of battlemented clouds."

There was wondrous orchestral proficiency in the playing and a rich feeling for the organist-composer's craftmanship in Dr. Leinsdorf's devoted reading. There was implicit emphasis on the more dramatic portions of this noble score.

Curtain-raiser was Mozart's seventh divertimente (KV-205, in D), composed at Vienna in 1773. It is a charming place, with four light, gay movements encompassing one of the Swan of Salzburg's more beautiful slow movements. Dr. Leinsdorf offered a congenial conception of this music, with fine orchestral execution.

Sandwiched between this classical and romantic music was Anton von Webern's variations for orchestra (Op. 30), his last purely orchestral music, with austere 12-tone syntax and rapid coloristic changes. Details of construction are highly involved, with cabalistic London Times intellectualized crossword-puzzle scoring.

THURS A – II / FRI – SAT VII

17

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Thursday evening November 16 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS — Academic Festival Overture op. 80

HENZE — Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto – Tempo giusto – Piu mosso

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso – Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento – Andantino: Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto – Recitativo – Vivo

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Seventh Program

Friday afternoon November 17 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 18 at 8.30

HAYDN — Symphony no. 79 in F major
Allegro con spirito
Adagio cantabile – un poco allegro
Menuetto: allegretto
Finale: vivace

First performance in Boston

PROKOFIEV — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 4 in B flat major op. 53 for the left hand
Vivace
Andante
Moderato
Vivace

JOHN BROWNING

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

DVORAK — Symphony no. 6 in D major op. 60
Allegro non tanto
Adagio
Scherzo (Furiant): presto – Trio
Finale: allegro con spirito

Mr Browning plays the Steinway Piano

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
NOV 18 1967
New England Newscip

The ARTS

Haydn Piece Charms Afternoon Audience

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; John Browning, pianist; performing Haydn's Symphony No. 79 in F Major; Prokofiev's Fourth Piano Concerto; and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D Major. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

It takes no more than the inclusion of an unfamiliar Haydn symphony on a BSO program to remind us how impoverished and without variety our usual musical diet is. The 79th Symphony, which is getting its first Boston hearings under Erich Leinsdorf this wetkend, is a particularly beautiful example of the unknown side of Haydn.

Lightly scored for a single flute, oboes, bassoons, horns in pairs, and strings, the twenty minutes work probes no emotional regions we haven't learned about from the more familiar symphonies, but nevertheless is a marvel of melody and invention.

Full of fascinating details —the harmonic diversion once we have returned to the initial movement's opening theme, or the ways the second movement justifies its own metrical awkwardness —Haydn's orchestration is wonderfully rich, varied, and tellingly planned. Particularly nice is the finale, with its powerful juxtaposition of divided strings cum bassoon with the transparent two-voiced restatement of the theme.

Leinsdorf's performance might have had more muscle and was dead wrong in having no first movement repeat. This is absolutely essential in giving the proper shape and weight to the piece, and would have added, at the outside, ninety seconds to the concert.

The afternoon's soloist was John Browning, whose left hand played Prokofiev's Fourth Piano Concerto. Commissioned found incomprehensible, and never played in public, by the late Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm during the First World War, the 1931 Concerto has not aged well, and sounds decidedly like too much of a not-so-good thing.

Browning brought to the work very little of the sheen and polish that it needs. Workaday technique, a sameness of articulation and not much imagination made the whole not much more than a modernish 'School of Velocity.'

Dvorak's Sixth Symphony in D Major closed Friday afternoon's concert.

Among the wind players, to whom the work gives lots to do, only solo hornist James Stagliano played really beautifully. Otherwise the reading was competent, well - mannered, and loud.

Prokofiev's 4th Concerto Brilliant

By McLAREN HARRIS

Pianist John Browning had been scheduled to be soloist in a welcome return of the Prokofiev Concerto No. 3 in this week's Symphony concerts. Less than two weeks ago we were notified that he and Erich Leinsdorf had decided to do the Fourth instead. And that, too, turned out to be very welcome.

Prokofiev's Fourth Concerto was one of 10 such works for the left-hand commissioned by pianist Paul Wittgenstein after he lost his right arm during World War 1 (the most famous of these works is by Ravel). Wittgenstein, however, discovered he couldn't play it and rejected it as unsatisfactory. Prokofiev took due note of the rejection and withdrew his concerto from circulation.

So it lay unperformed until just 11 years ago when Siegfried Rapp undertook the premiere in West Berlin. Posthumous shame on Wittgenstein, for the Fourth is a brilliant concerto—for display, if the soloist wishes it, but more particularly as a symphonic work

From the very beginning the piano gallops off through some of its most difficult scale and arpeggiated passages. But soon one discovers that the soloist is not the dominant force; Prokofiev was unafraid to use his full orchestral resources as he saw fit, and the piano emerges as simply the chief coloristic instrument of the ensemble. It may be that Prokofiev considered that one hand was not strong enough to be a successful protagonist against an orchestra. If this concerto represents a compromise, it is a happy one.

Throughout the four movements piano and orchestra complement and imitate each other; but never as separate entities removed from the other. Melody and harmony, if inspected alone, seem slightly obtuse, as if intentionally eluding traditional concepts; but together they make the most solid logic. That is Prokofiev's peculiar charm. The finale, fleeting and sparkling, seems to evaporate; and the Andante is serenely charming.

Browning is not Wittgenstein,

Symphony

and we may thank him for that. He possesses two good hands but used only the left and did so strongly, sensitively, accurately. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave the concerto wide dynamic scope and spirit in spite of technical flaws here or there.

Haydn's Symphony No. 79 opened the program. It too had not been performed here before, which is a compliment to the conductor and more shame for the rest of us. Very little indeed separates this work from Haydn's later symphonies; it has melodic felicity, some imaginatively unorthodox traits — a second development in the coda of the first movement and a second split into Adagio and Allegro — as well as Haydn's celebrated wittiness in the finale. Mr. Leinsdorf obviously enjoys playing such pieces, as does his orchestra — most of them, anyway; I'm tempted to say some nice things about violin bowing again. And the horns were less than perfectly tuned.

The Dvorak Sixth Symphony (No. 1 in the old catalogue) received the most eloquent, lushly-toned and rounded-phrase reading of the day. Mr. Leinsdorf did for it everything he could — lingering over warm-cello tones, energizing the Furiant and encouraging grandiose volumes in the finale. But though the work is touched with genius in melodic writing and instrumental sound in each movement, it is plastered through and through with major harmony and an overly-positive outlook. Not as bad as the Carneval Overture, to be sure, but taken all at once it is little more than a curiosity.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
NOV 18 1967
New England Newscip

THURS A – II / FRI – SAT VII

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Thursday evening November 16 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS — Academic Festival Overture op. 80

HENZE — Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto – Tempo giusto – Piu mosso

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso – Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento – Andantino: Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto – Recitativo – Vivo

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Seventh Program

Friday afternoon November 17 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 18 at 8.30

HAYDN — Symphony no. 79 in F major
Allegro con spirito
Adagio cantabile – un poco allegro
Menuetto: allegretto
Finale: vivace

First performance in Boston

PROKOFIEV — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 4 in B flat major op. 53 for the left hand
Vivace
Andante
Moderato
Vivace
JOHN BROWNING

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

DVORAK — Symphony no. 6 in D major op. 60
Allegro non tanto
Adagio
Scherzo (Furiant): presto – Trio
Finale: allegro con spirito

Mr Browning plays the Steinway Piano

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 18 1967

The ARTS

Haydn Piece Charms Afternoon Audience

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; John Browning, pianist; performing Haydn's Symphony No. 79 in F Major; Prokofiev's Fourth Piano Concerto; and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D Major, Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

It takes no more than the inclusion of an unfamiliar Haydn symphony on a BSO program to remind us how impoverished and without variety our usual musical diet is. The 79th Symphony, which is getting its first Boston hearings under Erich Leinsdorf this weekend, is a particularly beautiful example of the unknown side of Haydn.

Lightly scored for a single flute, oboes, bassoons, horns in pairs, and strings, the twenty minutes work probes no emotional regions we haven't learned about from the more familiar symphonies, but nevertheless is a marvel of melody and invention.

Full of fascinating details —the harmonic diversion once we have returned to the initial movement's opening theme, or the ways the second movement justifies its own metrical awkwardness —Haydn's orchestration is wonderfully rich, varied, and tellingly planned. Particularly nice is the finale, with its powerful juxtaposition of divided strings cum bassoon with the transparent two-voiced restatement of the theme.

Leinsdorf's performance might have had more muscle and was dead wrong in having no first movement repeat. This is absolutely essential in giving the proper shape and weight to the piece, and would have added, at the outside, ninety seconds to the concert.

The afternoon's soloist was John Browning, whose left hand played Prokofiev's Fourth Piano Concerto. Commissioned found incomprehensible, and never played in public, by the late Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right arm during the First World War, the 1931 Concerto has not aged well, and sounds decidedly like too much of a not-so-good thing.

Browning brought to the work very little of the sheen and polish that it needs. Workaday technique, a sameness of articulation and not much imagination made the whole not much more than a modernish 'School of Velocity.'

Dvorak's Sixth Symphony in D Major closed Friday afternoon's concert.

Among the wind players, to whom the work gives lots to do, only solo hornist James Stagliano played really beautifully. Otherwise the reading was competent, well - mannered, and loud.

Prokofiev's 4th Concerto Brilliant

By McLAREN HARRIS

Pianist John Browning had been scheduled to be soloist in a welcome return of the Prokofiev Concerto No. 3 in this week's Symphony concerts. Less than two weeks ago we were notified that he and Erich Leinsdorf had decided to do the Fourth instead. And that, too, turned out to be very welcome.

Prokofiev's Fourth Concerto was one of 10 such works for the left-hand commissioned by pianist Paul Wittgenstein after he lost his right arm during World War 1 (the most famous of these works is by Ravel). Wittgenstein, however, discovered he couldn't play it and rejected it as unsatisfactory. Prokofiev took due note of the rejection and withdrew his concerto from circulation.

So it lay unperformed until just 11 years ago when Siegfried Rapp undertook the premiere in West Berlin. Posthumous shame on Wittgenstein, for the Fourth is a brilliant concerto—for display, if the soloist wishes it, but more particularly as a symphonic work

From the very beginning the piano gallops off through some of its most difficult scale and arpeggiated passages. But soon one discovers that the soloist is not the dominant force; Prokofiev was unafraid to use his full orchestral resources as he saw fit, and the piano emerges as simply the chief coloristic instrument of the ensemble. It may be that Prokofiev considered that one hand was not strong enough to be a successful protagonist against an orchestra. If this concerto represents a compromise, it is a happy one.

Throughout the four movements piano and orchestra complement and imitate each other, but never as separate entities removed from the other. Melody and harmony, if inspected alone, seem slightly obtuse, as if intentionally eluding traditional concepts; but together they make the most solid logic. That is Prokofiev's peculiar charm. The finale, fleeting and sparkling, seems to evaporate; and the Andante is serenely charming.

Browning is not Wittgenstein,

Symphony

and we may thank him for that. He possesses two good hands but used only the left and did so strongly, sensitively, accurately. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave the concerto wide dynamic scope and spirit in spite of technical flaws here or there.

Haydn's Symphony No. 79 opened the program. It too had not been performed here before, which is a compliment to the conductor and more shame for the rest of us. Very little indeed separates this work from Haydn's later symphonies; it has melodic felicity, some imaginatively unorthodox traits — a second development in the coda of the first movement and a second split into Adagio and Allegro — as well as Haydn's celebrated wittiness in the finale. Mr. Leinsdorf obviously enjoys playing such pieces, as does his orchestra — most of them, anyway; I'm tempted to say some nice things about violin bowing again. And the horns were less than perfectly tuned.

The Dvorak Sixth Symphony (No. 1 in the old catalogue) received the most eloquent, lushly-toned and rounded-phrase reading of the day. Mr. Leinsdorf did for it everything he could — lingering over warm-cello tones, energizing the Furiant and encouraging grandiose volumes in the finale. But though the work is touched with genius in melodic writing and instrumental sound in each movement, it is plastered through and through with major harmony and an overly-positive outlook. Not as bad as the Carneval Overture, to be sure, but taken all at once it is little more than a curiosity.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 19 1967

18

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 197,400

NOV 20 1967

New England Newspaper

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Browning in left-hand concerto

By Craig Stinson

Erich Leinsdorf continues to add new material to the Boston Symphony repertory. His concerts this weekend included rare performances of two works, one by that obscure 18th-century revolutionary, Franz Joseph Haydn, the other by Prokofiev.

Hearing the Symphony No. 79 in F major brought home once again the fact that Haydn is the most neglected of the great composers. This performance, for all we know, may have been a première not only to Boston, but to the entire Western Hemisphere. And even if only a small percentage of the 60-odd never-played Haydn symphonies have as much to offer as this one, there's something wrong with our programing habits.

Compared with the familiar London and Paris symphonies, No. 79 shows a Haydn of less pronounced sanguineness (though Mr. Leinsdorf's performance may have been more phlegmatic than necessary). Its first movement has a kind of up-tempo pastorale character. The second is an amusing exchange of tonies and dominants, in phrases that invariably sound longer or shorter than one would expect.

Prokofiev's Concerto No. 4 in B-flat major is one of the more celebrated works for piano one hand. Like the Ravel Left-Hand Concerto, it was commissioned by Paul Wittgenstein, a concert pianist who had lost his right arm in World War I.

Unlike the Ravel, Prokofiev's concerto has achieved a reputation more through its history than through the music itself. It is relatively common knowledge that Wittgenstein rejected the concerto, and that Prokofiev refused to have it performed during his lifetime. Even in the 14 years since the composer's passing, however, performances have been scarce; John Browning's on Friday was the first with the Boston Symphony.

The composer may have known what he was doing in withholding this work. Certainly it makes a weaker effect than the more frequently performed first and third concertos. The first and last movements, both vivace, are each a typically Prokofievian moto perpetuo, full of pretty figurations and clever harmonic turns, but going nowhere thematically. The slow movement features a rambling kind of lyricism, with unmemorable gestures of grandiloquence. There is an improvisatory character about the whole piece — one which conveys a palpable, if unfocused, mood—but the over-all impression is smiliar to that made by a good jazzman on an off night.

It should be said that the use of the left hand alone constituted no apparent restriction, either to Prokofiev or to Mr. Browning, who played the work with admirable, if unconvincing, aplomb.

With the concluding number, Dvořák's Symphony No. 6 in D major (No. 1 if you haven't converted to the new system yet), Mr. Leinsdorf made the Boston Symphony sound more like an orchestra than it has in any previous concert this season. With momentary exceptions, the performance had all the advantages that come from unanimity of purpose and execution. And it was refreshing to hear some Dvořák that hasn't gone totally stale from overuse.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 175,250

NOV 18 1967

New England Newspaper

John Browning Soloist In Prokovieff Concerto

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — John Browning, phenomenal young American pianist, was soloist yesterday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, in Prokovieff's tremendously difficult fourth piano concerto (Op. 53, in B flat) for the left hand. This taxing work (a first performance here) requires the attention of a true visturso.

It was projected with superior style and sensitivity, glowing with color, yet the witty and characteristic writing was as pointedly apparent, as it should be, and with concomitant humor. Phrasings were shaped with character and conviction, disclosing full understanding of the Russian master's pawky humor. Dr. Leindorf and his Bostonians gave full orchestral support, with particularly noteworthy brass playing.

Curtain-raiser was Haydn's 79th symphony, in F, in a first Boston performance (possibly an American premiere); why this should be is understandable, for it is, frankly, dull. His characteristic slow introduction was abandoned, returning to a dreary, unemotional world with perfunctory, almost completely uninteresting, movements. Seldom was Haydn less inspired; seldom do we feel such a total absence of any spark of genius as in the well-bred cantabile themes of this symphony.

The slow movement has an adagio cantabile which relies on the spun-out figurations to which Haydn always has recourse when not truly inspired; the movement suddenly breaks off, as if the composer, too, became weary of this artifice. A light, attractive allegretto ensues, far more congenial to Haydn.

This tiny little piece is able to communicate the composer's feelings far more genuinely than the artificial figurations of the slower tempo. It was played by the attenuated orchestra with verve and high sense of style.

After the interval, Dvorak's sixth symphony (Op. 60, in D) was presented. It is a cheerful work, full of originality in the Shubert-Smetana manner, and its presentation by the orchestra was thoroughly successful Dvorak's innate happiness and serenity are beautifully reflected in this masterpiece, strangely less frequently played than other of his symphonic masterpieces. Dr. Leinsdorf's conducting was brimming with vigor and the orchestral execution was superlative.

TUES B – III

19

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program

Tuesday evening November 21 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 7 in E major

Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell – Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 3 in C major op. 26

Andante – allegro
Theme and variations
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

JOHN BROWNING

John Browning plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

NOV 22 1967 New England Newsclip

Browning, Leinsdorf Score With Prokofiev's Third

By McLAREN HARRIS

John Browning and the Boston Symphony went back last night and picked up Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3, Op. 26, dropped from last weekend's programs in favor of the Fourth.

The Third is much the better known, having received its world premiere in Chicago 46 years ago. Its three movements are full of active, friendly rivalry between soloist and ensemble — actually more of a partnership than a pair of competitors. The piano part contains plenty of virtuosic dash from the very beginning — Prokofiev intended it as a good vehicle — with scale passages skittering over the keys and splashes of chordal writing providing either bravura or lightly fleeting accompaniment to the orchestral work. Alternations between Allegro and Andante vary the moods from intense energy and rolling gait to broadly-spoken grandiloquence.

Harmonically the work is a good bit less adventurous than those in the pre-Bolshevik days. It is still rhythmically assertive, but the overall impresion is less of savagery or dramatic impact than a kind of brash humor and mischievous outlook. The Third Concerto is not the sort of piece to indicate a total pianistic gift, but Browning was obviously at home with it, instilling a lusty vigor in the heavier passages and taking amost solemn care with the romantic Andantes.

I must admit to an affinity for this concerto's language, in which neither element is afraid of the other. Because of Browning's straightforward expression and sustained manner plus Erich Leinsdorf's excellent control of his orchestra, not a thing was covered or lost. In their partnership no name came first, unless it was that of Prokofiev.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

NOV 22 1967 New England Newsclip

Pianist Browning Solos With Boston Symphony

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

For the third program in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday B Series last night in Symphony Hall, conductor Erich Leinsdorf devoted the concert to only two works, — Bruckner's "Symphony No. 7 in E Major" and Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Major," with the exciting young American pianist, John Browning as soloist.

Mr. Browning, of course, is, despite his youth, one of the foremost exponents of our time of Prokofiev. Previously, I have heard him perform the First and Second concertos with the orchestra (he has also recorded these two works with the Boston Symphony), and he is currently scheduled to record the "Piano Concerto No. 4 for the Left Hand Only" and the Third with Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians.

The "Piano Concerto No. 3" is top-notch Prokofiev, displaying nearly all the facets of the composer's creative talent — the often caustic humor, the skill at development, the variety of mood and tempo, the brilliant rhythms. Especially lovely is the slow movement, with its almost archaic dance theme. Mr. Browning has the bravura style and temperament, plus the digital facility, that are requisite to conveying the essence of Prokofiev. His playing last night was crisp, sure, and cleanly-articulated.

As for the Bruckner "Symphony No. 7," it has both the virtues and the defects characteristic of its composer. Like all of Bruckner's symphonies, it runs on for more than an hour and, mingled with its occasional long-windedness, there are passages of remarkable sonority and Wagner-like harmonies.

Of the four movements, the Scherzo is probably the best developed — ranking, certainly, with the scherzi of Beethoven. The Adagio has moments of almost ethereal beauty and is said to be a sort of elegiac homage to Wagner, but its strange mixture of diatonic anc chromatic writing in the main theme somewhat sap its strength.

However, throughout the entire symphony (and I include the impressive beginning and the exciting Finale), there are musical sequences that are assuredly worth waiting for.

Mr. Leinsdorf obviously knows and loves the score. He managed to obtain some glorious sound from his ensemble, and his reading and over-all concept of the work were sensitive and intelligent.

TUES B – III

19

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program

Tuesday evening November 21 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 7 in E major

Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell – Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 3 in C major op. 26

Andante – allegro
Theme and variations
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

JOHN BROWNING

John Browning plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
NOV 22 1967
New England Newsclip

Browning, Leinsdorf Score With Prokofiev's Third

By McLAREN HARRIS

John Browning and the Boston Symphony went back last night and picked up Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3, Op. 26, dropped from last weekend's programs in favor of the Fourth.

The Third is much the better known, having received its world premiere in Chicago 46 years ago. Its three movements are full of active, friendly rivalry between soloist and ensemble — actually more of a partnership than a pair of competitors. The piano part contains plenty of virtuosic dash from the very beginning — Prokofiev intended it as a good vehicle — with scale passages skittering over the keys and splashes of chordal writing providing either bravura or lightly fleeting accompaniment to the orchestral work. Alternations between Allegro and Andante vary the moods from intense energy and rolling gait to broadly-spoken grandiloquence.

Harmonically the work is a good bit less adventurous than those in the pre-Bolshevik days. It is still rhythmically assertive, but the overall impresion is less of savagery or dramatic impact than a kind of brash humor and mischievous outlook. The Third Concerto is not the sort of piece to indicate a total pianistic gift, but Browning was obviously at home with it, instilling a lusty vigor in the heavier passages and taking amost solemn care with the romantic Andantes.

I must admit to an affinity for this concerto's language, in which neither element is afraid of the other. Because of Browning's straightforward expression and sustained manner plus Erich Leinsdorf's excellent control of his orchestra, not a thing was covered or lost. In their partnership no name came first, unless it was that of Prokofiev.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850
NOV 22 1967
New England Newsclip

Pianist Browning Solos With Boston Symphony

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

For the third program in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday B Series last night in Symphony Hall, conductor Erich Leinsdorf devoted the concert to only two works — Bruckner's "Symphony No. 7 in E Major" and Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Major," with the exciting young American pianist, John Browning as soloist.

Mr. Browning, of course, is, despite his youth, one of the foremost exponents of our time of Prokofiev. Previously, I have heard him perform the First and Second concertos with the orchestra (he has also recorded these two works with the Boston Symphony) and he is currently scheduled to record the "Piano Concerto No. 4 for the Left Hand Only" and the Third with Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians.

The "Piano Concerto No. 3" is top-notch Prokofiev, displaying nearly all the facets of the composer's creative talent — the often caustic humor, the skill at development, the variety of mood and tempo, the brilliant rhythms. Especially lovely is the slow movement, with its almost archaic dance theme. Mr. Browning has the bravura style and temperament, plus the digital facility, that are requisite to conveying the essence of Prokofiev. His playing last night was crisp, sure, and cleanly-articulated.

As for the Bruckner "Symphony No. 7," it has both the virtues and the defects characteristic of its composer. Like all of Bruckner's symphonies, it runs on for more than an hour and, mingled with its occasional long-windedness, there are passages of remarkable sonority and Wagner-like harmonies.

Of the four movements, the Scherzo is probably the best developed — ranking, certainly, with the scherzi of Beethoven. The Adagio has moments of almost ethereal beauty and is said to be a sort of elegiac homage to Wagner, but its strange mixture of diatonic anc chromatic writing in the main theme somewhat sap its strength.

However, throughout the entire symphony (and I include the impressive beginning and the exciting Finale), there are musical sequences that are assuredly worth waiting for.

Mr. Leinsdorf obviously knows and loves the score. He managed to obtain some glorious sound from his ensemble, and his reading and over-all concept of the work were sensitive and intelligent.

20

FRI - SAT - VIII

Eighth Program

Friday afternoon November 24 at 2 o'clock

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

Traditional — 'The Old Hundredth'

BACH — 'Schafe können sicher weiden' from Cantata no. 208

CHLOE OWEN soprano

In honor of Margaret Ruthven Lang

BEETHOVEN — Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major op. 61

Allegro ma non troppo
Larghetto
Rondo

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67

Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro – Allegro

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

NOV 16 1967 New England Newscip

BSO SOLOIST — Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thanksgiving weekend concerts. He will be heard on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 24-25, in Beethoven's Overture to Fidelio, and the Friday-Saturday concerts will conclude with Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven. Because of the holiday the only other Orchestra concert this week will take place in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 21, at 7:30. John Browning will play Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3. Also scheduled will be Mozart's Divertimento, K. 205 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

NOV 19 1967 New England Newscip

Soloist at Symphony To Be Silverstein

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thanksgiving weekend concerts. He will be heard on Friday and Saturday in Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Friday afternoon's concert will begin with special music chosen by music director Erich Leinsdorf for a significant anniversary of one of the orchestra's most faithful subscribers.

Further details will be announced at the Friday afternoon concert. Saturday evening's program will open with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," and the Friday-Saturday concerts will conclude with Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven.

Mr. Silverstein joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1955 and was then the youngest member of the orchestra. He received third prize in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium Competition and the following year won the Naumburg Foundation Award which included an extensive tour throughout the United States. He became concertmaster of the orchestra in the autumn of 1962.

Though he has been soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on numerous occasions, the concerts next weekend will be his first performances of the Beethoven concerto.

Because of the holiday the only other orchestra concert this week will take place in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening. This will be the third program in the Series B concerts which begin at 7:30. John Browning will play Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3. Also scheduled for this concert will be Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Eighth Program

Saturday evening November 25 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Fidelio – Overture

BEETHOVEN — Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major op. 61

Allegro ma non troppo
Larghetto
Rondo

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67

Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro – Allegro

The concert will end at about 10.30

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

20

FRI - SAT - VIII

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Eighth Program

Friday afternoon November 24 at 2 o'clock

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

Traditional — 'The Old Hundredth'

BACH — 'Schafe können sicher weiden' from Cantata no. 208

CHLOE OWEN soprano

In honor of Margaret Ruthven Lang

BEETHOVEN — Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major op. 61

Allegro ma non troppo
Larghetto
Rondo

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67

Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro – Allegro

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

NOV 16 1967 New England Newspaper

BSO SOLOIST — Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thanksgiving weekend concerts. He will be heard on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 24-25, in Beethoven's Overture to Fidelio, and the Friday-Saturday concerts will conclude with Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven. Because of the holiday the only other Orchestra concert this week will take place in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 21, at 7:30. John Browning will play Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3. Also scheduled will be Mozart's Divertimento, K. 205 and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

NOV 19 1967 New England Newspaper

Soloist at Symphony To Be Silverstein

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Thanksgiving weekend concerts. He will be heard on Friday and Saturday in Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Friday afternoon's concert will begin with special music chosen by music director Erich Leinsdorf for a significant anniversary of one of the orchestra's most faithful subscribers.

Further details will be announced at the Friday afternoon concert. Saturday evening's program will open with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," and the Friday-Saturday concerts will conclude with Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven.

Mr. Silverstein joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1955 and was then the youngest member of the orchestra. He received third prize in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium Competition and the following year won the Naumburg Foundation Award which included an extensive tour throughout the United States. He became concertmaster of the orchestra in the autumn of 1962.

Though he has been soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on numerous occasions, the concerts next weekend will be his first performances of the Beethoven concerto.

Because of the holiday the only other orchestra concert this week will take place in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening. This will be the third program in the Series B concerts which begin at 7:30. John Browning will play Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3. Also scheduled for this concert will be Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Eighth Program

Saturday evening November 25 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Fidelio – Overture

BEETHOVEN — Concerto for violin and orchestra in D major op. 61

Allegro ma non troppo
Larghetto
Rondo

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67

Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro – Allegro

The concert will end at about 10.30

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 1[illegible]
NOV 25 1967
New England Newspaper

At Symphony

Silverstein Solos In Beehoven Opus

Beethoven

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Beethoven's violin concerto (Op. 61, in D) was yesterday afternoon's featured presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was the superb soloist in aresplendent reading.

It has long been regarded as the finest of all modern concerti for that instrument. From the standpoint of balance artistically between violinist and orchestra, teh most striking feature of Beethoven's masterpiece is that there is no conflict between soloist and orchestra for domination of the musical picture.

Virtually every note of the solo part bears some true relevance to the thematic structure of the piece as a whole. The virtuoso is given plenty to do and the orchestra is not relegated to the position of mere accompaniment. This concerto bristles with technical difficulties, especially those relating to good tone production, yet listeners never are conscious of there being any technical display to show off prowess.

The allegro opens with four drum taps, a thematic idea which, it is said, came to the composer from a tapping on a neighbor's door. As for the music itself, the first two movements are Beethoven at his most lyrical tenderness. The opening movement proceeds along spacious lines, after a symphonic prologue in which the principal themes are proclaimed.

In the larghetto the principal melody is carried by the orchestra, while the solo violin provides embellishment. The concluding rondo begins brilliantly, with a dancelike subject, advancing to a second subject more sensitive and sentimental in mood, though it is comparatively weak, due to excessive repetition and lack of distinction in thematic material.

In this performance tradition and a reserved classicism dominated the urge to touch off fiddling fireworks. There was a freshness and youthful exhilaration that even the finer artists no longer can match.

Curtain-raiser was a tribute to Margaret Ruthven Lang, who is observing her 100th birthday on Monday. Bach's traditional "Old Hundredth" was followed by his "Sheep May Safely Graze," from Cantata No. 208, sung by Chloe Owen with a rather distressing tremolo.

Concluding yesterday's program was Beethoven's fifth symphony (Op. 67, in C minor) which has gained added significance in our time in the light of the fateful "V-for-Victory" motto with which it opens. Among great musical structures, it is a paradox, being catchier and better known than even teh hardiest radio jingle.

"It will be generally admitted that Beethoven's fifth symphony is the most subline noise that has ever penetrated into the ear of man," Edward Morgan Foster once wrote.

Dr. Leinsdorf's exposition with the brilliant Bostonians did bring down the house.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
NOV 24 1967
New England Newspaper

Birthdays, Bach, and Beethoven

By Roland Nadeau

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Friday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was prefaced by a charming gesture. Seated in the first balcony right was a lady who was about to have a birthday, Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang. She had been present at the orchestra's genesis, a witness to each of its successive conductors, a long-time series subscriber, and a one-time composer for the orchestra.

The players began by performing for her the traditional chorale, "Old Hundredth," followed by Chloe Owen's singing of J. S. Bach's "Sheep May Safely Graze" from the "Birthday" Cantata, No. 208. The conductor, Mr. Leinsdorf, asked Miss Lang to rise and receive the warm congratulatory applause of her fellow listeners. It was her one-hundredth anniversary and she can be certain of a permanent place at the hall in the future, for the trustees have named a seat for her, the one at balcony right, B-1.

The rest of the program represented an homage to the past; the 5th Symphony and the Violin Concerto by Beethoven are two comfortable old favorites.

Precise intonation

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist in the concerto. We cannot imagine a finer violinist for this work. First, the essentials are there: precise intonation, ease and elegance of technique, refined tone—especially in the upper reaches of the violin's range—and a lucid realization of the violin's part in the work's structure.

Beyond this Mr. Silverstein is one of the few soloists who really dares keep his part subsidiary to the orchestra when it is required in the score—and it is often required in this piece. The artist's consummate sense of musical integration and balance surely must be the result of his deep experience as a player of chamber music.

Mr. Leinsdorf was most accommodating in the concerto. His orchestra was reduced in number—for example, only five basses were used. This led to a superb tonal balance. One wished though that the conductor had accommodated the soloist by adjusting the intonation of the horns in rehearsal. In the first and second movements there occurred some shocking gaffs of pitch.

Mr. Leinsdorf's reading of the 5th Symphony was not very exciting or fresh. It was obvious that he was trying unsuccessfully to get the orchestra warmed up. In some of the more dramatic moments he displayed a paroxysm of exhortation. But the players just did not seem to want to go along.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. [illegible]
NOV 27 1967
New England Newspaper

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
NOV 25 1967
New England Newspaper

The ARTS

Leinsdorf, BSO honor 100-year-old friend

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

Margaret Ruthven Lang, born 14 years before the Boston Symphony, was honored at Friday afternoon's concert. Miss Lang will be 100 years old Monday, and to celebrate the birthday of their most faithful subscriber and friend, members of the orchestra played 'The Old Hundredth' and, with soprano Chloe Owen, the aria 'Sheep May Safely Graze,' from Bach's Cantata No. 208.

A musical tribute was most appropriate, for Miss Lang, who acknowledged the audience's applause from her customary first-balcony seat, not only studied composition with Chadwick and MacDowell, but was the first woman to have her music played by the Symphony, this is 1893 when Arthur Nikisch conducted the 26-year-old composer's 'Dramatic Overture.'

Erich Leinsdorf's words of greeting to Miss Lang were well chosen, to the point, and, undoubtedly, representative of the audience's admiration for this remarkable woman.

The remainder of the afternoon was all Beethoven—the Violin Concerto and the Fifth Symphony. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, soloist in the concerto, gave a technically fine and musically thought-out performance. His tone is lighter, more transparent than I remember it in the past, and there is a clearness of musical expression as well. The first movement, nicely shaped and phrased, came off well, though new light needs to be shed on the slow movement; it was probably too slow, and, in any event, not spacious enough to be thoroughly convincing.

This was the orchestra's fault, as well, for Leinsdorf contributed an unarticulated and routine accompaniment, flawed by a wrong string entrance in the finale and in the middle movement, unison pizzicati that sounded strummed, and terribly out of tune horn playing, this last providing an unwanted contrast with Silverstein's own inventive and well-played cadenza.

Leinsdorf's Fifth Symphony was a different story; excepting a disastrous horn entrance, it was a vital, alive reading, though I have reservations about the broadening that the opening two statements underwent. Putting them both in the 2-4 meter of the rest of the movement makes them sound much squarer, and robs them of their rhetorical effectiveness as well. If this is what Beethoven wanted, he could very well have written it, rather than the somewhat crazier, more personal gesture that he did give us.

Orchestral playing ranged from the remarkably robust, heard most of the piece, to an offensively unbalanced loud, with trumpets completely out of proportion. This has to do in part, I know, with the rebalancing of the orchestra after Symphony Hall's face-lifting, but in part, too, with a bit of discretion and listening.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Joseph Silverstein, violinist; performing Beethoven's Violin Concerto, Opus 61; and Symphony No. 5, Opus 67, Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

Other Theater News On Page 12

The Boston Globe—Friday, November 24, 1967

Symphony on her 100th

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

A brisk figure will emerge from the subway at Symphony Station today with ample time to take her place in a first balcony seat where she has been a familiar sight since the hall was opened in October, 1900.

Her name is Margaret Ruthven Lang, and though you'd never know it, she's 100 years old this week. The anniversary will have a special place in the annals of the B.S.O., for Miss Lang has not only listened to every conductor since George Henschel, who inaugurated the concerts for founder Henry Lee Higginson in 1881, but she was also the first woman whose music was played by Symphony. Her father, Benjamin Lang, was a Boston composer and conductor.

A Bach favorite, "Sheep May Safely Graze," will be played by the orchestra in honor of Miss Lang's centennial, and Erich Leinsdorf will also conduct "The Old Hundredth" for the Symphony's most faithful subscriber.

—Ollie Noonan Jr. photo

MARGARET RUTHVEN LANG
... a special place

Marion Cotillion

A party that's never late and always one of the best of its kind is the annual Marion Cotillion. The 16th of these really gala dances at the Kittansett Club will be on Dec. 8, with the usual marvelous turnout.

Mrs. Robert W. Pierce is chairman, and Mrs. Arthur Milhench co-chairman.

As a first, the cotillion will honor two longtime patronesses, Mrs. Parker Converse and Mrs. Thayer Francis, as well as founder Cecila Plumb.

As usual, Summer Marionites will come from New York, Philadelphia and many another distance for this good party.

Sponsors for 1967 include Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Lee, Dr. and Mrs. David Gallison Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Donald E. May, Mr. and Mrs. Holmes Dyer, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Fallow Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Forester, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Babbitt Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bryden, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Whitney Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Wing Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. John K. Stanton and Mr. and Mrs. Richard V. Wakeman.

New assembly date?

Party planner Sam Hallowell said Thursday night as his annual Thanksgiving Debutante Assembly got on its belated way nearly two hours behind schedule that he thought he'd "move the date up to Christmas week next year."

The debs, he thinks, are too apt to be late in getting home from college, which delays dinners and other events.

Certainly something ought to be done to spare those who do come at the specified hour, complete with their sisters and their cousins and their aunts, only to wait until midnight for the presentation.

With more of these en mass presentations being scheduled every season (next June will bring a Brockton party into the fold and possibly a North Shore Cotillion bringing the total close to a dozen) the Assembly, long one of the big parties of the year, has been taking all the Cinderella honors lately.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 25 1967
New England Newspapers

At Symphony

Silverstein Solos In Beehoven Opus

Beethoven

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Beethoven's violin concerto (Op. 61, in D) was yesterday afternoon's featured presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was the superb soloist in aresplendent reading.

It has long been regarded as the finest of all modern concerti for that instrument. From the standpoint of balance artistically between violinist and orchestra, teh most striking feature of Beethoven's masterpiece is that there is no conflict between soloist and orchestra for domination of the musical picture.

Virtually every note of the solo part bears some true relevance to the thematic structure of the piece as a whole. The virtuoso is given plenty to do and the orchestra is not relegated to the position of mere accompaniment. This concerto bristles with technical difficulties, especially those relating to good tone production, yet listeners never are conscious of there being any technical display to show off prowess.

The allegro opens with four drum taps, a thematic idea which, it is said, came to the composer from a tapping on a neighbor's door. As for the music itself, the first two movements are Beethoven at his most lyrical tenderness. The opening movement proceeds along spacious lines, after a symphonic prologue in which the principal themes are proclaimed.

In the larghetto the principal melody is carried by the orchestra, while the solo violin provides embellishment. The concluding rondo begins brilliantly, with a dancelike subject, advancing to a second subject more sensitive and sentimental in mood, though it is comparatively weak, due to excessive repetition and lack of distinction in thematic material.

In this performance tradition and a reserved classicism dominated the urge to touch off fiddling fireworks. There was a freshness and youthful exhilaration that even the finer artists no longer can match.

Curtain-raiser was a tribute to Margaret Ruthven Lang, who is observing her 100th birthday on Monday. Bach's traditional "Old Hundredth" was followed by his "Sheep May Safely Graze," from Cantata No. 208, sung by Chloe Owen with a rather distressing tremolo.

Concluding yesterday's program was Beethoven's fifth symphony (Op. 67, in C minor) which has gained added significance in our time in the light of the fateful "V-for-Victory" motto with which it opens. Among great musical structures, it is a paradox, being catchier and better known than even teh hardiest radio jingle.

"It will be generally admitted that Beethoven's fifth symphony is the most subline noise that has ever penetrated into the ear of man," Edward Morgan Foster once wrote.

Dr. Leinsdorf's exposition with the brilliant Bostonians did bring down the house.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 27 1967
New England Newspapers

Birthdays, Bach, and Beethoven

By Roland Nadeau

ARTS ENTERTAINMENT

Friday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was prefaced by a charming gesture. Seated in the first balcony right was a lady who was about to have a birthday, Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang. She had been present at the orchestra's genesis, a witness to each of its successive conductors, a long-time series subscriber, and a one-time composer for the orchestra.

The players began by performing for her the traditional chorale, "Old Hundredth," followed by Chloe Owen's singing of J. S. Bach's "Sheep May Safely Graze" from the "Birthday" Cantata, No. 208. The conductor, Mr. Leinsdorf, asked Miss Lang to rise and receive the warm congratulatory applause of her fellow listeners. It was her one-hundredth anniversary and she can be certain of a permanent place at the hall in the future, for the trustees have named a seat for her, the one at balcony right, B-1.

The rest of the program represented an homage to the past; the 5th Symphony and the Violin Concerto by Beethoven are two comfortable old favorites.

Precise intonation

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist in the concerto. We cannot imagine a finer violinist for this work. First, the essentials are there: precise intonation, ease and elegance of technique, refined tone—especially in the upper reaches of the violin's range—and a lucid realization of the violin's part in the work's structure.

Beyond this Mr. Silverstein is one of the few soloists who really dares keep his part subsidiary to the orchestra when it is required in the score—and it is often required in this piece. The artist's consummate sense of musical integration and balance surely must be the result of his deep experience as a player of chamber music.

Mr. Leinsdorf was most accommodating in the concerto. His orchestra was reduced in number—for example, only five basses were used. This led to a superb tonal balance. One wished though that the conductor had accommodated the soloist by adjusting the intonation of the horns in rehearsal. In the first and second movements there occurred some shocking gaffs of pitch.

Mr. Leinsdorf's reading of the 5th Symphony was not very exciting or fresh. It was obvious that he was trying unsuccessfully to get the orchestra warmed up. In some of the more dramatic moments he displayed a paroxysm of exhortation. But the players just did not seem to want to go along.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
NOV 24 1967
New England Newspapers

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
NOV 25 1967
New England Newspapers

The ARTS

Leinsdorf, BSO honor 100-year-old friend

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

Margaret Ruthven Lang, born 14 years before the Boston Symphony, was honored at Friday afternoon's concert. Miss Lang will be 100 years old Monday, and to celebrate the birthday of their most faithful subscriber and friend, members of the orchestra played 'The Old Hundredth' and, with soprano Chloe Owen, the aria 'Sheep May Safely Graze,' from Bach's Cantata No. 208.

A musical tribute was most appropriate, for Miss Lang, who acknowledged the audience's applause from her customary first-balcony seat, not only studied composition with Chadwick and MacDowell, but was the first woman to have her music played by the Symphony, this is 1893 when Arthur Nikisch conducted the 26-year-old composer's 'Dramatic Overture.'

Erich Leinsdorf's words of greeting to Miss Lang were well chosen, to the point, and, undoubtedly, representative of the audience's admiration for this remarkable woman.

The remainder of the afternoon was all Beethoven—the Violin Concerto and the Fifth Symphony. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, soloist in the concerto, gave a technically fine and musically thought-out performance. His tone is lighter, more transparent than I remember it in the past, and there is a clearness of musical expression as well. The first movement, nicely shaped and phrased, came off well, though new light needs to be shed on the slow movement: it was probably too slow, and, in any event, not spacious enough to be thoroughly convincing.

This was the orchestra's fault, as well, for Leinsdorf contributed an unarticulated and routine accompaniment, flawed by a wrong string entrance in the finale and in the middle movement, unison pizzicati that sounded strummed, and terribly out of tune horn playing, this last providing an unwanted contrast with Silverstein's own inventive and well-played cadenza.

Leinsdorf's Fifth Symphony was a different story; excepting a disastrous horn entrance, it was a vital, alive reading, though I have reservations about the broadening that the opening two statements underwent. Putting them both in the 2-4 meter of the rest of the movement makes them sound much squarer, and robs them of their rhetorical effectiveness as well. If this is what Beethoven wanted, he could very well have written it, rather than the somewhat crazier, more personal gesture that he did give us.

Orchestral playing ranged from the remarkably robust, heard most of the piece, to an offensively unbalanced loud, with trumpets completely out of proportion. This has to do in part, I know, with the rebalancing of the orchestra after Symphony Hall's facelifting, but in part, too, with a bit of discretion and listening.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Joseph Silverstein, violinist; performing Beethoven's Violin Concerto, Opus 61; and Symphony No. 5, Opus 67, Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

Other Theater News On Page 12

The Boston Globe—Friday, November 24, 1967

Symphony on her 100th

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

A brisk figure will emerge from the subway at Symphony Station today with ample time to take her place in a first balcony seat where she has been a familiar sight since the hall was opened in October, 1900.

Her name is Margaret Ruthven Lang, and though you'd never know it, she's 100 years old this week. The anniversary will have a special place in the annals of the B.S.O., for Miss Lang has not only listened to every conductor since George Henschel, who inaugurated the concerts for founder Henry Lee Higginson in 1881, but she was also the first woman whose music was played by Symphony. Her father, Benjamin Lang, was a Boston composer and conductor.

A Bach favorite, "Sheep May Safely Graze," will be played by the orchestra in honor of Miss Lang's centennial, and Erich Leinsdorf will also conduct "The Old Hundredth" for the Symphony's most faithful subscriber.

—Ollie Noonan Jr. photo

MARGARET RUTHVEN LANG
... a special place

Marion Cotillion

A party that's never late and always one of the best of its kind is the annual Marion Cotillion. The 16th of these really gala dances at the Kittansett Club will be on Dec. 8, with the usual marvelous turnout.

Mrs. Robert W. Pierce is chairman, and Mrs. Arthur Milhench co-chairman.

As a first, the cotillion will honor two longtime patronesses, Mrs. Parker Converse and Mrs. Thayer Francis, as well as founder Cecila Plumb.

As usual, Summer Marionites will come from New York, Philadelphia and many another distance for this good party.

Sponsors for 1967 include Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Lee, Dr. and Mrs. David Gallison Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Donald E. May, Mr. and Mrs. Holmes Dyer, Mr. and Mrs. John S. Fallow Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Forester, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Babbitt Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bryden, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Whitney Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Wing Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. John K. Stanton and Mr. and Mrs. Richard V. Wakeman.

New assembly date?

Party planner Sam Hallowell said Thursday night as his annual Thanksgiving Debutante Assembly got on its belated way nearly two hours behind schedule that he thought he'd "move the date up to Christmas week next year."

The debs, he thinks, are too apt to be late in getting home from college, which delays dinners and other events.

Certainly something ought to be done to spare those who do come at the specified hour, complete with their sisters and their cousins and their aunts, only to wait until midnight for the presentation.

With more of these en mass presentations being scheduled every season (next June will bring a Brockton party into the fold and possibly a North Shore Cotillion bringing the total close to a dozen) the Assembly, long one of the big parties of the year, has been taking all the Cinderella honors lately.

22

TUES A – IV

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program

Tuesday evening November 28 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 36 in C major K. 425 'The Linz'
- Adagio – allegro spiritoso
- Poco adagio
- Menuetto
- Presto

PROKOFIEV — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 3 in C major op. 26
- Andante – allegro
- Theme and variations
- Finale: allegro ma non troppo

JOHN BROWNING

INTERMISSION

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 6 in D major op. 60
- Allegro non tanto
- Adagio
- Scherzo (Furiant): presto – Trio
- Finale: allegro con spirito

John Browning plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

NOV 25 1967

New England Newsclip

Music

To Offer Pre-College Piano Recital Sunday

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Miss Christine Brady of this city will offer a pre-college piano recital tomorrow afternoon, at 3 p. m., in Elks hall, Warren Street. Miss Brady, who has outstanding talent, will be assisted by Miss Colleen Louise Phalan, soprano. She will be supported at the piano by Miss Lillian Sullivan.

Mrs. Bernice Bigelow will direct the annual presentation of Handel's "Messiah" which will be performed by members of the Pelham, N. H., Congregational church choir on Sunday evening, Dec. 3, and she will be assisted by Richard Chadwick as organist.

John Browning

Selected soloists and talented choir singers from Lowell who are experienced in the field or oratorio will join the choir. This annual presentation, which ranks among the finest yearly offerings of Handel's superbly created work, is now in its 24th year.

Mrs. Bigelow who is a noted cellist as well as choral director, will play with the Nashua Symphony orchestra in the opening concert of the 1967-68 season Tuesday evening of next week in the high school auditorium of that city. Musicians also from the Greater-Lowell area who will play in this event, an evening at the Pops, include William Thayer of Chelmsford; Margaret Warren, Robin Warren and Roland Warren, of Tyngsboro.

Henry N. Allain, program director for the orchestra, announced that the program would include selections from "My Fair Lady," arrangements of "More from Mondo Cane"; Hoe-Down from Aaron Copland's "Rodeo"; Handel's "Water Music," and specially arranged show and pop tunes.

One of the top events of the season offered by the Andover Celebrity Series is scheduled for Friday evening, December 8, in George Washington Hall, Phillips Academy, when Emlyn Williams, one of the most distinguished artists in the theatrical field today, appears in "Dylan Thomas Growing Up." Mr. Williams, who has delighted thousands of show goers in this excellent vehicle, promises to bring a new high spot to this series, one of the best known throughout New England.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY orchestra has but one concert scheduled for next week in Symphony hall, Boston. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the fourth program of the Tuesday A series, beginning with Mozart's Symphony No. 36, and he has invited John Browning, pianist, as guest soloist. Mr. Browning will perform the Piano Concerto No. 3 by Prokofiev. Concluding the program will be the Symphony No. 6 in D Major by Dvorak.

On Wednesday, the Orchestra wil begin a four day tour during which it will give three concerts in New York and one at Rutgers university, New Brunswick, N. J. Mr. Browning will play the Prokofiev in two concerts listed for Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evenings.

On Saturday evening the Orchestra will make the first of five appearances this season in New York's Carnegie Hall. For that concert Malcolm Frager will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4.

When the Orchestra returns to Symphony Hall, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, will be guest conductor for the concerts of December 8 and 9. He also will conduct the Orchestra in Providence on December 7. Charles Wilson will conduct the third "Cambridge" concert on Tuesday evening, December 5.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

NOV 26 1967

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has but one concert scheduled this week in Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the fourth program of the Tuesday Series A concerts at 8:30 beginning with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 36, K. 425, "Linz."

Pianist John Browning will be soloist with Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3. Tuesday's concert will conclude with Symphony No. 6 in D Major by Dvorak.

On Wednesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin a four day tour during which it will give three concerts in New York and one at Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey. Mr. Browning will perform the Prokofiev concerto in two concerts at Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evenings.

Saturday evening the orchestra will make the first of five appearances this season in New York's Carnegie Hall. For that concert Malcolm Frager will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4.

When the orchestra returns to Symphony Hall Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor for the concerts on Dec. 8 and 9. He will also conduct the orchestra in Providence on Dec. 7. Charles Wilson will conduct the third "Cambridge" concert on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

NOV 30 1967

Music: A Happy Symphony by Dvorak

Leinsdorf Conducts Bostonians Here

Mozart Work Played With a Surprise

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

NOT too many chances to hear the Dvorak D major Symphony come around. The D major used to be known as No. 1, but is now No. 6 in the new listings, because four of Dvorak's early symphonies have been published. No. 1 or No. 6, it is a jewel. It has a few derivations—Brahms, Beethoven, Wagner—but it breathes the uncomplicated spirit of one of the most natural musicians in history. Its melodies breathe, its orchestration is rich without being cloying, its rhythms are spirited. It is a happy symphony.

© Karsh

Erich Leinsdorf

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with John Browning, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Symphony No. 36 ..... Mozart
Piano Concerto No. 3 ..... Prokofiev
Symphony No. 6 ..... Dvorak

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony brought it to Philharmonic Hall last night. The Dvorak D major is a specialty of Mr. Leinsdorf's, and he is one of the relatively few conductors who has it in his steady repertory. He makes a fine, brave thing out of it, and it is a score that he feels.

He conducts it unfussily, with a big line and a sense of its springing quality. In the second movement those marvelous Boston strings soar away, without a heavy vibrato, cleanly and songfully. Mr. Leinsdorf has seen to it that the players do not slop over the music and everything is kept in emotional proportion. He does so handsomely by this symphony that one wonders why he has not turned his attention to several others of the neglected Dvorak symphonies—No. 5 in F, for instance, as happy a work as the D major, or the stunning No. 3 in E flat.

The opening work was Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, and here Mr. Leinsdorf had a slight surprise. Up to now in the classic symphony he has been taking all the repeats, even such seldom-encountered ones as in the last movement of the "Jupiter" Symphony. But last night he skipped all repeats until the last two movements. Perhaps he felt that the program was too long.

The problem of repeats—to take or not to take?—is one that still has to be satisfactorily worked out by performers and musicologists. In any case, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a bouncing performance of the "Linz," with tempos a shade faster than those used by most conductors, with matters of balance and articulation well in hand. He used a reduced orchestra, as is de rigueur these days, and this was one of the best-adjusted and most convincing Mozart performances he has ever given us.

John Browning was soloist in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3, that favorite work of the younger generation. It remains a sizzler, easily the finest of the Prokofiev concertos for any instrument. Some of the shock value may be gone now, but the spirit of the music is as vital as ever. There even is an amusing touch of romanticism in the second movement: this from one of the most avowedly antiromantic composers of the 20th century.

It is music that exactly fits Mr. Browning's technical and tonal qualities. The piano writing is such that it is fatal to try to "interpret." For the most part you keep on going, piling sonority on sonority, tearing off those very complicated figurations, scooting up and down the keyboard. A pianist like Mr. Browning, whose tone tends toward hardness and who is a little uneasy faced with a long, slow melodic line, should feel quite comfortable in this brilliant, fast-moving music—"age-of-steel" music, it used to be called. And Mr. Browning was indeed comfortable. He ripped off the concerto with brilliant effect, technically secure, musically secure. There was drive to his playing, and unlimited virtuosity. The audience received the performance with cheers, as well it should have.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

DEC 6 1967

CONCERT REVIEW

Browning Plays a Stirring Prokofiev Piano Concerto

NEW YORK — John Browning displayed his brilliant virtuosity as soloist in Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3" with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on Dec. 1. The power and security of the pianist's attack, the stunning pianistic acrobatics all contributed to an exciting performance.

Browning finished recording the work, along with the "Piano Concerto No. 4" with Leinsdorf and the Boston for RCA Victor earlier in the week with a&r producer Richard Mohr. They previously teamed in a Victor coupling of the first two Prokofiev piano concertos. These recordings are part of a long-range Victor plan for Leinsdorf and the Boston to record the complete orchestral music of Prokofiev. Browning previously recorded the "Concerto No. 3" with Leinsdorf and the Philharmonia Orchestra. This album is available on Capitol.

The appreciative audience also was treated to another flashy work as Leinsdorf led his orchestra, one of the world's best, in a glowing robust performance of Dvoark's "Symphony No. 6 (1)." Strings soared, brasses and winds were excellent in this work which should receive more concert play than it gets. And the straightforward manner in which Leinsdorf conducts the symphony is just the way it should be handled.

The program opened with a spirited reading of Mozart's "Symphony No. 36 (Linz), which omitted repeats in the first two movements.

FRED KIRBY

22

TUES A - IV

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program
Tuesday evening November 28 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 36 in C major K. 425 'The Linz'
Adagio – allegro spiritoso
Poco adagio
Menuetto
Presto

PROKOFIEV — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 3 in C major op. 26
Andante – allegro
Theme and variations
Finale: allegro ma non troppo
JOHN BROWNING

INTERMISSION

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 6 in D major op. 60
Allegro non tanto
Adagio
Scherzo (Furiant): presto – Trio
Finale: allegro con spirito

John Browning plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
NOV 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has but one concert scheduled this week in Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the fourth program of the Tuesday Series A concerts at 8:30 beginning with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 36, K. 425, "Linz."

Pianist John Browning will be soloist with Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3. Tuesday's concert will conclude with Symphony No. 6 in D Major by Dvorak.

On Wednesday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin a four day tour during which it will give three concerts in New York and one at Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey. Mr. Browning will perform the Prokofiev concerto in two concerts at Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evenings.

Saturday evening the orchestra will make the first of five appearances this season in New York's Carnegie Hall. For that concert Malcolm Frager will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4.

When the orchestra returns to Symphony Hall Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor for the concerts on Dec. 8 and 9. He will also conduct the orchestra in Providence on Dec. 7. Charles Wilson will conduct the third "Cambridge" concert on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350
NOV 25 1967
New England Newsclip

Music

To Offer Pre-College Piano Recital Sunday

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Miss Christine Brady of this city will offer a pre-college piano recital tomorrow afternoon, at 3 p. m., in Elks hall, Warren Street. Miss Brady, who has outstanding talent, will be assisted by Miss Colleen Louise Phalan, soprano. She will be supported at the piano by Miss Lillian Sullivan.

Mrs. Bernice Bigelow will direct the annual presentation of Handel's "Messiah" which will be performed by members of the Pelham, N. H., Congregational church choir on Sunday evening, Dec. 3, and she will be assisted by Richard Chadwick as organist.

John Browning

Selected soloists and talented choir singers from Lowell who are experienced in the field or oratorio will join the choir. This annual presentation, which ranks among the finest yearly offerings of Handel's superbly created work, is now in its 24th year.

Mrs. Bigelow who is a noted cellist as well as choral director, will play with the Nashua Symphony orchestra in the opening concert of the 1967-68 season Tuesday evening of next week in the high school auditorium of that city. Musicians also from the Greater-Lowell area who will play in this event, an evening at the Pops, include William Thayer of Chelmsford; Margaret Warren, Robin Warren and Roland Warren, of Tyngsboro.

Henry N. Allain, program director for the orchestra, announced that the program would include selections from "My Fair Lady," arrangements of "More from Mondo Cane"; Hoe-Down from Aaron Copland's "Rodeo"; Handel's "Water Music," and specially arranged show and pop tunes.

One of the top events of the season offered by the Andover Celebrity Series is scheduled for Friday evening, December 8, in George Washington Hall, Phillips Academy, when Emlyn Williams, one of the most distinguished artists in the theatrical field today, appears in "Dylan Thomas Growing Up." Mr. Williams, who has delighted thousands of show goers in this excellent vehicle, promises to bring a new high spot to this series, one of the best known throughout New England.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY orchestra has but one concert scheduled for next week in Symphony hall, Boston. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the fourth program of the Tuesday A series, beginning with Mozart's Symphony No. 36, and he has invited John Browning, pianist, as guest soloist. Mr. Browning will perform the Piano Concerto No. 3 by Prokofiev. Concluding the program will be the Symphony No. 6 in D Major by Dvorak.

On Wednesday, the Orchestra wil begin a four day tour during which it will give three concerts in New York and one at Rutgers university, New Brunswick, N. J. Mr. Browning will play the Prokofiev in two concerts listed for Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evenings.

On Saturday evening the Orchestra will make the first of five appearances this season in New York's Carnegie Hall. For that concert Malcolm Frager will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4.

When the Orchestra returns to Symphony Hall, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, will be guest conductor for the concerts of December 8 and 9. He also will conduct the Orchestra in Providence on December 7. Charles Wilson will conduct the third "Cambridge" concert on Tuesday evening, December 5.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000
NOV 30 1967

Music: A Happy Symphony by Dvorak

Leinsdorf Conducts Bostonians Here

Mozart Work Played With a Surprise

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

NOT too many chances to hear the Dvorak D major Symphony come around. The D major used to be known as No. 1, but is now No. 6 in the new listings, because four of Dvorak's early symphonies have been published. No. 1 or No. 6, it is a jewel. It has a few derivations—Brahms, Beethoven, Wagner—but it breathes the uncomplicated spirit of one of the most natural musicians in history. Its melodies breathe, its orchestration is rich without being cloying, its rhythms are spirited. It is a happy symphony.

© Karsh
Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony brought it to Philharmonic Hall last night. The Dvorak D major is a specialty of Mr. Leinsdorf's, and he is one of the relatively few conductors who has it in his steady repertory. He makes a fine, brave thing out of it, and it is a score that he feels.

He conducts it unfussily, with a big line and a sense of its springing quality. In the second movement those marvelous Boston strings soar away, without a heavy vibrato, cleanly and songfully. Mr. Leinsdorf has seen to it that the players do not slop over the music and everything is kept in emotional proportion. He does so handsomely by this symphony that one wonders why he has not turned his attention to several others of the neglected Dvorak symphonies—No. 5 in F, for instance, as happy a work as the D major, or the stunning No. 3 in E flat.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with John Browning, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Symphony No. 36 ..... Mozart
Piano Concerto No. 3 ..... Prokofiev
Symphony No. 6 ..... Dvorak

The opening work was Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, and here Mr. Leinsdorf had a slight surprise. Up to now in the classic symphony he has been taking all the repeats, even such seldom-encountered ones as in the last movement of the "Jupiter" Symphony. But last night he skipped all repeats until the last two movements. Perhaps he felt that the program was too long.

The problem of repeats—to take or not to take?—is one that still has to be satisfactorily worked out by performers and musicologists. In any case, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a bouncing performance of the "Linz," with tempos a shade faster than those used by most conductors, with matters of balance and articulation well in hand. He used a reduced orchestra, as is de rigueur these days, and this was one of the best-adjusted and most convincing Mozart performances he has ever given us.

John Browning was soloist in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3, that favorite work of the younger generation. It remains a sizzler, easily the finest of the Prokofiev concertos for any instrument. Some of the shock value may be gone now, but the spirit of the music is as vital as ever. There even is an amusing touch of romanticism in the second movement: this from one of the most avowedly antiromantic composers of the 20th century.

It is music that exactly fits Mr. Browning's technical and tonal qualities. The piano writing is such that it is fatal to try to "interpret." For the most part you keep on going, piling sonority on sonority, tearing off those very complicated figurations, scooting up and down the keyboard. A pianist like Mr. Browning, whose tone tends toward hardness and who is a little uneasy faced with a long, slow melodic line, should feel quite comfortable in this brilliant, fast-moving music—"age-of-steel" music, it used to be called. And Mr. Browning was indeed comfortable. He ripped off the concerto with brilliant effect, technically secure, musically secure. There was drive to his playing, and unlimited virtuosity. The audience received the performance with cheers, as well it should have.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
DEC 6 1967

CONCERT REVIEW

Browning Plays a Stirring Prokofiev Piano Concerto

NEW YORK — John Browning displayed his brilliant virtuosity as soloist in Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3" with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on Dec. 1. The power and security of the pianist's attack, the stunning pianistic acrobatics all contributed to an exciting performance.

Browning finished recording the work, along with the "Piano Concerto No. 4" with Leinsdorf and the Boston for RCA Victor earlier in the week with a&r producer Richard Mohr. They previously teamed in a Victor coupling of the first two Prokofiev piano concertos. These recordings are part of a long-range Victor plan for Leinsdorf and the Boston to record the complete orchestral music of Prokofiev. Browning previously recorded the "Concerto No. 3" with Leinsdorf and the Philharmonia Orchestra. This album is available on Capitol.

The appreciative audience also was treated to another flashy work as Leinsdorf led his orchestra, one of the world's best, in a glowing robust performance of Dvoark's "Symphony No. 6 (1)." Strings soared, brasses and winds were excellent in this work which should receive more concert play than it gets. And the straightforward manner in which Leinsdorf conducts the symphony is just the way it should be handled.

The program opened with a spirited reading of Mozart's "Symphony No. 36 (Linz), which omitted repeats in the first two movements.

FRED KIRBY

DECEMBER CAMBRIDGE III / PRI-SAT IX 23

Third Program
Tuesday evening December 5 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS — Academic Festival Overture

HENZE — Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto – Tempo giusto – Piu mosso

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso – Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento – Andantino – Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto – Recitativo – Vivo

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
DEC 10 1967
New England Newsclip

Show Guide | MUSIC

4 BSO Concerts Set This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in concerts on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday evenings and Friday afternoon this week. Guest conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski will conduct the Tuesday and Thursday programs and music director Erich Leinsdorf, who returns from a short holiday, will direct the Friday/Saturday concerts.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Leinsdorf will begin the concerts with the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" by Wagner. This will be followed by Elgar's "Falstaff," a work not previously performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The weekend concerts will also include Three German Dances, K. 605 by Mozart; Dvorak's Three Slavonic Dances from Op. 72; and the orchestral suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier." These concerts will be the final ones given by the orchestra prior to the Christmas holidays.

Skrowaczewski's concerts on Tuesday and Thursday will begin with the overture, "Le Corsaire," by Berlioz, continue with Witold Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra, and the concluding work will be Symphony No. 2 by Brahms.

During the week of Dec. 18 the orchestra will be engaged in recording sessions, and there will be no Symphony concerts until Dec. 29. An open rehearsal is scheduled for Thursday evening, Dec. 29.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Ninth Program
Friday afternoon December 8 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 9 at 8.30

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI guest conductor

BERLIOZ — Overture 'Le Corsaire'

LUTOSLAWSKI — Concerto for orchestra
Intrada
Capriccio notturno e arioso
Passacaglia, toccata e corale

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 73
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

The concert will end at about 3.45 on Friday
and at about 10.15 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SYMPHONY: Skrowaczewski Has Flair, Discipline

By McLAREN HARRIS

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski's work on the Symphony podium yesterday afternoon bore the marks of veteran assurance, artistic flair and a solid base of discipline. And, on the other end, so did the orchestra's performance.

In his third engagement with the Symphony (one last season, another at Tanglewood 1966) Skrowaczewski had sufficient opportunity to display his wares—Berlioz's dashing "Le Corsaire" Overture, the energetic Concerto for Orchestra by Witold Lutoslawski and Brahms' Second Symphony for stable fare.

Among Berlioz's overtures the "Roman Carnival" is the runaway favorite in popularity, "Le Corsaire" a strong second to place and perhaps "King Lear" taking third for show. The analogy with horse racing is no mistake, for most of his overtures move with a propulsive thrust here and there, occasionally nearly all the way through, as does "Roman Carnival." Where "Carnival" gallops, "Corsaire" soars via twittering woodwinds, bold flashes of brass and string flourishes (salt-spray, if you wish a pictorial reference to the Byron poem).

Skrowaczewski went all out for brash effect, as befits the legend of a brigand, setting off at nearly a lightning tempo and encouraging full-bodied responses from brass and percussion. It's true there was more emphasis upon spirit than finesse, but I suspect Berlioz would have supported his choice.

The Lutoslawski Concerto, its appearance not unexpected (and quite welcome) on this occasion, owes much to Bartok's work of the same title, we are told by the program.

And it seems true that Lutoslawski may be in Bartok's debt for the general harmonic idiom and in Stravinsky's for rhythmic inspiration; there is even a hint of derivation in the last movement's chorale, recalling a similar strain in Bartok's second movement.

Yet the work is superior to whatever the foregoing may imply, certainly deserving of better than the slight tone of condescension coloring Leonard Marcus' annotations.

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI

The opening movement relies largely on a single melodic configuration, and though much repetition is involved, it avoids tedium by a continued variety of instrumental settings. The initial bass pedal reappears near the end in the opposite register—a static descent of violin harmonics.

The ensuing Capriccio pursues a lightly skittering (good for Marcus) passage in two sections enclosing heavier intonations from the brass, while the finale's passacaglia and toccata work toward a powerful climax through well-engineered counterpoint and a series of accelerating tempos.

The one significant drawback is the concerto's lack of a resting place or contrast in mood. Expecting rare moments all tempos are relatively fast and dynamics often heavy.

Special praise for the orchestra is due here, for it handled the challenging difficulties with complete elan. For a "first," the performance is unsurpassed in my memory.

Skrowaczewski's Brahms was just plain lovely, with much care lavished upon phrase-shaping and bringing out tonal splendor from strings and woodwinds. The tempos were sensible and dynamic balance equisite. But I'm miffed; this was the second time I heard the Second Symphony in two days. Are we yet atoning for that initial awful reception Boston gave it? Please, won't somebody do the Fourth?

Next week's program under Erich Leinsdorf will include Wagner's Prelude to "Tristan," Elgar's "Falstaff," German dances of Mozart, Slavonic dances of Dvorak and Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" suite.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
DEC 9 1967
New England Newsclip

DECEMBER CAMBRIDGE III / PRI-SAT IX 23

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program
Tuesday evening December 5 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS — Academic Festival Overture

HENZE — Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto – Tempo giusto – Piu mosso

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso – Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento – Andantino – Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto – Recitativo – Vivo

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC 310,000
DEC 10 1967
New England Newsclip

Show Guide | MUSIC

4 BSO Concerts Set This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in concerts on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday evenings and Friday afternoon this week. Guest conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski will conduct the Tuesday and Thursday programs and music director Erich Leinsdorf, who returns from a short holiday, will direct the Friday/Saturday concerts.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Leinsdorf will begin the concerts with the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" by Wagner. This will be followed by Elgar's "Falstaff," a work not previously performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The weekend concerts will also include Three German Dances, K. 605 by Mozart; Dvorak's Three Slavonic Dances from Op. 72; and the orchestral suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier." These concerts will be the final ones given by the orchestra prior to the Christmas holidays.

Skrowaczewski's concerts on Tuesday and Thursday will begin with the overture, "Le Corsaire," by Berlioz, continue with Witold Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra, and the concluding work will be Symphony No. 2 by Brahms.

During the week of Dec. 18 the orchestra will be engaged in recording sessions, and there will be no Symphony concerts until Dec. 29. An open rehearsal is scheduled for Thursday evening, Dec. 28.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Ninth Program
Friday afternoon December 8 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 9 at 8.30

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI guest conductor

BERLIOZ — Overture 'Le Corsaire'

LUTOSLAWSKI — Concerto for orchestra
Intrada
Capriccio notturno e arioso
Passacaglia, toccata e corale

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 73
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

The concert will end at about 3.45 on Friday and at about 10.15 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SYMPHONY: Skrowaczewski Has Flair, Discipline

By McLAREN HARRIS

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski's work on the Symphony podium yesterday afternoon bore the marks of veteran assurance, artistic flair and a solid base of discipline. And, on the other end, so did the orchestra's performance.

In his third engagement with the Symphony (one last season, another at Tanglewood 1966) Skrowaczewski had sufficient opportunity to display his wares—Berlioz's dashing "Le Corsaire" Overture, the energetic Concerto for Orchestra by Witold Lutoslawski and Brahms' Second Symphony for stable fare.

Among Berlioz's overtures the "Roman Carnival" is the runaway favorite in popularity, "Le Corsaire" a strong second to place and perhaps "King Lear" taking third for show. The analogy with horse racing is no mistake, for most of his overtures move with a propulsive thrust here and there, occasionally nearly all the way through, as does "Roman Carnival." Where "Carnival" gallops, "Corsaire" soars via twittering woodwinds, bold flashes of brass and string flourishes (salt-spray, if you wish a pictorial reference to the Byron poem).

Skrowaczewski went all out for brash effect, as befits the legend of a brigand, setting off at nearly a lightning tempo and encouraging full-bodied responses from brass and percussion. It's true there was more emphasis upon spirit than finesse, but I suspect Berlioz would have supported his choice.

The Lutoslawski Concerto, its appearance not unexpected (and quite welcome) on this occasion, owes much to Bartok's work of the same title, we are told by the program.

And it seems true that Lutoslawski may be in Bartok's debt for the general harmonic idiom and in Stravinsky's for rhythmic inspiration; there is even a hint of derivation in the last movement's chorale, recalling a similar strain in Bartok's second movement.

Yet the work is superior to whatever the foregoing may imply, certainly deserving of better than the slight tone of condescension coloring Leonard Marcus' annotations.

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI

The opening movement relies largely on a single melodic configuration, and though much repetition is involved, it avoids tedium by a continued variety of instrumental settings. The initial bass pedal reappears near the end in the opposite register—a static descent of violin harmonics.

The ensuing Capriccio pursues a lightly skittering (good for Marcus) passage in two sections enclosing heavier intonations from the brass, while the finale's passacaglia and toccata work toward a powerful climax through well-engineered counterpoint and a series of accelerating tempos.

The one significant drawback is the concerto's lack of a resting place or contrast in mood. Expecting rare moments all tempos are relatively fast and dynamics often heavy.

Special praise for the orchestra is due here, for it handled the challenging difficulties with complete elan. For a "first," the performance is unsurpassed in my memory.

Skrowaczewski's Brahms was just plain lovely, with much care lavished upon phrase-shaping and bringing out tonal splendor from strings and woodwinds. The tempos were sensible and dynamic balance equisite. But I'm miffed; this was the second time I heard the Second Symphony in two days. Are we yet atoning for that initial awful reception Boston gave it? Please, won't somebody do the Fourth?

Next week's program under Erich Leinsdorf will include Wagner's Prelude to "Tristan," Elgar's "Falstaff," German dances of Mozart, Slavonic dances of Dvorak and Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" suite.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
DEC 9 1967
New England Newsclip

24

TUES A – V / THURS A – III

Fifth Program

Tuesday evening December 12 at 8.30

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI guest conductor

BERLIOZ — Overture 'Le Corsaire'

LUTOSLAWSKI — Concerto for orchestra
Intrada
Capriccio notturno e arioso
Passacaglia, toccata e corale

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 73
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

Tues A – V

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

DEC 3 1967 New England Newscip

2 Concerts By Symphony This Week

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music Director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, will make his first Boston appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week's concerts. He previously appeared as guest conductor of the orchestra at Tanglewood in the summer of 1966.

Mr. Skrowaczewski's program for the Symphony Hall concerts of Friday and Saturday will include the first performances at these concerts of Witold Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra. The weekend concerts will begin with Berlioz "Corsaire" Overture with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 as the concluding work.

Prior to his appointment in 1960 as music director in Minneapolis Mr. Skrowaczewski conducted extensively in his native Poland and in this country was guest conductor of the Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and Cincinnati orchestras.

He studied both composition and conducting in Poland and later continued these studies in Paris with Nadja Boulanger and Paul Kletzki. As a composer he has won several important prizes and his work includes four symphonies, four string quartets, one a winner of the International Concours of Composition in Belgium, and a variety of vocal, stage, and screen music.

Third Program

Thursday evening December 14 at 8.30

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI guest conductor

BERLIOZ — Overture 'Le Corsaire'

LUTOSLAWSKI — Concerto for orchestra
Intrada
Capriccio notturno e arioso
Passacaglia, toccata e corale

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 73
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

DEC 8 1967 New England

Skrowaczewski Conducts

Boston Symphony Program In Prov. Again A Delight

Conductors come and conductors go, but the Boston Symphony goes on forever with its faultless music. And Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, guest conductor, with the orchestra in Veterans Memorial Auditorium Thursday night will be welcomed when and if, he comes back again.

Welcomed, indeed, by the musicians and the large audience; and he can play again the exciting and ear-pleasing "Concerto For Orchestra" by his fellow countryman Witold Lutoslawski that was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony here.

Skrowaczewski is currently director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and conducted the Boston Symphony at last year's Berkshire Festival. He has the respect and, apparently the admiration, of this group of artistic musicians.

His program was well chosen. Beginning with the short overture "Le Corsair" by Berlioz (after an embarrassing delay when a patron became ill in the audience just as Skrowaczewski reached the podium) he directed this pleasing number with assurance and intensity.

The Lutoslawski concerto was folksy in theme but symphonic in development; he used discreetly the 12-tone system of harmonics that was surprisingly delightful and rhythmic, and each group of instruments had its opportunity "in the spotlight" including the bass viols and the percussion. The trumpets had some brilliant and sparkling passages, but it was the strings that proved the genius of the composer and the virtuosity of the instrumentalists. The woodwinds, playing alone, were like a bird chorus at nightfall, and the full-orchestra strains were majestically gentle.

Ending the program with the Brahms "Symphony No. 2 in D-Major" with its serene hypnotic and lilting melodies in the allegro non troppo, the oratorio-like adagio, and the happy, sometimes tantalizing allegretto grazioso, that served for a scherzo, the three movements built up to an allegro con spiritoso finale that fairly shouted with joy.

It was one of those programs that made you wish you could take home its recording and play it over and over.

C. H. L.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

DEC 3 1967 New England Newscip

Skrowaczewski To Conduct B.S.O

The Boston Syphony's guest conductor this week will be Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony. His concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 are his first with the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall; he led the orchestra at Tanglewood the Summer of 1966.

Skrowaczewski's program here consists of Berlioz's "Corsaire" Overture, the first Boston Symphony performance of Concerto for Orchestra by the Polish composer, Witold Lutoslawski, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2. This same program will be done Thursday evening in Providence.

Prior to his appointment in 1960 as music director in Minneapolis, Skrowaczewski conducted extensively in his native Poland and in this country was guest conductor of the Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Cincinnati orchestras. He studied both composition and conducting in Poland and later continued these studies in Paris with Nadia Boulanger and Paul Kletzki. As a composer he has won several important prizes and his work includes four symphonies, four string quartets, one a winner of the International Concours of Composition in Belgium, and a variety of vocal, stage and screen music.

24

TUES A – V / THURS A – III

Fifth Program
Tuesday evening December 12 at 8.30

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI guest conductor

BERLIOZ — Overture 'Le Corsaire'

LUTOSLAWSKI — Concerto for orchestra
Intrada
Capriccio notturno e arioso
Passacaglia, toccata e corale

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 73
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

DEC 3 1967 New England Newspapers

2 Concerts By Symphony This Week

Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music Director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, will make his first Boston appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week's concerts. He previously appeared as guest conductor of the orchestra at Tanglewood in the summer of 1966.

Mr. Skrowaczewski's program for the Symphony Hall concerts of Friday and Saturday will include the first performances at these concerts of Witold Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra. The weekend concerts will begin with Berlioz "Corsaire" Overture with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 as the concluding work.

Prior to his appointment in 1960 as music director in Minneapolis Mr. Skrowaczewski conducted extensively in his native Poland and in this country was guest conductor of the Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and Cincinnati orchestras.

He studied both composition and conducting in Poland and later continued these studies in Paris with Nadia Boulanger and Paul Kletzki. As a composer he has won several important prizes and his work includes four symphonies, four string quartets, one a winner of the International Concours of Composition in Belgium, and a variety of vocal, stage, and screen music.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

DEC 8 1967 New England

Skrowaczewski Conducts

Boston Symphony Program In Prov. Again A Delight

Conductors come and conductors go, but the Boston Symphony goes on forever with its faultless music. And Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, guest conductor, with the orchestra in Veterans Memorial Auditorium Thursday night will be welcomed when and if, he comes back again.

Welcomed, indeed, by the musicians and the large audience; and he can play again the exciting and ear-pleasing "Concerto For Orchestra" by his fellow countryman Witold Lutoslawski that was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony here.

Skrowaczewski is currently director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and conducted the Boston Symphony at last year's Berkshire Festival. He has the respect and, apparently the admiration, of this group of artistic musicians.

His program was well chosen. Beginning with the short overture "Le Corsair" by Berlioz (after an embarrassing delay when a patron became ill in the audience just as Skrowaczewski reached the podium) he directed this pleasing number with assurance and intensity.

The Lutoslawski concerto was folksy in theme but symphonic in development; he used discreetly the 12-tone system of harmonics that was surprisingly delightful and rhythmic, and each group of instruments had its opportunity "in the spotlight" including the bass viols and the percussion. The trumpets had some brilliant and sparkling passages, but it was the strings that proved the genius of the composer and the virtuosity of the instrumentalists. The woodwinds, playing alone, were like a bird chorus at nightfall, and the full-orchestra strains were majestically gentle.

Ending the program with the Brahms "Symphony No. 2 in D-Major" with its serene hypnotic and lilting melodies in the allegro non troppo, the oratorio-like adagio, and the happy, sometimes tantalizing allegretto grazioso, that served for a scherzo, the three movements built up to an allegro con spiritoso finale that fairly shouted with joy.

It was one of those programs that made you wish you could take home its recording and play it over and over.

C. H. L.

Third Program
Thursday evening December 14 at 8.30

STANISLAW SKROWACZEWSKI guest conductor

BERLIOZ — Overture 'Le Corsaire'

LUTOSLAWSKI — Concerto for orchestra
Intrada
Capriccio notturno e arioso
Passacaglia, toccata e corale

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 73
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS
CIRC. [illegible]

DEC 3 1967 New England Newspapers

Skrowaczewski To Conduct B.S.O

The Boston Syphony's guest conductor this week will be Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony. His concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 are his first with the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall; he led the orchestra at Tanglewood the Summer of 1966.

Skrowaczewski's program here consists of Berlioz's "Corsaire" Overture, the first Boston Symphony performance of Concerto for Orchestra by the Polish composer, Witold Lutoslawski, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2. This same program will be done Thursday evening in Providence.

Prior to his appointment in 1960 as music director in Minneapolis, Skrowaczewski conducted extensively in his native Poland and in this country was guest conductor of the Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Cincinnati orchestras. He studied both composition and conducting in Poland and later continued these studies in Paris with Nadia Boulanger and Paul Kletzki. As a composer he has won several important prizes and his work includes four symphonies, four string quartets, one a winner of the International Concours of Composition in Belgium, and a variety of vocal, stage and screen music.

The Providence Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 66,826 SUN. 200,259

DEC 8 1967

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony, College Units Perform

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its third concert of the Providence series at Veterans Memorial Auditorium last evening. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra was guest conductor.

It is fortunate for us that he has recovered from his recent serious eye operation so rapidly. His conducting was musicianly throughout the program and easy to watch. He has exceptionally graceful hands which asked in dozens of different ways for an infinite variety of tone color from this fine orchestra, and he was never disappointed. Nor were we.

The program included Berlioz' Overture to "Le Corsair," a first Providence performance of a Concerto for Orchestra by a contemporary Polish composer, Witold Lutoslawski and Symphony No. 2 in D major by Brahms.

The opening Berlioz work was rhythmic and colorful and it gave the listeners a chance to appraise the conducting of the tall, thin figure on the podium. The first impression was one of interest in the graceful hands and then the delicacy of the pianissimo tone which the orchestra produced for him. The brilliant moments of a tonal climax were all the more powerful for their scarcity.

The Lutoslawski Concerto in its opening pages had an inexorably insistent tympani beat around which the strings played short fragments of phrases in canon. There were wide skips in the thematic material and the awkwardly angular phrases soon melted into a mass of delicate tone. The whole fabric was like a gossamer web.

The insistent rhythmic beat intruded again, and this time from a high pitch on the glockenspiel. It was exotic orchestration.

The second section was the most contemporary in sound and, at times, reminded one of an experimental electronic score. Here also we heard the rare tone of a muted tuba, a device which is hard to conceal, tubas being the giants that they are.

The last movement showed the basses off to perfection and the long passage which they presented was one of the unusual tonal treats. The work was well received and its gentle dissonance, so skillfully shaded by the artistry of direction, made this a contemporary work very easy to hear.

The reading which Skrowaczewski gave to the Brahms Second could not have been more grateful in its depth of meaning. It is a favorite in the repertoire of this orchestra, and the guest conductor demonstrated convincingly that music of the romantic school is his field.

There were several recalls for the conductor, and he shared his Providence triumph gracefully with the musicians. Together they made this concert a high point of the musical season.

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Compensations might have the connotation of second best, things you settle for in place of number one. It is pretty certain no one concerned with last evening's performance by the combined Rhode Island College and Barrington College Community Orchestras, under Rober Currier's direction in RIC's Roberts Hall Auditorium, had any idea of being number one. Yet it is no insult at all to say there were compensations aplenty for what might be lacking by way of sophistication.

The program, put on through aid from Rhode Island State Council on the Arts and Recording Industries Trust Funds grants, had more than enough demands which were met honestly and unhesitatingly. It opened, really rather daringly, with a work for strings, Gustav Holst's St. Paul Suite.

Any band exposing itself in this manner deserves a medal for nerve alone. After all, we are not dealing with the Philadelphian mode of suavity, but with a fledgling organization. So what if absolute and utter cohesion was not a paramount attribute, here any more than in the remainder, Currier led the piece with pace and style and his musicians responded accordingly.

Soloist for the evening was Ikuko Mizuno, a young Japanese violinist presently studying with Roman Totenberg at Boston University, who played the Bruch G minor concerto. Miss Mizuno displayed a nice feeling for legato and lyric passages and eschewed any temptation to make the concerto's well-known lushness overblown.

The concert also included Bartok's Romanian Folk Dances and the Slavonic Dance No. 1 of Dvorak. With the strings placed on an apron in front of the proscenium there was somewhat of an acoustical imbalance with the remainder of the orchestra. However that did not prevent the pleasure of hearing brief solo contributions by violinist Barbara Poularikas, flutist Warren Teixeira, and clarinetist Abraham Schwadron in the Bartok, and Miss Poularikas must be commended for her role in the Holst, too.

Indeed commendation goes to the entire affair. As you may guess, these are college and community staffed orchestras, with some members, in fact, coming from the Youth Orchestra of the Rhode Island Philharmonic. To put this kind of music together this well calls for considerable apprecitaion and thanks. The program will be repeated Sunday afternoon at 3 in the West Barrington Junior High School auditorium, with Barbara Poularikas soloist in the Bruch.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 415,250

DEC 9 1967 New England Newspaper

Symphony Devotees Hear Magnificent Polish Music

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, music director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

He introduced a magnificent piece of contemporary Polish music, Witold Lutoslawski's concerto for orchestra. It was a first BSO performance. May it not be the last!

There are three movements, and all are intriguing. What are particularly entrancing are the gorgeous pedal points, but also notable are the various interludes for the orchestral instruments — strings, woodwinds, brasses and percussion.

Skrowaczewski

Curtain-raiser was the Corsair overture of Berlioz, Op. 21, composed at Rome in 1821, but not performed until Apr. 1, 1855, by the St. Cecilia Society. Yesterdays performance was full of drive and projection of Berlioz "brains and brimstone," with a magnificent orchestral climax.

After the interval came Brahms' second symphony (Op. 72, in D), called his pastoral. Though the heroic first symphony is the popular favorite, the gentler second has its worshipers. It was conceived during the composer's sojourn at Portschach, on the lake of Worth, fairly radiating the friendliness of the Austrian countryside. When Theodor Billroth, a friend of the composer, heard this symphony, he exclaimed: "It is all rippling streams, blue sky, sunshine and cool green shades; how beautiful it must be at Portschach!"

And beautiful it must have been, since Brahms returned there again and again to watch "how the mountains all round snow, while the trees are covthe blue lake are white with eved with delicate green."

The guest conductor gave a reading quite in keeping with such thoughts.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 191,400

DEC 11 1967 New England Newspaper

Romantic heyday at Symphony Hall

By Clifford Barnes

It was a romantic heyday Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest conductor Stanislaw Skrowaczewski selected a program of Berlioz, Brahms, and a work by the contemporary Polish composer Lutoslawski, that sounded very much like early Shostakovitch.

Mr. Skrowaczewski is music director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, where he has frequently programed 20th-century compositions. It was fitting for his Boston BSO debut to perform something by a fellow countryman who is keeping Polish music on the present-day concert scene.

Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra can only be considered a concerto because of some degree of virtuosity required of the instrumentalists. It doesn't fit the concerto grosso pattern of several other modern works with that title. At the first performance on this series, the concerto showed itself to be a well-constructed if not a notably inspired piece of music.

Modern heroics

A fugal opening over a steady tympani beat immediately established the serious intent of the Intrada. Then the composer began piling tones on top of each other like blocks. Harmonics on the violins over a sustained pedal evoked a quiet mood at the end.

The second movement, Capriccio notturno e arioso, was an effective technical piece of instrumental writing. The Mendelssohnian first part was contrasted with a brassy trio section. The theme of the final movement, Passacaglia, toccata e corale, was first stated pizzicato by the string basses and harp. At one point, a string quartet alternated with the full ensemble.

The modern heroics of Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra were preceded on the program by an ideal picture of the early-19th-century hero, "Le Corsaire," as depicted by Berlioz in his overture of that title. Here is stormy, "impressionistic" music that never fails to rouse the attention of the listener. The orchestra played it full steam ahead.

Tepid romanticism

The Brahms Second Symphony filled the last half of the concert—a perfect expression of full-blown romanticism. At first, Mr. Skrowaczewski kept a tight rein on the expressive qualities. Dynamics were calculated and measured. The musical sweep was tepid and controlled.

But Brahms invites involvement. By the time the conductor, the orchestra, and the audience got into the music, communication was flowing. Everything was just right for the third movement. The expansive final movement let the listener know that the conductor had an understanding of what Brahms is all about.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 254,100

DEC 9 1967 New England Newspaper

Model Performance By B.S.O., Visitor

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, conductor, performing 'Le Corsair' Overture by Berlioz; Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra; and Brahm's Symphony No. 2. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

If Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, the Boston Symphony's conductor this week-end felt any anxiety about leading the orchestra immediately after the Leinsdorf crisis, this would be understandable. All guest appearances until the appointment of a new permanent conductor will, unhappily, be heard as quasi-auditions. That Skrowaczewski's performances were in no way inferior to the musicianly ones I have heard in the past seems typical of his dependability.

The permanent leader of the Minneapolis orchestra, Skrowaczewski's conducting seems thoroughly reliable and is instructive to watch. There is more going on than Boston audiences are used to, more cues given the players, more gestures of a greater variety, eliciting an immediate change in the orchestra's sound.

Skrowaczewski didn't get the players to play any better than they usually do, which was unfortunate, for the programs novelty, Witold Lutoslawski's 'Concerto for Orchestra,' needs the most virtuosic performance to make us forget its flaws.

The 'Concerto,' begun in 1950 and finished in 1954, has some stunning sections, but is not consistently at its best. It draws heavily on the music of Bartok — his 'Concerto for Orchestra' — and the Stravinsky of the early ballets. Its best movement is the middle one — a scherzo which wastes nothing in making its point and foreshadows the concise, compact style of the composer's latest music.

The reading was a good one, with plently of drive, though, as I mentioned above, lacking in sheer brilliance.

Brahms' Second might have been better if Skrowaczewski had left more alone, particularly transitions between sections. These were almost always fussed with; phrases were over-phrased, for example, and ritards excessively broadened. There were also some not very elegant moments, as when conductor, orchestra and audience stumbled into the last movement development section. But for the most part the Symphony received a model performance, not one that was terribly instructive, but well-played and solidly led. Ditto for Berlioz's 'Corsair' overture, the afternoon's opener.

26

FRI - SAT — XX

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Tenth Program
Friday afternoon December 15 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 16 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER Tristan und Isolde – Prelude

ELGAR Falstaff – symphonic study for orchestra op. 68
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

MOZART Three German dances K. 605
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

DVOŘÁK Slavonic dances from op. 72
no. 2 Allegretto grazioso
no. 6 Moderato, quasi menuetto
no. 8 Grazioso e lento, ma non troppo, quasi tempo di valse

STRAUSS Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier'

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

587

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

DEC 16 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Superb At Symphony Hall

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Many in Friday afternoon's audience at Symphony Hall stood to greet Erich Leinsdorf when he appeared on stage for his first concert since the announcement of his resignation as music director of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf then went on to earn our gratitude with beautiful performances of two wonderful pieces one hears too rarely—Wagner's "Tristan" Prelude and Elgar's symphonic study, "Falstaff."

I call the "Tristan" Prelude rare because Mr. Leinsdorf conducted not the familiar concert excerpts in which the Prelude goes into the third-act finale (with or without soprano)—the situation is further confused because "Liebestod," the name by which we know that finale, was Wagner's name for the Prelude—but gave us instead a version of the Prelude alone with a concert-ending by Wagner.

The concert version departs from the prelude as it occurs in the opera 10 measures after the climax, and it was Wagner's idea to compose something that would convey the atmosphere and feeling and use the music of the opera's last measures, but adapting the material to the scale, the harmonic order and the texture of the Prelude. This concert-ending of Wagner's is, both as music and as poetry, of an extraordinary compositional and imaginative subtlety, and in its delicate, chamber-musical way, of a remarkable sensuous beauty as well.

Karl Muck used to conduct this version of the Prelude often, and Nikisch and Henschel before him, but, though Mr. Leinsdorf conducted it at Tanglewood in 1964, it has probably not been heard in Boston in 50 years. Its return made a lovely freshening of the program, and, except that like most conductors he hurried over the silences at the beginning a bit, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a grandly sustained performance, and one with exceptionally fine orchestral playing, too.

"Falstaff" is an acute, delicate, compassionate, unsentimental portrait, and, as such, I think it has its only peer in Strauss's 16 years older "Don Quixote." Elgar is less given to putting real toads into his imaginary garden than Strausss, but to get the most out of "Falstaff," it is worth having the "Henry IV" plays close to the surface of your mind. The musical design is, with that of the A flat Symphony, Elgar's work at its greatest pitch of intellectual vigor and bold fantasy; the orchestral writing, subdued and with the characteristic Elgarian sumptuousness sparingly exploited, is colorful and deliciously virtuosic, mostly in ways that are far from obvious.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted "Falstaff" with masterful control of direction and shape, with warmth and humor, and with sensitive feeling for the subject of the portrait and for the painter's restrained way with that subject. Some of the playing of this extremely difficult score was a bit rough and unfinished sounding; much more of it, though, was excellent, and I have heard the two interludes—the young Falstaff as the Duke of Norfork's page, and the scene in Shallow's orchard — given with such delicacy.

After intermission things went downhill, rather, except for the fine playing of three touching and quiet Slavonic Dances by Dvorak, all from the less familiar second set, Op. 72. The second half began with limp performances of three German dances by Mozart, K. 605, the set that includes the familiar sleighride piece. It ended with a new suite from Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier," stitching by assistant conductor Charles Wilson. It was different from, and in some ways an improvement on, the standard "Rosenkavalier" suite, but I still found myself frustrated by the lack of words and action, and by the imposition on the pretty tunes of a sense of pace and form alien to them.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

DEC 18 1967 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf's light-hearted program

By Craig Stinson

Erich Leinsdorf was greeted with a standing ovation at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon—and then went on to earn it. It was both the first concert since the conductor announced his retirement and the last concert before Christmas. If ever there had been ill will between conductor and players, it was not apparent from the performances on this occasion.

The program was the kind in which Mr. Leinsdorf has nearly always done well. He began with a wonderfully lugubrious performance of the Prelude to Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Leinsdorf chose the concert ending to the Prelude, rather than the more customary procedure of tacking on the entire "Liebestod" section.

Elgar's "Falstaff," the large, if not the major work of the day, is a kind of English "Heldenleben." As in the Strauss, specific musical ideas are associated with specific persons and events to depict a personal history. Whether or not Elgar, like Strauss, identifies himself with his hero is not made clear.

Most of the dramatic ideas, in fact, make little sense on first hearing without a scorecard. The work, however, is full of good orchestral fun — complete with snoring bassoons — and might bear further hearing.

New 'Rosenkavalier' suite

The second half of the program consisted of Central European dances of various species, three "Teutsche" by Mozart, K. 605, three numbers from Dvořák's second set of Slavonic dances, and a suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." The latter was a different suite from the one usually performed, omitting the entire third-act trio scene and concluding with the opera's original ending, instead of a rehash of the second-act waltz. The Mozart set included one number appropriate for the season, with sleighbells and posthorns.

None of this music requires any great depth of emotional involvement. But it cannot be performed as charmingly as the Boston Symphony did this weekend without a sure understanding of all its stylistic subtelty.

26

FRI - SAT — X

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Tenth Program

Friday afternoon December 15 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 16 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER Tristan und Isolde – Prelude

ELGAR Falstaff – symphonic study for orchestra op. 68
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

MOZART Three German dances K. 605
First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

DVOŘÁK Slavonic dances from op. 72
no. 2 Allegretto grazioso
no. 6 Moderato, quasi menuetto
no. 8 Grazioso e lento, ma non troppo, quasi tempo di valse

STRAUSS Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier'

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
DEC 16 1967
New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Superb At Symphony Hall

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Many in Friday afternoon's audience at Symphony Hall stood to greet Erich Leinsdorf when he appeared on stage for his first concert since the announcement of his resignation as music director of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf then went on to earn our gratitude with beautiful performances of two wonderful pieces one hears too rarely—Wagner's "Tristan" Prelude and Elgar's symphonic study, "Falstaff."

I call the "Tristan" Prelude rare because Mr. Leinsdorf conducted not the familiar concert excerpts in which the Prelude goes into the third-act finale (with or without soprano)—the situation is further confused because "Liebestod," the name by which we know that finale, was Wagner's name for the Prelude—but gave us instead a version of the Prelude alone with a concert-ending by Wagner.

The concert version departs from the prelude as it occurs in the opera 10 measures after the climax, and it was Wagner's idea to compose something that would convey the atmosphere and feeling and use the music of the opera's last measures, but adapting the material to the scale, the harmonic order and the texture of the Prelude. This concert-ending of Wagner's is, both as music and as poetry, of an extraordinary compositional and imaginative subtlety, and in its delicate, chamber-musical way, of a remarkable sensuous beauty as well.

Karl Muck used to conduct this version of the Prelude often, and Nikisch and Henschel before him, but, though Mr. Leinsdorf conducted it at Tanglewood in 1964, it has probably not been heard in Boston in 50 years. Its return made a lovely freshening of the program, and, except that like most conductors he hurried over the silences at the beginning a bit, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a grandly sustained performance, and one with exceptionally fine orchestral playing, too.

"Falstaff" is an acute, delicate, compassionate, unsentimental portrait, and, as such, I think it has its only peer in Strauss's 16 years older "Don Quixote." Elgar is less given to putting real toads into his imaginary garden than Strausss, but to get the most out of "Falstaff," it is worth having the "Henry IV" plays close to the surface of your mind. The musical design is, with that of the A flat Symphony, Elgar's work at its greatest pitch of intellectual vigor and bold fantasy; the orchestral writing, subdued and with the characteristic Elgarian sumptuousness sparingly exploited, is colorful and deliciously virtuosic, mostly in ways that are far from obvious.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted "Falstaff" with masterful control of direction and shape, with warmth and humor, and with sensitive feeling for the subject of the portrait and for the painter's restrained way with that subject. Some of the playing of this extremely difficult score was a bit rough and unfinished sounding; much more of it, though, was excellent, and I have heard the two interludes—the young Falstaff as the Duke of Norfolk's page, and the scene in Shallow's orchard — given with such delicacy.

After intermission things went downhill, rather, except for the fine playing of three touching and quiet Slavonic Dances by Dvorak, all from the less familiar second set, Op. 72. The second half began with limp performances of three German dances by Mozart, K. 605, the set that includes the familiar sleighride piece. It ended with a new suite from Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier," stitching by assistant conductor Charles Wilson. It was different from, and in some ways an improvement on, the standard "Rosenkavalier" suite, but I still found myself frustrated by the lack of words and action, and by the imposition on the pretty tunes of a sense of pace and form alien to them.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
DEC 1 1967
New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf's light-hearted program

By Craig Stinson

Erich Leinsdorf was greeted with a standing ovation at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon—and then went on to earn it. It was both the first concert since the conductor announced his retirement and the last concert before Christmas. If ever there had been ill will between conductor and players, it was not apparent from the performances on this occasion.

The program was the kind in which Mr. Leinsdorf has nearly always done well. He began with a wonderfully lugubrious performance of the Prelude to Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Leinsdorf chose the concert ending to the Prelude, rather than the more customary procedure of tacking on the entire "Liebestod" section.

Elgar's "Falstaff," the large, if not the major work of the day, is a kind of English "Heldenleben." As in the Strauss, specific musical ideas are associated with specific persons and events to depict a personal history. Whether or not Elgar, like Strauss, identifies himself with his hero is not made clear.

Most of the dramatic ideas, in fact, make little sense on first hearing without a score-card. The work, however, is full of good orchestral fun — complete with snoring bassoons — and might bear further hearing.

New 'Rosenkavalier' suite

The second half of the program consisted of Central European dances of various species, three "Teutsche" by Mozart, K. 605, three numbers from Dvořák's second set of Slavonic dances, and a suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." The latter was a different suite from the one usually performed, omitting the entire third-act trio scene and concluding with the opera's original ending, instead of a rehash of the second-act waltz. The Mozart set included one number appropriate for the season, with sleighbells and posthorns.

None of this music requires any great depth of emotional involvement. But it cannot be performed as charmingly as the Boston Symphony did this weekend without a sure understanding of all its stylistic subtelty.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

DEC 16 1967

New England Newsclip

Symphony

Orchestra, Audience Give Leinsdorf Warm Welcome

By McLAREN HARRIS

After the volleys of quotes, printed information and whispering which followed Erich Leinsdorf's announcement of his impending resignation, many symphony-goers must have been curious to discover what his manner and reception would be upon ascending the podium after an absence of three weeks.

The orchestra answered that question. At Leinsdorf's appearance at the stage door the players stood up in a body. Relieved, happy and applauding warmly, yesterday's audience following suit. On the surface and in the ensuing performances the concert was like a new beginning — freshly spirited and light of heart.

The last works on the program contributed to the mood of approaching holidays: Three German Dances of Mozart's K. 605, cheery affairs concluding with a "sleighride" decorated with bells and posthorn ("Die Schlittenfahrt." the German equivalent, looks better than it sounds); three Slavonic Dances (2, 6 and 8) from Op. 72 of Dvorak, cast in the rhythmic-harmonic style of East European folk dances (inconsequential to us, real money-makers for Dvorak); and a suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

The principal work (in terms of length, anyway) was Edward Elgar's symphonic study, "Falstaff." Elgar's subject of English legend is not the Falstaff of Verdi but of Shakespeare in "Henry IV" — a pathetic though earnest caricature of knighthood, an unrefined jester in both mind and body but not entirel ydevoid of sympathy or nobility.

In its programmatic aspects, Elgar's work resembles "Don Quixot" without the variations or "Till Eulenspiegel" without its wry humor. Opening with the comaraderie of Falstaff and "Prince Hal," it progresses through the revelry at the Boar's Head, confrontation with an unnamed army, news of Henry's coronation, the king's repudiation of Falstaff and the "hero's" subsequent death.

Along the way some of the composer's most dynamic moments are revealed, as well as wit: bassoon and contrabass imitations of Falstaff's snores, the mocking character of Falstaff's march, a "pipe and tabor" episode during his return from battle, the tender dream interlude following the Boar's Head sequence, and the headlong ride to London.

As with many an episodic work it gives impressions of ending long before it actually does. Perhaps it is indeed overlong, but its situational variety, moments of iight substance and pointed orchestration qualify "Falstaff" as among Elgar's best.

Preceding Elgar, the Prelude from Wagner's "Tristan" went exceedingly well, beginning with a quiet consistence in the strings which built into eloquent, laige-period phrases during the crescendo, then expiring in peaceful resignation. Some of us may not appreciate the grafting of "Tristan's" end onto its beginning. But Wagner, like Strauss, had a commercial instinct and was amenable to preparing concert excerpts; the "Liebestod" provided a convenient and suitable conclusion to the ambiguous Prelude.

At any rate it works better than Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" suite which, augmented with some Act III music, still sounds like a simple favorite-theme medley.

Except for some tepid moments in the Dvorak dances, which are lukewarm anyway, the orchestra was excellent all afternoon. The "Falstaff" was as tightly-knit and energetic as one could wish. There was little mistaking the welcome for Leinsdorf.

On Dec. 29-30, after a week of recording and vacation for the musicians, Leinsdorf will conduct Telemann's Flute and Violin Concerto in A, with James Pappoutsakis and Alfred Krips; Bach's Cantata 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," with Beverly Wolff as soloist; and a suite from Handel's "Water Music."

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.

DEC 16 1967

New England Newsclip

Elgar's Falstaff Given In Fine BSO Presentation

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Sir Edward Elgar's powerful and imaginative symphonic study, Falstaff (Op. 68), was yesterday afternoon's featured presentation in a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~conducted by~~ Erich Leinsdorf. The titular figure, depicted so magnificently, is, in sooth, Shakespeare's roistering rapscallion, rowdy and jocular, a lusty, beefeating Cyrano de Bergerac.

It is all-out program music whose literary inspiration is not the obese butt of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," but the Falstaff of "Henry IV (1 & 2)" and "Henry V," repudiated by bluff Prince Hal when he became monarcharch of the Lancastrian land - grab. Indeed, the composer flouts the image of Sir John elicited in "The Merr Wives," that caricature which, unluckily, is better known to English and American playgoers that the real Falstaff, who actually existed as Sir John Fastolf. Elgar prefers, instead, to cloak his hero with the virtues implicit in three words—knight, gentleman and soldier.

Sir Edw. Elgar

It is quite obvious, from Elgar's own words, that he himself needed no ideological support of his hero from sources outside his own imagination and understanding an dthough his discussion i sabundantly interspersed with quotations from many writers, the listener may look upon them as additional ancilleries to the comprehension of Elgar's Falstaff.

Dr. Leinsdorf gave a superb account of this score, quite as cogent as one this reporter heard in London towscore years ago, conducted by the composer. Humor, drama, nobility and pathos were evoked from our great orchestra. It is doubtful if future critics will place Elgar's symphonies and concert beside his Falstaff and Enigma Variation, or Vaughan Williams' symphonies beside Flos Campi and Job.

Curtain-raiser was the hypererotic, ultrachromatic prelude to Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," a non-agitato exposition of the let-Wagner-have-his-head school."

There was no elegiac tenderness, but the presentation made musical sense without undue musical fervor.

After the interval, there was a first BSO performance of Mozart's three German dances (KV-605), sprightly and crisply played by an attenuated orchestra, followedby three of Dvorak's Slavonic dances from Opus 7. These were numbers two, six and eight, the first and last of these being perhaps more familiar to music lovers in the Fritz Kreisler transcriptions. Dr. Leinsdorf and his musicians gave a high-powered account of these dances.

In conclusion came a lively performance of the suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" of Richard Strauss. hTe reading was rather schmaltzy, though the exposition was marked by magnificent elan. Did Dr. Leinsdorf lunch on Wiener schnitzel, Sacher torte and coffee with whipped cream? In any case, the performance was full of Wiener Blut.

28

FRI-SAT A XI XI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Eleventh Program

Friday afternoon December 29 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 30 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

TELEMANN — Concerto in A major for flute and violin
Largo
Allegro
Gratioso
Allegro
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS flute
ALFRED KRIPS violin

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BACH — Cantata no. 35 'Geist und Seele wird verwirret' for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato
BEVERLY WOLFF contralto

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

HANDEL — Suite from 'The Water Music'
Ouverture [Largo-Allegro]
Adagio e staccato
[Allegro] – Andante – [Allegro]
Air
Menuet
Bourrée
Hornpipe
[Allegro]
[Allegro]
Alla hornpipe

CHARLES WILSON organ and harpsichord
NEWTON WAYLAND harpsichord
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
HENRY PORTNOI double bass

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HELLENIC CHRONICLE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 22,050

DEC 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Pappoutsakis

Pappoutsakis Given Weekend Concerts Role

James Pappoutsakis has been invited by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as one of two associate principals for the New Year's weekend concert at Symphony Hall.

Pappoutsakis and Alfred Krips in Telemann's Concerto in A Major for flute and violin, Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Their performance will launch the concert program, following which the orchestra will offer Handel's "Water Music." Miss Beverly Wolff, soloist, will appear in the Bach cantata No. 35.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

DEC 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Show Guide | MUSIC

Two Concerts By Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen a Baroque program for the orchestra's two Symphony Hall concerts prior to the New Year.

For the Friday-Saturday programs Mr. Leinsdorf has invited two associate principals, Alfred Krips and James Pappoutsakis, and mezzo-soprano Beverly Wolff to be soloists.

The weekend concerts will begin with Messrs. Pappoutsakis and Krips performing Telemann's Concerto in A for flute and violin. This will be followed by Handel's Water Music which Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will play in the original form.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

DEC 24 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Baroque

The Boston Symphony's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week will be devoted to music of the baroque period. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The A major Telemann Concerto for Flute and Violin will have associate principals James Pappoutsakis and Alfred Krips as soloists. Mezzo - soprano Beverly Wolff will be soloist in the Bach Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret." After intermission will come a Suite from Handel's Water Music. There will be an open rehearsal of this program Thursday at 7:30.

Following the orchestra's regular policy, half of the players will be on vacation in the week between the Christmas and New Year's holidays. The balance of the orchestra will be vacationing during a week in mid-February at which time Leinsdorf has scheduled performances of Haydn's "The Creation."

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 250

DEC 30 1967 New England Newsclip

Baroque Music Concert Is Presented by BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Beauteous Beverly Wolff was featured vocalist at yesterday afternoon's spectacular all-Baroque concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. She sang in the first BSO performance of Bach's 35th cantata, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret" (Spirit and soul are put in turmoil), for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato.

Beverly Wolff

Hers is a flexible and well-controlled alto voice, as warm as the gorgeous emerald - lake gown which she wore with appropriate aplomb. It is a characteristic Bach cantata, divided into two parts: sinfonia, aria, recitative, aria; sinfonia, recitative, aria.

The first aria is characterized by an extremely flowery organ part, played most capably by Ass't. Conductor Charles Wilson, against which the expressive, more sustained vocal line is contrasted. In the second the might and justic of God is praised, demanding the more confident mood implied by use of a major key and by the vigorous scale and arpeggio configurations in the organ.

It being the holiday season, only a half-sized orchestra was employed.

Curtain-raiser was a concerto (in A) for flute, violin and strings with harpsichord continuo (Newton Wayland) from the pen of Bach's prolific contemporary and rival, Georg-Philipp Telemann. A score of years ago Telemann was only a footnote in musical history and, so far as this annotator is concerned, might just as well have remained so.

His double concerto is an unmitigated bore, lacking in inspiration and musical animation. Admittedly, the fiddling and fluting by Ass't Concertmaster Alfred Krips and James Pappoutsakis calls for the highest superlatives of praise and they were expertly supported by their orchestral colleagues and conductor.

The mellow brilliance of Pappoutsakis' tone, as wel las the magnificant poise and assurance of Krips' artistry, were everywhere apparent even though the music was rather banal. Dr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra with sensitivity.

After the interval excerpts from Handel's 20-movement "Water Music" suite were presented in Dr. Leinsdorf's own arrangement. His re-creation of this extensive masterpiece was imaginative. The score requires flutes, horns and trumpets in addition to the usual oboes and strings and these instruments lend their particular character to the movements in which they are used. This music was not intended to be anything more than light music, but it is light music of the very highest quality.

Dr. Leinsdorf and his attenuated orchestra were bright, vigorous and virile in a sparkling performance, played with finesse.

28

FRI – SAT XI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Eleventh Program

Friday afternoon December 29 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 30 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

TELEMANN — Concerto in A major for flute and violin
Largo
Allegro
Gratioso
Allegro
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS flute
ALFRED KRIPS violin

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BACH — Cantata no. 35 'Geist und Seele wird verwirret' for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato
BEVERLY WOLFF contralto

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

HANDEL — Suite from 'The Water Music'
Ouverture [Largo-Allegro]
Adagio e staccato
[Allegro] – Andante – [Allegro]
Air
Menuet
Bourrée
Hornpipe
[Allegro]
[Allegro]
Alla hornpipe

CHARLES WILSON organ and harpsichord
NEWTON WAYLAND harpsichord
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
HENRY PORTNOI double bass

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

651

HELLENIC CHRONICLE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 33,050

DEC 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Pappoutsakis

Pappoutsakis Given Weekend Concerts Role

James Pappoutsakis has been invited by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as one of two associate principals for the New Year's weekend concert at Symphony Hall.

Pappoutsakis and Alfred Krips in Telemann's Concerto in A Major for flute and violin, Friday at 2 p.m. and Saturday at 8.30 p.m. Their performance will launch the concert program, following which the orchestra will offer Handel's "Water Music." Miss Beverly Wolff, soloist, will appear in the Bach cantata No. 35.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

DEC 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Show Guide | MUSIC

Two Concerts By Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen a Baroque program for the orchestra's two Symphony Hall concerts prior to the New Year.

For the Friday-Saturday programs Mr. Leinsdorf has invited two associate principals, Alfred Krips and James Pappoutsakis, and mezzo-soprano Beverly Wolff to be soloists.

The weekend concerts will begin with Messrs. Pappoutsakis and Krips performing Telemann's Concerto in A for flute and violin. This will be followed by Handel's Water Music which Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will play in the original form.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.

DEC 24 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Baroque

The Boston Symphony's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week will be devoted to music of the baroque period. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The A major Telemann Concerto for Flute and Violin will have associate principals James Pappoutsakis and Alfred Krips as soloists. Mezzo - soprano Beverly Wolff will be soloist in the Bach Cantata No. 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret." After intermission will come a Suite from Handel's Water Music. There will be an open rehearsal of this program Thursday at 7:30.

Following the orchestra's regular policy, half of the players will be on vacation in the week between the Christmas and New Year's holidays. The balance of the orchestra will be vacationing during a week in mid-February at which time Leinsdorf has scheduled performances of Haydn's "The Creation."

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS

DEC 29 1967 New England Newsclip

Baroque Music Concert Is Presented by BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Beauteous Beverly Wolff was featured vocalist at yesterday afternoon's spectacular all-Baroque concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. She sang in the first BSO performance of Bach's 35th cantata, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret" (Spirit and soul are put in turmoil), for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato.

Beverly Wolff

Hers is a flexible and well-controlled alto voice, as warm as the gorgeous emerald - lake gown which she wore with appropriate aplomb. It is a characteristic Bach cantata, divided into two parts: sinfonia, aria, recitative, aria; sinfonia, recitative, aria.

The first aria is characterized by an extremely flowery organ part, played most capably by Ass't. Conductor Charles Wilson, against which the expressive, more sustained vocal line is contrasted. In the second the might and justic of God is praised, demanding the more confident mood implied by use of a major key and by the vigorous scale and arpeggio configurations in the organ.

It being the holiday season, only a half-sized orchestra was employed.

Curtain-raiser was a concerto (in A) for flute, violin and strings with harpsichord continuo (Newton Wayland) from the pen of Bach's prolific contemporary and rival, Georg-Philipp Telemann. A score of years ago Telemann was only a footnote in musical history and, so far as this annotator is concerned, might just as well have remained so.

His double concerto is an unmitigated bore, lacking in inspiration and musical animation. Admittedly, the fiddling and fluting by Ass't Concertmaster Alfred Krips and James Pappoutsakis calls for the highest superlatives of praise and they were expertly supported by their orchestral colleagues and conductor.

The mellow brilliance of Pappoutsakis' tone, as wel las the magnificant poise and assurance of Krips' artistry, were everywhere apparent even though the music was rather banal. Dr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra with sensitivity.

After the interval excerpts from Handel's 20-movement "Water Music" suite were presented in Dr. Leinsdorf's own arrangement. His re-creation of this extensive masterpiece was imaginative. The score requires flutes, horns and trumpets in addition to the usual oboes and strings and these instruments lend their particular character to the movements in which they are used. This music was not intended to be anything more than light music, but it is light music of the very highest quality.

Dr. Leinsdorf and his attenuated orchestra were bright, vigorous and virile in a sparkling performance, played with finesse.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 80,000

DEC 30 1967 New England

SYMPHONY

Symphony in Fine Performance While Half Its Cast Vacations

By McLAREN HARRIS

Year's end is a time for retrospection, and the Boston Symphony chose this weekend's programs to look back — over 200 years back — to Baroque works by Telemann, Bach and Handel.

There is another reason for the timing. Half the orchestra is on vacation this week and the remainder suits the Baroque nicely (this half will vacation during the "Creation" performances in February). By coincidence or otherwise most of the principals were among the missing, and the musical result, in all cases but one I can think of, was a distinct compliment to the members who make up the body of each section.

Unlike its solo exponents — James Pappoutsakis, flute, and Alfred Krips, violin — Telemann's Concerto in A minor is a variable creation. Telemann often called the Hindemith of his day (how is that for reversal?), was among the most prolific of composers and wrote music for every conceivable occasion. His expertise and craftsmanship were sufficient to fill each measure, but his inspiration was not. Though his slow movements offer sublimity and beauty the quicker sections often lapse into stylistic anonymity, having few distinguishing features besides a lively tempo.

The opening Largo, the Gratioso and the quiescent middle section of the first Allegro are this concerto's saving graces — especially the latter two, which employ a solo cello (Martin Hoberman) on equal terms with flute and violin. The pizzicato accompaniment of the last and the lilt of the Gratioso are fully disarming; but the Allegros proper are of limited interest at the outset and are further despoiled by lengthy da capos.

The soloists, however, were not dulled. Though — Pappoutsakis had some difficulty in the beginning penetrating the ensemble from his seat behind Erich Leinsdorf, the balance improved with time.

The following solo Cantata 35 of Bach, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," featured contralto Beverly Wolff, but as things turned out more attention appeared focused upon the moderate-size positiv organ on stage which furnished obbligato lines in several movements. Built by Fritz Noack, the organ can furnish a variety of timbres from pointed to mellow at sufficiently low or high volumes, but its greatest advantage in the cantata setting is in its tight, sensitive, no-lag response.

In the opening sinfonia the organ's singular lead, in non-blending, oboe-like tones, seemed almost out of place; but its rippling accompaniment to Miss Wolff's second aria, "Gott hat Alles wohl gemacht," delightfully encouraged forward momentum.

I have no intent to pass over Miss Wolff; her voice has the pleasant lightness of a mezzo, and the complete loss of tonal warmth which occurs when she reaches for the lowest notes convinces me that a mezzo is what she really is. Yet in passages involving no such reaching she proved strong, accurate in pitch and rhythm, clear in diction. Organist-assistant conductor Charles Wilson deservedly shared recognition with Miss Wolff and Leinsdorf, as did harpsichordist Newton Wayland.

Leinsdorf and the Symphony closed the program with a suite encompassing many familiar movements from Handel's Water Music, supposedly utilizing the original orchestration, though the proportion of strings to winds was undoubtedly lesser in Handel's time.

Every conductor has his own ideas about tempos in Handel, as well as how to phrase the opening French overture. There was nothing startling (or exciting, I admit) about Leinsdorf's rendition. The Air enjoyed a walking pace and the Bourree-Hornpipe (with intermittent oboe-playing) was lively, though alternating the instrumentation at repeats instead of after entire sections would be more interesting. The trumpet and horn work was brilliant.

On next week's programs are Haydn's Symphony No. 24 in D, Goffredo Petrassi's Partita for Orchestra and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, after which Leinsdorf departs on his midwinter vacation.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,050

DEC 24 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Schedules Baroque Music

BOSTON — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen a baroque program for the Orchestra's two Symphony Hall concerts prior to the New Year.

Two Soloists

For the Friday-Saturday programs Leinsdorf has invited two associate principals, Alfred Krips and James Pappoutsakis, and mezzo-soprano Beverly Wolff to be soloists.

The weekend concerts will begin with Pappoutsakis and Krips performing Telemann's Concerto in A for flute and violin. This will be followed by Handel's Water Music which Leinsdorf and the orchestra will play in the original form.

The concluding music on the pre-holiday program consists of Bach's Cantata No. 35 with Miss Wolff as soloist. All three of the weekend soloists have performed on many past occasions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Haydn Performance

Following the orchestra's regular policy, half of the players will be on vacation in the week between the Christmas and New Year's holidays. The balance of the orchestra will be vacationing during a week in mid-February at which time Leinsdorf has scheduled performances of Haydn's "The Creation."

The third Open Rehearsal of the current season takes place on Thursday evening at 7:30.

The complete programs:

Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday evening at 8:30.

Telemann, Concerto in A Major for Flute and Violin James Pappoutsakis, Alfred Krips.

Bach, Cantata No. 35 "Geist und Seele wird verwirret" Beverly Wolff, soloist.

Handel, A Suite from "The Water Music."

The Music Bo...

BOSTON GLOBE
DEC 29, 1967

Ex-Trumpet Player Symphony Vocalist

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

I had heard somewhere that mezzo-sopranon Beverly Wolff, soloist with the Boston Symphony this week-end and next Tuesday in Bach's Cantata No. 35, once played trumpet with the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra. That proved only to be someone's inventive marriage of two facts: she comes from Atlanta, which one hears in her speech, and she used to play the trumpet, which she says at least half-seriously can be heard in her singing. "Sometimes I think I'm still trying to sound like a trumpet, and I have to tell myself to relax."

She was born in Atlanta, the 10th of 11 children. "My mother was a nut on the piano, and she had the idea that we should all do something musical and have family music together." A trumpet was brought for an older sister, who rejected it, and the instrument fell to the at least then more malleable Beverly. She sees much of her childhood determined by the educational tendencies of her older brothers and sisters — 'let's see what we can teach Beverly today"— and she does not regret the varied and somewhat unstructured form her education took, especially the reading of good books they got her into at a very early age. The trumpet, at any rate, is a thing of the past; she made her farewell to it at 17 when she and some brass-playing friends were to play Bach chorales, discovering, after vigorous rehearsal, that no one had the lip to manage the top line, so that Bach was left all accompaniment and no tune.

BEVERLY WOLFF
. . . soloist

She attended the University of Georgia at its Atlanta campus, majoring in literature. Then, feeling the need for better voice teaching than was available at home, she went on to the Academy of Vocal Arts in Philadelphia. Almost as soon as her career had begun, she retired from singing, devoting her energies to her marriage and to her two sons. She recalls during those years singing an incredible number of performances of the Brahms "Alto Rhapsody around the South, wherever there was some sort of an orchestra and somebody had a few boys to sing the choral part. Fortunately, there were freinds, among whom she remembers the Washington conductor and organist Paul Callaway with special gratitude, that would let her not stagnate, insisting that she keep studying and learning new repertory.

The new career, which involves operatic and orchestral arrangements all over the country, dates to the early 60s. To combine professional and home life is always difficult, and Miss Wolff feels that even beyond that being sufficiently aggressive to have a successful career and retaining an essential femininity is a nearly impossible combination. She herself is radiantly and delightfully feminine, and the operatic roles that she feels particularly close to include some of the most intensely womanly ones, Judith in Bartoks "Bluebeards Castle" for example, and Charlotte in Massenets "Werther. She notes, though, that there are more and more good singers all the time, and that the atmosphere daily becomes more dog-eat-dog.

A great aid to survival is having her private life take on an atmosphere removed from the mainstream of musical careerism. She, her husband, who is treasurer of a manufacturing company, and her two boys now 13 and 11, live in Lakeland, Fla., where they recently moved from Sumter, S.C. "It even makes it possible for me to like other mezzos."

The ARTS

Generosity toward colleagues comes easily to Beverly Wolff, and during our conversation she expressed admiration for many other singers, including soprano Berely Sills, a New York City Opera colleague for whom she feels deep personal affection as well; mezzos Jennie Tourel ("she doesn't know it, but she's my teacher really"); Giulietta Simmionato ("the voice that never gets out of control"); Marilyn Horne ("she's really half a soprano, though"); tenor Ernst Haefliter ("I just stand there and am amazed, and he has the greatest rhythm of any singer I know") and bass Ezio Flagello, both of whom were soloists with her in the "Damnation of Faust" with the New York Philharmonic recently. The conductor then was William Steinberg, one of the musicians she most admires.

What she looks for in the conductor is a colleague who both stimulates and restrains—"I get carried away and I do need restraining"— and someone who listens to and responds to the soloist.

"We singers aren't the dumb clucks any more we're made out to be, and there's nothing worse than the conductors who treat us without respect, who just lay down the law, who don't listen to what we're doing." Erich Leinsdorf and Leonard Bernstein are also among the conductors it is a special joy for singers to work with, "and some of the younger ones have it too, Donald Johanos in Dallas, Tomas Dunn in New York and Seymour Lipkin: what it shoud be is, you tell me what you know, and I'll tell you what I know."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.

DEC 30 1967 New England Newsclip

Beverly Wolff Impresses at Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

The Boston Symphony's final Friday afternoon concert of the year reminds us how, pervasively previous to our own time, music and social functions were mixed with one another. Erich Leinsdorf conducted three Baroque pieces—some music to eat by, music to float up and down the Thames by, and music to pray by.

From this last category we heard Bach's Cantata 35, "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," a large work which divides itself in two parts and which was first played in Leipzig by Bach in 1726. That each part opens with a movement for solo organ and instruments alone suggests that these movements were once part of a planned though never realized concerto. This is entirely credible, since we know that Bach used movements from his E major harpsichord concerto in Cantatas 49 and 169, both roughly contemporaneous with No. 35.

Mezzo - sprano Beverly Wolff is an uncommonly gifted singer; her voice has a beautiful quality and a center of steel; she has a keen sense of the dramatic, and sang the two recitatives with much style. She also, perhaps unfortunately, sings each aria as if it's to be her last one. Things get quickly to a pretty keyed-up pitch, and a bit of relaxation, as we got in the concluding aria, would be welcome more often.

The organ obligato was neatly played by assistant conductor Charles Wilson, though I found his articulation over great stretches of sisteenth-notes pretty monotone. Registration, for the most part satisfactory, didn't help balance problems at all in the first part's closing aria; Wilson's choice here gave a lovely sound, though one far too soft when paired with the solo voice. And speaking of the organ, be sure not to miss the essay by organ builder Fritz Noack in the program notes for an informative introduction to two of Noack's predecessors, Schnitger and Snetzler.

Leinsdorf's 'Suite' from "Water Music" is one that avoids the suite-makers usual problem of which movements to include, by making no choice at all; he starts at the beginning of Handel's Suite One making one small omission and, time running out, stops midway through Suite Two. So much for selectivity.

In the music he led, though, he had some interesting ideas. The Bouree and Hornpipe are connected and played three times through as one piece, rather than repeating the Bouree three times and then moving on to the Hornpipe. There is also some fillling-in by the timpani under the final Hornpipe's trumpet and horn fanfares, which makes good sense. There are lots of little harpsichord cadenzas connecting movements, tastefully played again by Wilson, but if this was really outdoor music, wouldn't violin interludes be more likely?

The performance was very well played, though it never quite made it rhythmically. Leinsdorf is just not jazzy enough to give this music the right kind of snap.

Make adjustment when listening to the brass. The only thing that could have made Handel's trumpets so strident and silken would have been an invasion of French musicians; his horns, too, were less polished in sound.

Telemann's A Major Concerto, from his First Series of Musique de Table, was played by solists Pappoutsakis and Krips not nearly as well as it should have been. The work is a charming one, full of the capriciousness and fancy that so gripped the composer's godson, C.P.E. Bach. With somewhat sloppy intonation, less than certain technical surity, and too slow tempi, Telemann seemed like a great bore, and a bore he is not.

30 JANUARY 1968

TUES A – VI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Tuesday evening January 2 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — Cantata no. 35 'Geist und Seele wird verwirret' for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato

BEVERLY WOLFF contralto

CHARLES WILSON organ
NEWTON WAYLAND harpsichord
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
HENRY PORTNOI double bass

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 7 in E major
Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell – Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900
JAN 3 1968
New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Symphonic Festivity

By Peter M. Knapp

"Feierlich," the German word for "festive," perhaps best describes the program selected by Erich Leinsdorf to begin the new year with the Boston Symphony.

"Festive," though, does not necessarily mean light-hearted; both of the composers represented on last night's program were deeply religious men: Johann Sebastian Bach and Anton Bruckner. Bach's joyous Cantata No. 35 "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," rejoicing in the miracles of God's creations, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 formed the post-holiday concert.

Bruckner's Syphony No. 7 in E was the Austrian composer's first symphony to receive popular acclaim. It has been variously called a hymn to nature and homage to Wagner, the latter thought coming from the profound adagio movement written shortly before the death of Wagner, Bruckner's idol. And indeed, the extraordinary climax of this long and moving section, capped by a cymbal clash and followed by a serene brass chorale (using Wagner tubas) is fit for a Wagnerian entranct into Valhalla.

For this performance, Leinsdorf used the Leopold Nowak edition, generally based on the second version of the composer's manuscript with later alterations apparently authorized by Bruckner. It is a noble, stirring symphony, long of course, but Bruckner at his radiant best.

Leinsdorf's conception is sumptuous in sound, clear in detail and intelligently constructed. The first climax of the adagio, for example, was constructed in controlled tiers of loudness; but the peak here stayed well below the volume of the ground burst of sound of the second climax.

One might also mention the skill with which the contrasting sections of the first movement were presented, and the superbly sung and modeled opening cello theme. The scherzo, however, could have used more of a rhythmic thrust.

In all, it was auspicious Bruckner, firm and meaty, with the Bostonians producing noble sound, except for a few edgy violins in the recapituation of the first movement, and some dubious brass intonation in the finale, Perhaps it's a matter of taste, but the brass to this listener sounded more resplendant at the rear of the risers than in their present position on the level to the right in the Symphony's new seating arrangement.

Happy Bach

Contralto Beverly Wolff was the vocal soloist for the Bach cantata, Charles Wilson the organist and Newton Wayland the harpsichordist, thankfully audible. The opening sinfonia to this cantata is among Bach's most happy moments. The gay theme of the ensemble is enhanced by organ solo, much in the fashion of a Handel organ concerto. It also turns up in a fragment of a Bach harpsichord concerto.

But the performance as a whole lacked much emotional punch, even though Miss Wolff sang capably in her rich-hued contralto. She was at her best in the recitatives and in the florid aria, "Gott hat Alles wohl gemacht!" Otherwise, the reading was pleasant but routine without much inner illumination.

30 JANUARY 1968

TUES A – VI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Tuesday evening January 2 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH Cantata no. 35 'Geist und Seele wird verwirret' for contralto and orchestra with organ obbligato
BEVERLY WOLFF contralto

CHARLES WILSON organ
NEWTON WAYLAND harpsichord
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
HENRY PORTNOI double bass

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER Symphony no. 7 in E major
Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam
Scherzo: Sehr schnell – Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JAN 3 1968

New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Symphonic Festivity

By Peter M. Knapp

"Feierlich," the German word for "festive," perhaps best describes the program selected by Erich Leinsdorf to begin the new year with the Boston Symphony.

"Festive," though, does not necessarily mean light-hearted; both of the composers represented on last night's program were deeply religious men: Johann Sebastian Bach and Anton Bruckner. Bach's joyous Cantata No. 35 "Geist und Seele wird verwirret," rejoicing in the miracles of God's creations, and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 formed the post-holiday concert.

Bruckner's Syphony No. 7 in E was the Austrian composer's first symphony to receive popular acclaim. It has been variously called a hymn to nature and homage to Wagner, the latter thought coming from the profound adagio movement written shortly before the death of Wagner, Bruckner's idol. And indeed, the extraordinary climax of this long and moving section, capped by a cymbal clash and followed by a serene brass chorale (using Wagner tubas) is fit for a Wagnerian entranct into Valhalla.

For this performance, Leinsdorf used the Leopold Nowak edition, generally based on the second version of the composer's manuscript with later alterations apparently authorized by Bruckner. It is a noble, stirring symphony, long of course, but Bruckner at his radiant best.

Leinsdorf's conception is sumptuous in sound, clear in detail and intelligently constructed. The first climax of the adagio, for example, was constructed in controlled tiers of loudness; but the peak here stayed well below the volume of the ground burst of sound of the second climax.

One might also mention the skill with which the contrasting sections of the first movement were presented, and the superbly sung and modeled opening cello theme. The scherzo, however, could have used more of a rhythmic thrust.

In all, it was auspicious Bruckner, firm and meaty, with the Bostonians producing noble sound, except for a few edgy violins in the recapituation of the first movement, and some dubious brass intonation in the finale. Perhaps it's a matter of taste, but the brass to this listener sounded more resplendant at the rear of the risers than in their present position on the level to the right in the Symphony's new seating arrangement.

Happy Bach

Contralto Beverly Wolff was the vocal soloist for the Bach cantata, Charles Wilson the organist and Newton Wayland the harpsichordist, thankfully audible. The opening sinfonia to this cantata is among Bach's most happy moments. The gay theme of the ensemble is enhanced by organ solo, much in the fashion of a Handel organ concerto. It also turns up in a fragment of a Bach harpsichord concerto.

But the performance as a whole lacked much emotional punch, even though Miss Wolff sang capably in her rich-hued contralto. She was at her best in the recitatives and in the florid aria, "Gott hat Alles wohl gemacht!" Otherwise, the reading was pleasant but routine without much inner illumination.

PRI - SAT - XII

31

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twelfth Program

Friday afternoon January 5 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 6 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 96 in D major 'The Miracle'
- Adagio – allegro
- Andante
- Menuet and Trio: allegretto
- Vivace assai

PETRASSI — Partita per orchestra (1932)
- Gagliarda
- Ciaccona
- Giga

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

MENDELSSOHN — Symphony no. 3 in A minor 'Scottish' op. 56
- Andante con moto – allegro un poco agitato
- Vivace non troppo
- Adagio
- Allegro vivacissimo – allegro maestoso assai

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Blue Plate Special!

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

Boston may still be the intellectual center of the country, but there was slight evidence to corroborate the mayor's assertion at his inaugural when the distinguished string quartet made up of leading members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a movement from one of the works of the great composer, Franz Josef Haydn.

As though the location were a restaurant with a weary trio sawing away while the blue plate special is served, the audience, made up of political leaders, exchanged pleasantries—as shown all too clearly on TV—and the radio commentators began to discuss the mayor's address. With air time concluding on the half hour, the music and the scene faded out, leaving a realistic impression of Boston, 1968.

ARLAN R. COOLIDGE
Providence, R. I.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 6 1968 New England Newsclip

047

SYMPHONY

Choice of Mendelssohn Makes for Bland Afternoon

By McLAREN HARRIS

It is difficult for me to be stirred up by Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, especially when it appears as the principal work on a program begun by Haydn's 96th Symphony in D major; which is why I found this week's Symphony program rather bland, in spite of an attempt by Petrassi's Partita for Orchestra to vary the coloring.

Notwithstanding the progress Mendelssohn made from the slightly inane "Reformation" Symphony through the spirited "Italian" to the comparative maturity of the "Scottish," I have never been able to regard his symphonies as anything other than minor works in the repertoire (even considering No. 3's ample length). On the other hand, Haydn's output — mostly in the familier four-movement mold and none longer than a half hour — always have represented a priceless segment of both music history and regular orchestral fare.

MENDELSSOHN, of course, and in his lighter moments could was a fair to middling melodist weave delicate instrumental fabrics. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" music contains much of this and the "Scottish" second movement does likewise. But he had neither the sense of formal balance Haydn had, nor the wit, and the symphony's finale sinks to such an ebb that the entrance of the mojor Allegro maestoso may appear as a dirge to escort the corpse to its grave. Further, certain of Mendelssohn's thematic strains seem somewhat belabored in getting where they want to go.

The quick movements of Haydn's "Miracle" Symphony, meanwhile, are measures of spontaneity, resting lightly on cadential balance-points; the solo oboe of the third movement's Trio can charm one out of the deepest apathy. Perhaps to be expected, Erich Leinsdorf lent his best efforts to the Mendelssohn as the afternoon's principal work, and his care was not in vain. The Vivace took on a glimmering transparence, the following Adagio's melodic-dynamic contours were caringly shaped and the finale's brass sonorities were almost Brucknerian.

Haydn suffered apparent neglect by comparison — not in specific areas but in a general lack of pinpoint accuracy or excitement through sharp contrast. And this may be heresy, but more strings were needed. Oboist Ralph Gomberg, though, deserves a plaudit.

Separating the foregoing pieces was the Partita for Orchestra of Goffredo Petrassi, a contemporary of Luigi Dallapiccola but much closer to tradition in his early years (the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch introduced his Fifth Concerto for Orchestra in 1955). The Partita is sort of a concerto itself, though in three triple-time dance movements—Italian equivalents to Galliard, Chaconne and Gigue.

The orchestration is absolutely expert and the chromatic harmony is fresh, if not entirely original. Some may find it a precursor to Bartok's Concerto (most of these orchestral-concerto writers seem to have been in league at some point or other); I am inclined to view it as post-Respighi in some harmonic parallelism and brass sonority. Without intense drama, it has the quality of an exercise, even a frolic; but at that it is a lively and resourceful one with a propulsive Gagliarda, the winding-motived Ciaccona and a light-fingered Giga.

The orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf accorded Petrassi's work a positive introduction at these concerts with viable responses from all sections, save some poor intonation from the horns.

Next week, in Mr. Leinsdorf's absence, Leopold Stokowski will conduct Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fantasy-Overture, "Hamlet," and excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov."

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 32,400

JAN 8 1968 New England Newsclip

'Triumph for the fresh over the familiar'

By Craig Stinson

The Boston Symphony's first concert of the new year, in Symphony Hall Friday, was a triumph for the fresh over the familiar. The program consisted of the local première of Goffredo Petrassi's Partita per Orchestra, plus two items from the repertory.

A would-be first performance by the Boston Symphony of Haydn's Symphony No. 24 was canceled in favor of the same composer's 96th, the so-called "Miracle" Symphony. The change was regrettable, not for any defect in the latter work, but because the orchestra apparently found it unworthy of serious effort. Under Erich Leinsdorf's time-beating, the players navigated the piece with the ease and accuracy of a sleepwalker in his own house. But this sort of musical somnambulance is what makes obscure composers of men like Haydn.

Attention and care

Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, No. 3 in A minor, came off with more buoyancy and life, though the performance was less careful. There were balance problems, the orchestra sounding brassy and more bass-heavy than usual. But Mendelssohn survived and the concert ended cheerfully enough.

Petrassi's Partita, by contrast, received the attention and care that Mr. Leinsdorf often brings to newer music. Composed in 1932, the piece is one of Petrassi's first successful large-scale efforts. One hears in it a student's vivid impressions of much that was going on in the non-serial world of the late '20's — quartal harmonies, lots of brass, even a sleezy alto saxophone that sounds like it might have wandered in from a Kurt Weill show.

One also hears why Petrassi won at least two important competitions with this work. Though it reflects other styles (not all 27-year-olds can be revolutionaries), it does not blindly imitate them. There is plenty of original appeal in this piece, especially in its highly polished orchestration. It is obviously the work of a man who knows his craft.

The Boston Symphony performed the Partita with enthusiasm, proving that live Petrassi will take moribund Haydn most any day of the week.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

JAN 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Mendelssohn Symphony Is Presented by BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Music from three centuries was presented delightfully by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, yesterday afternoon. There were symphonies by Haydn and Mendelssohn and the first BBO presentation of Goffredo Petrassi's partita for orchestra.

Mendelssohn

However, after the interval, it was the featured Mendelssohn third ("Scotny which arou tish") symphony which aroused the most interest. This gifted composer vistied Scotland in 1829 and there found great inspiration not only in the grey landscape but also in reminders of the tragic life of Queen Mary Stuart, but it took almost thirteen years for him to complete this symphonic masterwork.

A peculiarity of this engaging symphony is that though it has four distinct movements, they follow one another without a break and the scherzo is actually linked to the preceding movement by a few modulatory chords.

The first movement is rather melancholic, the theme of the introduction being serious, as is the allegro's main theme. One secondary idea is somewhat livelier, but is supplanted quickly by a plaintive secondary theme. The mood throughout is reserved and expressive of gentle resignation.

The merry theme of the scherzo i san imitation of Scottish folk melodies, without recourse, however, to the favorite effect of bagpipes. The adagio also is effective, with its contrast of a tender song theme and a gloomy, solemn funeral march. The last movement falls into two segments: the allegro guerrio (warlike allegro) building up to a dramatic climax in the allegro maestoso assai. The symphony ends on a note of hymnic grandeur.

What melodies Mendelssohn transformed and ennobled in his "Scottish" symphony is not known, but there is no doubt that they are as authentic as scones with Victoria plum jam at high tea, for he was drawing on his impressions from his trip to the "Land o' Cakes." It was an amazing feat of musical memory, attesting to his almost-Mozartean genius.

George Bernard Shaw thought this a work "which would be great if it were not so confoundedly genteel."

Dr. Leinsdorf directed a beautifully paced, strong performance, in a warm, lyrical and supple reading, sensitively phrased and lithely animated.

Curtain-raiser was Haydn's 96th "Miracle" symphony (in D) in a handsome and stylish performance. Sandwiched between the two symphonies was Goffredo Petrassi's partita for orchestra. Though an adherent of the twelve-tone methodology of composition, Petrassi, it must be conceded, clings to some semblance of tonality, for his lyricism is definitely Italianate. His twelve-note melodies are accompanied by some indications of conventional harmonies and his counterpoint is excellent.

PRI - SAT - XII

31

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twelfth Program

Friday afternoon January 5 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 6 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 96 in D major 'The Miracle'
Adagio – allegro
Andante
Menuet and Trio: allegretto
Vivace assai

PETRASSI — Partita per orchestra (1932)
Gagliarda
Ciaccona
Giga

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

MENDELSSOHN — Symphony no. 3 in A minor 'Scottish' op. 56
Andante con moto – allegro un poco agitato
Vivace non troppo
Adagio
Allegro vivacissimo – allegro maestoso assai

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIR. 53,000
JAN 6 1968
New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Choice of Mendelssohn Makes for Bland Afternoon

By McLAREN HARRIS

It is difficult for me to be stirred up by Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, especially when it appears as the principal work on a program begun by Haydn's 96th Symphony in D major; which is why I found this week's Symphony program rather bland, in spite of an attempt by Petrassi's Partita for Orchestra to vary the coloring.

Notwithstanding the progress Mendelssohn made from the slightly inane "Reformation" Symphony through the spirited "Italian" to the comparative maturity of the "Scottish," I have never been able to regard his symphonies as anything other than minor works in the repertoire (even considering No. 3's ample length). On the other hand, Haydn's output — mostly in the familier four-movement mold and none longer than a half hour — always have represented a priceless segment of both music history and regular orchestral fare.

MENDELSSOHN, of course, and in his lighter moments could was a fair to middling melodist weave delicate instrumental fabrics. The 'Midsummer Night's Dream" music contains much of this and the "Scottish" second movement does likewise. But he had neither the sense of formal balance Haydn had, nor the wit, and the symphony's finale sinks to such an ebb that the entrance of the major Allegro maestoso may appear as a dirge to escort the corpse to its grave. Further, certain of Mendelssohn's thematic strains seem somewhat belabored in getting where they want to go.

The quick movements of Haydn's "Miracle" Symphony, meanwhile, are measures of spontaneity, resting lightly on cadential balance-points; the solo oboe of the third movement's Trio can charm one out of the deepest apathy. Perhaps to be expected, Erich Leinsdorf lent his best efforts to the Mendelssohn as the afternoon's principal work, and his care was not in vain. The Vivace took on a glimmering transparence, the following Adagio's melodic-dynamic contours were caringly shaped and the finale's brass sonorities were almost Brucknerian.

Haydn suffered apparent neglect by comparison — not in specific areas but in a general lack of pinpoint accuracy or excitement through sharp contrast. And this may be heresy, but more strings were needed. Oboist Ralph Gomberg, though, deserves a plaudit.

Separating the foregoing pieces was the Partita for Orchestra of Goffredo Petrassi, a contemporary of Luigi Dallapiccola but much closer to tradition in his early years (the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch introduced his Fifth Concerto for Orchestra in 1955). The Partita is sort of a concerto itself, though in three triple-time dance movements—Italian equivalents to Galliard, Chaconne and Gigue.

The orchestration is absolutely expert and the chromatic harmony is fresh, if not entirely original. Some may find it a precursor to Bartok's Concerto (most of these orchestral-concerto writers seem to have been in league at some point or other); I am inclined to view it as post-Respighi in some harmonic parallelism and brass sonority. Without intense drama, it has the quality of an exercise, even a frolic; but at that it is a lively and resourceful one with a propulsive Gagliarda, the winding-motived Ciaccona and a light-fingered Giga.

The orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf accorded Petrassi's work a positive introduction at these concerts with viable responses from all sections, save some poor intonation from the horns.

Next week, in Mr. Leinsdorf's absence, Leopold Stokowski will conduct Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fantasy-Overture, "Hamlet," and excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIR.
JAN 8 1968
New England Newsclip

Blue Plate Special!

To the Herald Traveler Editor:

Boston may still be the intellectual center of the country, but there was slight evidence to corroborate the mayor's assertion at his inaugural when the distinguished string quartet made up of leading members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a movement from one of the works of the great composer, Franz Josef Haydn.

As though the location were a restaurant with a weary trio sawing away while the blue plate special is served, the audience, made up of political leaders, exchanged pleasantries—as shown all too clearly on TV—and the radio commentators began to discuss the mayor's address. With air time concluding on the half hour, the music and the scene faded out, leaving a realistic impression of Boston, 1968.

ARLAN R. COOLIDGE
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON, MASS.
JAN 8 1968
New England Newsclip

'Triumph for the fresh over the familiar'

By Craig Stinson

The Boston Symphony's first concert of the new year, in Symphony Hall Friday, was a triumph for the fresh over the familiar. The program consisted of the local première of Goffredo Petrassi's Partita per Orchestra, plus two items from the repertory.

A would-be first performance by the Boston Symphony of Haydn's Symphony No. 24 was canceled in favor of the same composer's 96th, the so-called "Miracle" Symphony. The change was regrettable, not for any defect in the latter work, but because the orchestra apparently found it unworthy of serious effort. Under Erich Leinsdorf's time-beating, the players navigated the piece with the ease and accuracy of a sleepwalker in his own house. But this sort of musical somnambulance is what makes obscure composers of men like Haydn.

Attention and care

Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, No. 3 in A minor, came off with more buoyancy and life, though the performance was less careful. There were balance problems, the orchestra sounding brassy and more bass-heavy than usual. But Mendelssohn survived and the concert ended cheerfully enough.

Petrassi's Partita, by contrast, received the attention and care that Mr. Leinsdorf often brings to newer music. Composed in 1932, the piece is one of Petrassi's first successful large-scale efforts. One hears in it a student's vivid impressions of much that was going on in the non-serial world of the late '20's — quartal harmonies, lots of brass, even a sleezy alto saxophone that sounds like it might have wandered in from a Kurt Weill show.

One also hears why Petrassi won at least two important competitions with this work. Though it reflects other styles (not all 27-year-olds can be revolutionaries), it does not blindly imitate them. There is plenty of original appeal in this piece, especially in its highly polished orchestration. It is obviously the work of a man who knows his craft.

The Boston Symphony performed the Partita with enthusiasm, proving that live Petrassi will take moribund Haydn most any day of the week.

RECORD-AMERICAN (M) (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
JAN 6 1968
New England Newsclip

Mendelssohn Symphony Is Presented by BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Music from three centuries was presented delightfully by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, yesterday afternoon. There were symphonies by Haydn and Mendelssohn and the first BBO presentation of Goffredo Petrassi's partita for orchestra.

However, after the interval, it was the featured Mendelssohn third ("Scotny which arou tish") symphony which aroused the most interest. This gifted composer visited Scotland in 1829 and there found great inspiration not only in the grey landscape but also in reminders of the tragic life of Queen Mary Stuart, but it took almost thirteen years for him to complete this symphonic masterwork.

Mendelssohn

A peculiarity of this engaging symphony is that though it has four distinct movements, they follow one another without a break and the scherzo is actually linked to the preceding movement by a few modulatory chords.

The first movement is rather melancholic, the theme of the introduction being serious, as is the allegro's main theme. One secondary idea is somewhat livelier, but is supplanted quickly by a plaintive secondary theme. The mood throughout is reserved and expressive of gentle resignation.

The merry theme of the scherzo i san imitation of Scottish folk melodies, without recourse, however, to the favorite effect of bagpipes. The adagio also is effective, with its contrast of a tender song theme and a gloomy, solemn funeral march. The last movement falls into two segments: the allegro guerrio (warlike allegro) building up to a dramatic climax in the allegro maestoso assai. The symphony ends on a note of hymnic grandeur.

What melodies Mendelssohn transformed and ennobled in his "Scottish" symphony is not known, but there is no doubt that they are as authentic as scones with Victoria plum jam at high tea, for he was drawing on his impressions from his trip to the "Land o' Cakes." It was an amazing feat of musical memory, attesting to his almost-Mozartean genius.

George Bernard Shaw thought this a work "which would be great if it were not so confoundedly genteel."

Dr. Leinsdorf directed a beautifully paced, strong performance, in a warm, lyrical and supple reading, sensitively phrased and lithely animated.

Curtain-raiser was Haydn's 96th "Miracle" symphony (in D) in a handsome and stylish performance. Sandwiched between the two symphonies was Goffredo Petrassi's partita for orchestra. Though an adherent of the twelve-tone methodology of composition, Petrassi, it must be conceded, clings to some semblance of tonality, for his lyricism is definitely Italianate. His twelve-note melodies are accompanied by some indications of conventional harmonies and his counterpoint is excellent.

32

TUES B - IV

STAR (E)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 306,200

FEB 19 1968

New England Newsclip

RADIO PREVIEW

Boston, Cleveland Play Moderns, Haydn

By DONALD MINTZ
Star Staff Critic

The Cleveland Orchestra, Louis Lane, conductor. Soloist: Itzhak Perlman, violin. To be broadcast by WGMS, Wednesday, Feb. 21, at 9 p.m. Symphony No. 90 in C, Haydn (Time: 23'53"); Christmas Music (first performance), Erb (Time: 7'51"); Bachianas Brasileiras No. 2, Villa-Lobos (Time: 19'31"); Violin Concerto No. 1 in D, Op. 6, Paganini (Time: 29'17").

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. To be broadcast by WGMS, Sunday, Feb. 25, at 2 p.m. Symphony No. 96 in D, Haydn (Time: 22'57"); Partita for Orchestra (1932), Petrassi (Time: 18'00"); Symphony No. 3 in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn (Time: 38'45").

Two of the delayed, live orchestral concerts that WGMS will broadcast this week seem to call for special attention. I particularly wanted to hear Donald Erb's Christmas Music (The Cleveland Orchestra, Tuesday at 9 p.m.) and Petrassi's Partita (The Boston Symphony, Sunday at 2 p.m.).

The Petrassi turned out to be a grave disappointment. It is a relatively early work (1932) that won an official prize when it was new. The piece is overblown and pretentious — just the thing, I suppose, to have appealed to the Italian government of its time. Another demonstration that old despotisms had better taste in the arts than modern authoritarianisms.

Still, the Boston concert is memorable for other reasons. Both the Haydn Symphony No. 96 and the Mendelssohn Scotch symphony (or Scottish symphony as the proper Bostonian announcer properly calls it) pose very difficult problems. To put it bluntly each is a fine works that sounds frightful more often than not.

Erich Leinsdorf has completely mastered all the difficulties of both. The result is something rare: a genuinely first-class playing of the Haydn, and something that to my knowledge is unique: an equally first-class playing of the Mendelssohn.

Nothing could be further from the Petrassi Partita than Donald Erb's Christmas Music. Erb is a member of the faculty of the Cleveland Institute, the local conservatory. He holds a National Arts Council fellowship and is therefore currently on leave. The piece which was commissioned by the Cleveland Orchestra for its 50th anniversary celebration, is a joyous avant-garde work that does a remarkable job of imitating electronic sounds with a conventional orchestra plus an enormous array of percussion plus some unconventional techniques like the use of a champagne bottle to stroke the strings of the harp. It is marvelously inventive music and as nearly as one can tell, Louis Lane conducts a fine performance.

Lane's Haydn, on the other hand, is routine. The Villa-Lobos is moderately entertaining, and for double-stop harmonic fans Itzhak Perlman is on hand with a splendid performance of a slightly truncated version of the Paganini D major concerto.

The Cleveland recording is good. But Boston seems to have had its troubles. I am prepared to swear that the channels are reversed in the Haydn. Elsewhere on the tape the placement of instruments is subject to vagaries. There is more resonance on track 2 than on track 1 and this seems to play tricks with one's perception of location and distance.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program
Tuesday evening January 9 at 7.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS — Academic Festival Overture op. 80

HENZE — Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto – Tempo giusto – Piu mosso

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso – Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento – Andantino –
Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto – Recitativo – Vivo

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 139,700

JAN 6 1968

New England Newsclip

'Clean' Haydn heard again at Symphony Hall

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Haydn's Symphony No. 96 in D, with which Erich Leinsdorf began Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, was one of the Haydn scores most misrepresented by editorial corruptions that crept in during the 19th century. An errata list published in 1954 by the American Haydn scholar H. C. Robbins Landon showed over 250 mistakes in the best available score of the piece, mistakes affecting something like two out of three measures, and including wrong pitches, wrong rhythmic values, wrong articulations, misplaced pizzicatos and cancellations of them, and, over large stretches, altogether spurious brass and drum parts.

When Mr. Leinsdorf conducted this work here in November, 1962, he must, to his credit, have been one of the first conductors in America to base his performance on the "clean" score; I know his was the first performance of it that I heard. However, he retained then, and repeated this time, one of the most notorious of the later orchestral retouchings, the little Mona - Lisa's - moustache trumpet intervention in the oboe solo of the Trio. Moreover, he introduced a new falsification of his own by cutting a measure of silence out of the first movement, taking the edge off one of Haydn's most beautifully prepared surprises.

The not quite convincingly carried off flirtation with scholarship and the impatience with passages of minimal surface activity, the little emendation and the short-changed silence, have often been disturbing features of Leinsdorf's work. Unfortunately, this performance of Haydn's 96th Symphony missed more than these two points. The dynamic range was compressed in the worst RCA Dynagroove manner, phrasings were undercharacterized, and no light shone through the orchestral polyphony. Deadly, I would call it.

It was a good idea of Mr. Leinsdorf's to program the "Partita" by Goffredo Petrassi, a masterful composer whose work is badly neglected in America. The Partita is an early work, written in 1932, when Petrassi was 27; it is a neoclassic essay, full of high spirits, its three movements —galliard, chaconne, and jig—composed with assurance and scored with finesse. There wasn't much snap to the performance—in fact, in the slow movement, it was rhythmically vague to the point of unintelligibility—and some of the intonation was hair-raising.

I would submit, as well, that it is not good sense for a program editor to give respectively 23 and 16 line-inches of space to notes about familiar pieces by Haydn and Mendelssohn (not counting a further 26 inches to another essay about Mendelssohn), and not quite eight inches to a little-known composer's work in its first performance here.

The concert ended with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony.

32

TUES B - IV

STAR (E)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 306,200

FEB 19 1968 New England Newsclip

RADIO PREVIEW

Boston, Cleveland Play Moderns, Haydn

By DONALD MINTZ
Star Staff Critic

The Cleveland Orchestra, Louis Lane, conductor. Soloist: Itzhak Perlman, violin. To be broadcast by WGMS, Wednesday, Feb. 21, at 9 p.m. Symphony No. 90 in C, Haydn (Time: 23'55"); Christmas Music (first performance), Erb (Time: 7'51"); Bachianas Brasileiras No. 2, Villa-Lobos (Time: 19'31"); Violin Concerto No. 1 in D, Op. 6, Paganini (Time: 29'17").

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. To be broadcast by WGMS, Sunday, Feb. 25, at 2 p.m. Symphony No. 96 in D, Haydn (Time: 22'57"); Partita for Orchestra (1932), Petrassi (Time: 18'00"); Symphony No. 3 in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn (Time: 38'45").

Two of the delayed, live orchestral concerts that WGMS will broadcast this week seem to call for special attention. I particularly wanted to hear Donald Erb's Christmas Music (The Cleveland Orchestra, Tuesday at 9 p.m.) and Petrassi's Partita (The Boston Symphony, Sunday at 2 p.m.).

The Petrassi turned out to be a grave disappointment. It is a relatively early work (1932) that won an official prize when it was new. The piece is overblown and pretentious — just the thing, I suppose, to have appealed to the Italian government of its time. Another demonstration that old despotisms had better taste in the arts than modern authoritarianisms.

Still, the Boston concert is memorable for other reasons. Both the Haydn Symphony No. 96 and the Mendelssohn Scotch symphony (or Scottish symphony as the proper Bostonian announcer properly calls it) pose very difficult problems. To put it bluntly each is a fine works that sounds frightful more often than not.

Erich Leinsdorf has completely mastered all the difficulties of both. The result is something rare: a genuinely first-class playing of the Haydn, and something that to my knowledge is unique: an equally first-class playing of the Mendelssohn.

Nothing could be further from the Petrassi Partita than Donald Erb's Christmas Music. Erb is a member of the faculty of the Cleveland Institute, the local conservatory. He holds a National Arts Council fellowship and is therefore currently on leave. The piece which was commissioned by the Cleveland Orchestra for its 50th anniversary celebration, is a joyous avant-garde work that does a remarkable job of imitating electronic sounds with a conventional orchestra plus an enormous array of percussion plus some unconventional techniques like the use of a champagne bottle to stroke the strings of the harp. It is marvelously inventive music and as nearly as one can tell, Louis Lane conducts a fine performance.

Lane's Haydn, on the other hand, is routine. The Villa-Lobos is moderately entertaining, and for double-stop harmonic fans Itzhak Perlman is on hand with a splendid performance of a slightly truncated version of the Paganini D major concerto.

The Cleveland recording is good. But Boston seems to have had its troubles. I am prepared to swear that the channels are reversed in the Haydn. Elsewhere on the tape the placement of instruments is subject to vagaries. There is more resonance on track 2 than on track 1 and this seems to play tricks with one's perception of location and distance.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program
Tuesday evening January 9 at 7.30

CHARLES WILSON conducting

BRAHMS — Academic Festival Overture op. 80

HENZE — Symphony no. 1
Allegretto, con grazia
Lento (Notturno)
Allegro con moto – Tempo giusto – Piu mosso

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Sheherazade op. 35
Largo e maestoso – Allegro non troppo
Recitativo lento – Andantino –
Vivace scherzando
Andantino quasi allegretto
Allegro molto – Recitativo – Vivo

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 130,700

JAN 6 1968 New England Newsclip

'Clean' Haydn heard again at Symphony Hall

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Haydn's Symphony No. 96 in D, with which Erich Leinsdorf began Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, was one of the Haydn scores most misrepresented by editorial corruptions that crept in during the 19th century. An errata list published in 1954 by the American Haydn scholar H. C. Robbins Landon showed over 250 mistakes in the best available score of the piece, mistakes affecting something like two out of three measures, and including wrong pitches, wrong rhythmic values, wrong articulations, misplaced pizzicatos and cancellations of them, and, over large stretches, altogether spurious brass and drum parts.

When Mr. Leinsdorf conducted this work here in November, 1962, he must, to his credit, have been one of the first conductors in America to base his performance on the "clean" score; I know his was the first performance of it that I heard. However, he retained then, and repeated this time, one of the most notorious of the later orchestral retouchings, the little Mona - Lisa's - moustache trumpet intervention in the oboe solo of the Trio. Moreover, he introduced a new falsification of his own by cutting a measure of silence out of the first movement, taking the edge off one of Haydn's most beautifully prepared surprises.

The not quite convincingly carried off flirtation with scholarship and the impatience with passages of minimal surface activity, the little emendation and the short-changed silence, have often been disturbing features of Leinsdorf's work. Unfortunately, this performance of Haydn's 96th Symphony missed more than these two points. The dynamic range was compressed in the worst RCA Dynagroove manner, phrasings were undercharacterized, and no light shone through the orchestral polyphony. Deadly, I would call it.

It was a good idea of Mr. Leinsdorf's to program the "Partita" by Goffredo Petrassi, a masterful composer whose work is badly neglected in America. The Partita is an early work, written in 1932, when Petrassi was 27; it is a neoclassic essay, full of high spirits, its three movements —galliard, chaconne, and jig—composed with assurance and scored with finesse. There wasn't much snap to the performance—in fact, in the slow movement, it was rhythmically vague to the point of unintelligibility—and some of the intonation was hair-raising.

I would submit, as well, that it is not good sense for a program editor to give respectively 23 and 16 line-inches of space to notes about familiar pieces by Haydn and Mendelssohn (not counting a further 26 inches to another essay about Mendelssohn), and not quite eight inches to a little-known composer's work in its first performance here.

The concert ended with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony.

FRI - SAT XIII / CAMBRIDGE IV

33

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Thirteenth Program

Friday afternoon January 12 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 13 at 8.30

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI guest conductor

MOZART — Don Giovanni – Overture

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A major op. 92
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY — Hamlet – Fantasy Overture op. 67a

MUSSORGSKY — Excerpts from Boris Godunov
(transcribed for orchestra by Leopold Stokowski)

First performance in Boston

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday
and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SYMPHONY

Stokowski Stress on Small Effects Damages Rest of Compositions

By McLAREN HARRIS

One must arrive at Symphony Hall on time, I discovered somewhat to my dismay, to savor the highlight of Leopold Stokowski's programs with the Boston Symphony this week — unless, of course, one enjoys distilling the intentions of composers from those of their interpreter.

To leave that statement standing as is may be a little unkind. After all, we are well acquainted with Stokowski's penchant for effect in music, for drawing attention in his individual manner to details which he feels are often overlooked. Anything which accomplishes this he considers fair game — tempo rubato, sudden retards, dynamic shifts, a Luft pause here or there; occasionally the orchestration is altered, but in fairness he usually warns us about this in advance.

HE IS CERTAINLY not alone in his artistic faith or injecting greater or lesser amounts of personality into the music he plays, though few other conductors reman who do so consciously or openly; we must be careful to judge his effects for their contribution to the whole, not by themselves for we may discover ourselves to be farther than he from the primary musical sources.

What, then, went wrong with his program? It was not the small effects themselves which bothered me, blown up out of context though they often were, but what such preoccupation with them did to the rest of the composition.

The opening overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" survived relatively intact, receiving a brisk, well-sustained tempo and light-fingered orchestral responses. But that was it. The following Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which probably has more firepower than anything else in the classic repertoire, fell flat. After Stokowski's dalliance with little woodwind figures in the first movement, the tempo was regained but the dymanic outline was lost. without any contour for the last 30 measures. Anticlimax was the result.

In the Allegretto and gradually expiring final chord left strings hanging after winds were forced to quit; exaggerated retard caused a halting conclusion to the Scherzo; and the full-rolling finale was again without dynamic viability. Part of the trouble was the orchestra's apparent inability to produce what Stokowski wanted. They tried hard, but inner cohesion and strength had largely disappeared by the first notes of the Allegretto.

I WILL NOT attribute the lack of success of Tchaikovsky's fantasy overture, "Hamlet." to Stokowski's doing. It is simply a weak piece of "Hamlet," Tchaikovsky claimed, contained only overall impressions of the Shakespeare play and was not designed to follow its events in the manner his "Romeo and Juliet" overture did. Nevertheless it follows the same general plan — a center of two contesting themes, one tender and one militant, framed by Lento passages of solemn portent.

But the intentions of "Hamlet" are blurred compared to "Romeo;" there is more episodic material, the themes are shorter, the dynamic contrasts less defined. It is an unsettled piece, full of nameless striving. Tchaikovsky's message, to say the least, is unclear.

There is little to say about the concluding Stokowski arrangement of excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov." No matter how strongly the program notes insist that they are practically unadulterated Mussorgsky, they remain so Stokowskified as to be virtually unrecognizable. Someone, after all, had to put this mishmash of operatic clippings together and bridge them with silly one or two-note transitions, and it wasn't Mussorgsky. The sections are severely truncated, the orchestral arrangements pallid and the performance was frankly slipshod.

Okay, so I'm offended.

Next week Charles Munch will make his annual visit to the Symphony for a performance of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," with soloists Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, Donald Gramm, and the Chorus pro Musica.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 13 1968

New England Newsclip

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program

Tuesday evening January 16 at 8.30

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI guest conductor

MOZART — Don Giovanni – Overture

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A major op. 92
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY — Hamlet – Fantasy Overture op. 67a

MUSSORGSKY — Excerpts from Boris Godunov
(transcribed for orchestra by Leopold Stokowski)

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

PRI – SAT XIII / CAMBRIDGE IV

33

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Thirteenth Program

Friday afternoon January 12 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 13 at 8.30

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI guest conductor

MOZART — Don Giovanni – Overture

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A major op. 92
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY — Hamlet – Fantasy Overture op. 67a

MUSSORGSKY — Excerpts from Boris Godunov
(transcribed for orchestra by Leopold Stokowski)

First performance in Boston

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday
and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SYMPHONY

Stokowski Stress on Small Effects Damages Rest of Compositions

By McLAREN HARRIS

One must arrive at Symphony Hall on time, I discovered somewhat to my dismay, to savor the highlight of Leopold Stokowski's programs with the Boston Symphony this week — unless, of course, one enjoys distilling the intentions of composers from those of their interpreter.

To leave that statement standing as is may be a little unkind. After all, we are well acquainted with Stokowski's penchant for effect in music, for drawing attention in his individual manner to details which he feels are often overlooked. Anything which accomplishes this he considers fair game — tempo rubato, sudden retards, dynamic shifts, a Luft pause here or there; occasionally the orchestration is altered, but in fairness he usually warns us about this in advance.

HE IS CERTAINLY not alone in his artistic faith or injecting greater or lesser amounts of personality into the music he plays, though few other conductors reman who do so consciously or openly; we must be careful to judge his effects for their contribution to the whole, not by themselves for we may discover ourselves to be farther than he from the primary musical sources.

What, then, went wrong with his program? It was not the small effects themselves which bothered me, blown up out of context though they often were, but what such preoccupation with them did to the rest of the composition.

The opening overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" survived relatively intact, receiving a brisk, well-sustained tempo and light-fingered orchestral responses. But that was it. The following Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which probably has more firepower than anything else in the classic repertoire, fell flat. After Stokowski's dalliance with little woodwind figures in the first movement, the tempo was regained but the dymanic outline was lost. without any contour for the last 30 measures. Anticlimax was the result.

In the Allegretto and gradually expiring final chord left strings hanging after winds were forced to quit; exaggerated retard caused a halting conclusion to the Scherzo; and the full-rolling finale was again without dynamic viability. Part of the trouble was the orchestra's apparent inability to produce what Stokowski wanted. They tried hard, but inner cohesion and strength had largely disappeared by the first notes of the Allegretto.

I WILL NOT attribute the lack of success of Tchaikovsky's fantasy overture, "Hamlet." to Stokowski's doing. It is simply a weak piece of "Hamlet," Tchaikovsky claimed, contained only overall impressions of the Shakespeare play and was not designed to follow its events in the manner his "Romeo and Juliet" overture did. Nevertheless it follows the same general plan — a center of two contesting themes, one tender and one militant, framed by Lento passages of solemn portent.

But the intentions of "Hamlet" are blurred compared to "Romeo;" there is more episodic material, the themes are shorter, the dynamic contrasts less defined. It is an unsettled piece, full of nameless striving. Tchaikovsky's message, to say the least, is unclear.

There is little to say about the concluding Stokowski arrangement of excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov." No matter how strongly the program notes insist that they are practically unadulterated Mussorgsky, they remain so Stokowskified as to be virtually unrecognizable. Someone, after all, had to put this mishmash of operatic clippings together and bridge them with silly one or two-note transitions, and it wasn't Mussorgsky. The sections are severely truncated, the orchestral arrangements pallid and the performance was frankly slipshod.

Okay, so I'm offended.

Next week Charles Munch will make his annual visit to the Symphony for a performance of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," with soloists Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, Donald Gramm, and the Chorus pro Musica.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 13 1968

New England Newsclip

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program

Tuesday evening January 16 at 8.30

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI guest conductor

MOZART — Don Giovanni – Overture

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 7 in A major op. 92
Poco sostenuto – vivace
Allegretto
Presto – assai meno presto – tempo primo
Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY — Hamlet – Fantasy Overture op. 67a

MUSSORGSKY — Excerpts from Boris Godunov
(transcribed for orchestra by Leopold Stokowski)

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

34

R. I. HERALD
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,300

JAN 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Stokowski 'Brings Off His Conception Brilliantly' At Boston Symphony Concert

Thursday night in Veteran's Memorial Auditorium, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, guest conductor. The program included Mozart's Overture to Don Giovanni, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the Hamlet Fantasy-Overture by Tchaikovsky, and excerpts from Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov, arranged by Mr. Stokowski.

The Don Giovanni overture was performed with the last pages of the opera itself as an ending, instead of any of the endings by various composers ordinarily used for concert readings of this piece - a clever idea on Mr. Stokowski's part, and one that made good musical sense. The Beethoven was easily the highlight of the program. The skilfully shaded woodwind playing, the agility and unanimity of the strings, the crisp attacks and pealing high notes of the horns all bespoke an orchestra of the first rank. The traditionally accepted stylistic boundaries for the interpretation of Beethoven gave way before the force and exuberance of Stokowski's personality.

Some of the Stokowski touches were simply too much, such as the schmalzy fermata on the first note of the oboe run which introduces the recapitulation of the first movement, or the romantically swelling crescendos and diminuendos on sustained chords in the middle section of the second movement. As a whole, however, Stokowski managed to bring off his conception brilliantly. The most spectacular of his interpretive coups was his handling of the finale, which he began slightly on the slow side and gradually increased the tempo with such consummate control that one was hardly aware of it, until the coda swept past with a wild, electrifying frenzy. No one but Stokowski could have gotten away with it.

Unfortunately, the remaining half of the program was not on the same level as the first, a fact due more to the music than the orchestra. The Hamlet overture is very rarely heard, and it is easy to see why; the piece is almost like a self-parody, a compendium of all of Tchaikovsky's most tiresome mannerisms - minus the melodic inspiration of his better work. Ralph Gomburg made the most of his long, juicy oboe solo in the middle section, the most interesting spot in the piece.

The principal value of Stokowski's version of Boris Godunov was to point out how thoroughly operatic Mussorgsky's music is, and how it suffers when lifted out of its dramatic setting. Stokowski used a wide variety of colorful percussion effects, including tam-tam, chimes and a large bell of indefinite pitch. In the final climax, with its great gong and pounding bass drum dominating the full orchestra, he may well have succeeded in summoning forth the loudest sound ever heard at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

At eighty-six, Leopold Stokowski is a marvel of vigor and vitality. The Stokowski treatment may not be to everyone's taste, but there is no denying his tremendous personal magnetism or the infectious zest with which he approaches the task of music-making.

STEVE BROWN

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Stokowski leads B.S.O.

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

The art of Leopold Stokowski, this week-end's B.S.O. guest conductor, is as foreign to us in temperament as the epoch which formed this art is in time. His heritage comes from Liszt and the superpersonal attitudes towards music which we associate with this wizard and his clan, and in concert we are apt to learn more about Stokowski the man than the music at hand.

So it was Friday afternoon. The only music which was not tampered with was the first half of the Beethoven Seventh, the opening movement of which was especially good. Much of the success is to be found in the understatement and restraint with which Stokowski approached the music, keeping, for instance, the slow introduction a far more sober affair than the more elaborately inflected, more impassioned performance would have had it. The woodwinds were doubled and a good balance was maintained in a lively, well-shaped, if not terribly informative vivace.

After a slow movement which was beat to death by over-detached, hard and heavy eighth-notes, Stokowski went to town. The presto movement was cut in half and went from the first return of the opening music to the coda. Of all the repeats offered by the last movement, Stokowski took only the first and last, ignoring the others which are all structurally and rhetorically essential.

Hamlet, after being operated upon, was in much more trouble than Beethoven. The last of Tchaikovsky's three Overture-Fantasies on Shakespeare, Hamlet is not really a happy one. There are engaging themes which we are tempted to stick on some of the characters. For example, a sweet and singing tune may or may not be Ophelia (or would Hamlet psychologists opt for Gertrude?), but this is not really the point of the piece, nor the source of its discomfort. Tchaikovsky has taken Shakespeare's most written-about and psychologically most complex play and tried, possibly, to pour a precis into the mold of the 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture. But we find here neither specific literary references, as Elgar gives us in his portrait of 'Falstaff,' nor a convincing musical statement.

Stokowski begins 'Hamlet' with the ninth bar and makes two cuts later on. Tchaikovsy is recognizable but maimed.

Stokowski's contribution to the 'opera for orchestra' world is his 'Boris Godunov' pastiche. In taking some of the most remarkable music from six of the most remarkable scenes completely out of its dramatic context, he has reduced Mussorgsky's marvelous score to the bombastic and banal. To sum up the Stokowski-scene with a line stolen from Hamlet's friend Horatio: 'He waxes desperate with imagination'.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Leopold Stokowski, Guest Conductor, performing Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; Tchaikocsky's "Hamlet-Fantasy Overture"; and Mussorgsky's Excerpts from "Boris Godunov." Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JAN 15 1968 New England Newsclip MONITOR

Stokowski brilliant as Symphony guest

By Craig Stinson

Leopold Stokowski, visiting maestro at Symphony Hall this week, has given us the pleasure of hearing brilliant orchestral playing again. He has also demonstrated that the Boston Symphony can still sound like the virtuoso ensemble it is reputed to be.

The concert Friday afternoon was just the sort on which a large measure of Stokowski's fame was built. Two of the four numbers were his own arrangements (of the "Don Giovanni" Overture and a suite from "Boris Godunov"); the entire program seemed designed to produce the maestro's renowned symphonic grandiosity.

Part of what is astonishing about Stokowski's conducting style is that he commands so grand a sound spectrum with so few physical gestures. His use of the left hand is sparing. Much of the time he conducts with no more than his right hand and wrist; once in a while an index finger is sufficient.

Fine dynamic levels

With such minimal means he controls the finest gradations of dynamic levels. At the opening of the second movement of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, for example, he kept the theme's first and second strain at distinct levels of quiet, while building one variation on another in an ideally timed crescendo. Where volume was needed, as at the climax of this movement's fugato, or during the horn calls of the finale, Stokowski drew the last decibel out of the orchestra. Yet somehow in the death scene from "Boris" at the end of the concert, he produced a superfortissimo that made those other climaxes sound like mezzo-forte.

Considering that this mastery of the directorial skills is combined in Stokowski with a natural understanding of what makes music dramatic, the excitement he generated in Beethoven's Dionysian Seventh was not surprising. Where he surpasses many other conductors of dramatic temperament, however, is in his ability to maintain a high degree of classic transparency — to keep things tidy as well as tense.

No radical changes

His two arrangements on this program, though purists may disagree, were not so objectionable as some of his older keyboard transcriptions. His suite from "Boris" embodies a certain amount of tampering with Mussorgsky's orchestration. But what we are used to hearing—the version by Rimsky-Korsakov—is no closer to the original. Stokowski's arrangement, in fact, probably retains more of the earthiness that Mussorgsky had in mind; in any case, it does not involve radical stylistic changes, as the old Bach orchestrations did.

With the Overture to "Don Giovanni" Stokowski has done essentially what Wagner did in preparing a concert version of his prelude to "Tristan und Isolde." In staged performances of both works, the overture is not a "closed" number, but leads directly into Act I. Stokowski followed Wagner's example in closing the overture with music from the last act in order to give it a sense of dramatic completeness.

Obscure Tchaikovsky

The one relatively obscure work on this program was Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet"—Fantasy Overture, Op. 67a. The piece has some appealing moments, particularly a section of Russian folk-like melody, played by the oboe and English horn. But some of the other thematic, and nearly all of the transitional material, is uninspired. It is a work which abounds in Tchaikovskian clichés—especially in its over-dependence on the modulating sequence—and which seems sure to lose what foothold it has had on the symphonic repertory.

Still, Stokowski conducted it as though it were a brand new masterpiece. We may not hear such an enthusiastic and sympathetic performance again for some time. But for that matter, it's not so often that we hear such fulfilling Mozart, Beethoven, or Mussorgsky either.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIR. 4..259

JAN 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Stokowski Leads BSO In Thrilling Concert

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Fabulous Leopold Stokowski, resplendent in an Oxford grey clawhammer dress coat and Ascot tie, was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor yesterday afternoon, offering Austrian and Russian music. Though he is in his 86th year, his orchestral control still is superbly effective.

He began with Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, which overture, which plunges at once into the opera's climax with heavy chords proclaiming the coming of the statue to keep its grim appointment with Don Juan. The scale passages are taken from the ghastly denunciation.

Dr. Stokowski

Rather than using Johann Andre's concert ending, Dr. Stokowski contrived a coda taken from the opera's last act for the final bars of this overture. It was a sturdy performance, the drama being emphasized with finely falculated effect, the orchestra playing splendidly.

Beethoven's seventh symphony (p. 92, in A) rounded out the first half of this select program. The introduction (Poco sostenuto) is the nearest the composer comes to a slow movement in this symphony. By subtle alteration of tempo and rhythm, the principal subject is introduced, a rollicking tune in fast 6/8 time.

The second movement contains another of those Beethovenish themes which are so difficult to classify. Simple in melodic outline, its principal characteristic is a persistently gentle rhythm, resembling taps on a windowpane. The third movement is a very swift and equally exciting scherzo.

The fourth movement, whose thematic material is rudimentary, but characteristic, has a dionysiac quality which has moved literary men, as well as musicians, to rhapsodies. Dr. Stokowski gave a masterful interpretation in romantic style, phrased subtly with affection and understanding and played beautifully by Boston's virtuosi.

After the interval came an impassioned exposition of Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" fantasy overture (Op. 67a). It is a free treatment, like the "Russian Weeper's" turbulent "Romeo & Juliet" overture, of episodes from Shakespeare's play, but less successful than the earlier work.

It was a strong, intently organized performance, projected with excellent orchestral control by the guest conductor.

Concluding was a first local performance of Dr. Stokowski's own transscription of excerpts from Musorgski's "Boris Godunov." It is a showpiece rendition of Musorgski's moving, tragedy-drenched score, separate episodes being spliced with expert repairmanship. The Bostonians' playing of this "symphonic synthesis" was superfine.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN 956,206

JAN 31 1968

At the Academy

Stokowski Conducts Boston Symphony in Annual Concert Here

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Leopold Stokowski appeared Tuesday in an unfamiliar role, that of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that ensemble's annual program at the Academy of Music.

But if his orchestra was different his orientation was not. His program was flamingly theatrical in the best sense, the orchestra providing an instrument on which th 85-year-old conductor played with characteristic color.

The Boston orchstera has always had winds and brass of th best and Stokowski adapted their free brilliance to the way he wanted his music to sound.

METRICAL WHIMSIES

Three of his selections were of the theater: Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni," a suite from Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounov" and Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" Overture, a tone picture of the play.

The fourth, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, was also of the theater in this reading.

Stokowski's name was affixed to the Moussorgsky music as its adaptor, but his name might as well be placed with Beethoven's. The conductor led a performance that was full of metrical whimsies and special brass effects, yet the reading was never arbitrary.

RITARD AT END

It was a daring reading in its freedom and it did not always reach the heights he aimed for. The second and fourth movements did, however, and the subtle construction of the climax in the finale brought shouts from the crowd.

The third movement gave the impression of having been tinkered with too much: The enormous ritard at the end weakened his effect rather than strengthened it.

The scenes from "Boris" showed the orchestra in its best form. Stokowski's adaptation was from the original score and avoided the often glossy brilliance of the Rimsky-Korsakov orchestration used in most performances. In its place was a much more subtle version, often brilliantly colored but with a special quality of clarity.

VARIETY OF COLOR

Stokowski had led the first American performances of the original score 30 years ago and his hand on the drama is as sure as ever. His suite contrasts the pagan with the religious, the peasant and the Czar and his effects are titanic.

The variety of color from within the orchestra made the performance a revelation. Beyond the secure realization of the notes was a sense of pent-up excitment, the essence of this opera.

The Tchaikovsky tone poem is a novelty, full of sentimental gestures and virtuoso writing, some of which was blurred.

The Mozart Overture, however, set the tone for the evening. It was richly colored, vigorous, stirring and included a Stokowski interpolation of a few bars from the penultimate scene of the opera just to give Mozart a hand.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

JAN 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Music

Boston Symphony Under Baton of Stokowski

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Leopold Stokowski who was recently selected Musician of the Year by a leading musical publication, and who for many years has been one of the leading personalities in his field, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of next Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

The eminent maestro will be the first of three guest conductors to direct the Orchestra during the current month. His first appearance with the Boston Symphony was in 1964, and he subsequently has been a guest again in 1965 both in Boston and at Tanglewood.

Leopold Stokowski

On Thursday evening the concert will be in Providence, and the week-end group in Symphony hall. For these events he has selected the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni"; the Symphony No. 7 by Beethoven, Hamlet, Fantasy Overture by Tschaikovsky and specially arranged orchestral excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov."

Tuesday evening (Jan. 9), Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO will direct the fourth program in the Tuesday B series concerts. Mr. Wilson who has proven impressive in his short time with the Orchestra will program the Academic Festival Overture by Brahms, Symphony No. 1 by Henze, and the ever welcome Sheherazade by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Highlighting this week's offering at the Metropolitan Opera in New York is "Martha" which was composed and produced in 1847 by Flotow who was prominent in the operatic field and especially so in Vienna. He achieved lasting success because of this delightful and easy to follow piece. During the current revival at the Metropolitan Rosalind Elias is sharing honors with a carefuly selected cast.

It will be jazz time in Boston on February 16, and 17 when the big town hosts an impressive lineup of stars in the field of rhythmical music making.

The affair is a winter setting of Newport's fast growing summer festival, and possibly nowhere can those faithful followers of music in the modern three season way find more to enjoy and cheer for.

There also will be the hard driving band of Count Basie. the exciting Afro-Cuban rhythms of the Mongo Santamaria groups, stellar flutist Herbie Mann, the new-directions sound of vibraphonist Gary Burton with the quartet featuring Larry Coryell and the singing of Carmen McRae.

The parade will also bring into the spotlight Duke Ellington and his orchestra, poll-winning guitarist, Wes Montgomery and his trio, South African singer, Miriam Makeba and the Jim Kweskin Jug band.

Though his accomplishments were unlimited in the musical world, Paul Whiteman produced one thing that to date has never been equalled by any other musician. His styling of "Rhapsody in Blue" has defied the ever changing pattern and the creative experiments of conductors and instrumentalists of this era, as well as those years that immediately followed the mid-twenties when Gershwin made his never to be forgotten contribution.

Rhapsody has within itself only one media by which it can be cadenced and totally colored. There can be no classical touch anywhere in its intricate pattern, no change of style in phrasing or change of technique in instrumentation. Today we hear it played by leading symphonic and concert orchestras throughout the entire world. There is fine musicianship, but in no sense a true fusion of the classical and jazz worlds. Whiteman had within himself a genius that enabled him to see in this music a world never before known to either players or composers, and his feeling and ability to express this provided for us one of the great musical accomplishments of this century.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIR. 4 ...

JAN 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Stokowski Leads BSO In Thrilling Concert

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Fabulous Leopold Stokowski, resplendent in an Oxford grey clawhammer dress coat and Ascot tie, was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor yesterday afternoon, offering Austrian and Russian music. Though he is in his 86th year, his orchestral control still is superbly effective.

He began with Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, which overture, which plunges at once into the opera's climax with heavy chords proclaiming the coming of the statue to keep its grim appointment with Don Juan. The scale passages are taken from the ghastly denunciation.

Dr. Stokowski

Rather than using Johann Andre's concert ending, Dr. Stokowski contrived a coda taken from the opera's last act for the final bars of this overture. It was a sturdy performance, the drama being emphasized with finely falculated effect, the orchestra playing splendidly.

Beethoven's seventh symphony (p. 92, in A) rounded out the first half of this select program. The introduction (Poco sostenuto) is the nearest the composer comes to a slow movement in this symphony. By subtle alteration of tempo and rhythm, the principal subject is introduced, a rollicking tune in fast 6/8 time.

The second movement contains another of those Beethovenish themes which are so difficult to classify. Simple in melodic outline, its principal characteristic is a persistently gentle rhythm, resembling taps on a windowpane. The third movement is a very swift and equally exciting scherzo.

The fourth movement, whose thematic material is rudimentary, but characteristic, has a dionysiac quality which has moved literary men, as well as musicians, to rhapsodies. Dr. Stokowski gave a masterful interpretation in romantic style, phrased subtly with affection and understanding and played beautifully by Boston's virtuosi.

After the interval came an impassioned exposition of Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" fantasy overture (Op. 67a). It is a free treatment, like the "Russian Weeper's" turbulent "Romeo & Juliet" overture, of episodes from Shakespeare's play, but less successful than the earlier work.

It was a strong, intently organized performance, projected with excellent orchestral control by the guest conductor.

Concluding was a first local performance of Dr. Stokowski's own transscription of excerpts from Musorgski's "Boris Godunov." It is a showpiece rendition of Musorgski's moving, tragedy-drenched score, separate episodes being spliced with expert repairmanship. The Bostonians' playing of this "symphonic synthesis" was superfine.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,041 SUN 956,209

JAN 31 1968

At the Academy

Stokowski Conducts Boston Symphony in Annual Concert Here

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

Leopold Stokowski appeared Tuesday in an unfamiliar role, that of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in that ensemble's annual program at the Academy of Music.

But if his orchestra was different his orientation was not. His program was flamingly theatrical in the best sense, the orchestra providing an instrument on which th 85-year-old conductor played with characteristic color.

The Boston orchstera has always had winds and brass of th best and Stokowski adapted their free brilliance to the way he wanted his music to sound.

METRICAL WHIMSIES

Three of his selections were of the theater: Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni," a suite from Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounov" and Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" Overture, a tone picture of the play.

The fourth, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, was also of the theater in this reading.

Stokowski's name was affixed to the Moussorgsky music as its adaptor, but his name might as well be placed with Beethoven's. The conductor led a performance that was full of metrical whimsies and special brass effects, yet the reading was never arbitrary.

RITARD AT END

It was a daring reading in its freedom and it did not always reach the heights he aimed for. The second and fourth movements did, however, and the subtle construction of the climax in the finale brought shouts from the crowd.

The third movement gave the impression of having been tinkered with too much: The enormous ritard at the end weakened his effect rather than strengthened it.

The scenes from "Boris" showed the orchestra in its best form. Stokowski's adaptation was from the original score and avoided the often glossy brilliance of the Rimsky-Korsakov orchestration used in most performances. In its place was a much more subtle version, often brilliantly colored but with a special quality of clarity.

VARIETY OF COLOR

Stokowski had led the first American performances of the original score 30 years ago and his hand on the drama is as sure as ever. His suite contrasts the pagan with the religious, the peasant and the Czar and his effects are titanic.

The variety of color from within the orchestra made the performance a revelation. Beyond the secure realization of the notes was a sense of pent-up excitment, the essence of this opera.

The Tchaikovsky tone poem is a novelty, full of sentimental gestures and virtuoso writing, some of which was blurred.

The Mozart Overture, however, set the tone for the evening. It was richly colored, vigorous, stirring and included a Stokowski interpolation of a few bars from the penultimate scene of the opera just to give Mozart a hand.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

JAN 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Music

Boston Symphony Under Baton of Stokowski

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Leopold Stokowski who was recently selected Musician of the Year by a leading musical publication, and who for many years has been one of the leading personalities in his field, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of next Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

The eminent maestro will be the first of three guest conductors to direct the Orchestra during the current month. His first appearance with the Boston Symphony was in 1964, and he subsequently has been a guest again in 1965 both in Boston and at Tanglewood.

Leopold Stokowski

On Thursday evening the concert will be in Providence, and the week-end group in Symphony hall. For these events he has selected the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni"; the Symphony No. 7 by Beethoven, Hamlet, Fantasy Overture by Tschaikovsky and specially arranged orchestral excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov."

Tuesday evening (Jan. 9), Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO will direct the fourth program in the Tuesday B series concerts. Mr. Wilson who has proven impressive in his short time with the Orchestra will program the Academic Festival Overture by Brahms, Symphony No. 1 by Henze, and the ever welcome Sheherazade by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Highlighting this week's offering at the Metropolitan Opera in New York is "Martha" which was composed and produced in 1847 by Flotow who was prominent in the operatic field and especially so in Vienna. He achieved lasting success because of this delightful and easy to follow piece. During the current revival at the Metropolitan Rosalind Elias is sharing honors with a carefuly selected cast.

It will be jazz time in Boston on February 16, and 17 when the big town hosts an impressive lineup of stars in the field of rhythmical music making.

The affair is a winter setting of Newport's fast growing summer festival, and possibly nowhere can those faithful followers of music in the modern three season way find more to enjoy and cheer for.

There also will be the hard driving band of Count Basie. the exciting Afro-Cuban rhythms of the Mongo Santamaria groups, stellar flutist Herbie Mann, the new-directions sound of vibraphonist Gary Burton with the quartet featuring Larry Coryell and the singing of Carmen McRae.

The parade will also bring into the spotlight Duke Ellington and his orchestra, poll-winning guitarist, Wes Montgomery and his trio, South African singer, Miriam Makeba and the Jim Kweskin Jug band.

Though his accomplishments were unlimited in the musical world, Paul Whiteman produced one thing that to date has never been equalled by any other musician. His styling of "Rhapsody in Blue" has defied the ever changing pattern and the creative experiments of conductors and instrumentalists of this era, as well as those years that immediately followed the mid-twenties when Gershwin made his never to be forgotten contribution.

Rhapsody has within itself only one media by which it can be cadenced and totally colored. There can be no classical touch anywhere in its intricate pattern, no change of style in phrasing or change of technique in instrumentation. Today we hear it played by leading symphonic and concert orchestras throughout the entire world. There is fine musicianship, but in no sense a true fusion of the classical and jazz worlds. Whiteman had within himself a genius that enabled him to see in this music a world never before known to either players or composers, and his feeling and ability to express this provided for us one of the great musical accomplishments of this century.

36

FRI - SAT XIV / TUES A - VIII

Fourteenth Program

Friday afternoon January 19 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 20 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NEWS (e)
SALEM, MASS.
CIRC. 28,550

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Charles Munch Returns To Symphony Hall For For Jan. 19-20 Concerts

Charles Munch, retired Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returns to Symphony Hall for next week's Friday-Saturday (Jan. 19-20) concerts. His program will be devoted entirely to Hector Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet. As soloists Mr. Munch has invited Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, and Donald Gramm with Boston's Chorus pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, Director. The last performances of Romeo and Juliet by the Orchestra were in April 1961 at Symphony Hall and later that year at Tanglewood also under Mr. Munch.

On Tuesday evening, Jan. 16, Leopold Stokowski will conduct

Continued on Page Eight

will be honored at that time. Patrons unable to attend on March 7 must return Dec. 28 tickets for refund to Symphony Hall Box Office prior to March 5.

Seventh Program

Tuesday evening January 23 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

DEC 31 1967 New England Newsclip

ROSALIND ELIAS, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, will be a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," conducted by Charles Munch on Jan. 19, 20, 23 and 25.

3 Concerts By Symphony

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the New Year will be given on Tuesday evening and the twelfth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts is also scheduled this week in Symphony Hall. These concerts will mark the midpoint of the orchestra's 87th season.

For the weekend concerts Erich Leinsdorf has chosen an all-orchestral program which will begin with Haydn's Symphony No. 24. The Partitia for Orchestra by the twentieth century Italian composer Goffredo Petrassi and Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, "Scottish" will complete these programs.

On Tuesday evening Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the concert with Bach's Cantata No. 35 with Beverly Wolff as soloist. The remainder of the program consists of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Following the Friday-Saturday concerts Mr. Leinsdorf begins a one-month holiday during which he will conduct the Orchestra National in Paris on Jan. 12 and 17. In his absence Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Leopold Stokowski, Charles Munch, and Seiji Ozawa to conduct the orchestra's concerts during the balance of January.

JOURNAL & PRESS
SOMERVILLE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,600

JAN 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Munch-conducted Symphony Aired On WGBH Jan. 19

Charles Much will return to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a full-length performance of "Romeo and Juliet", by Berlioz, Friday, Jan. 19, at 2 p.m. on WGBH radio.

Munch will also conduct this work Saturday, Jan. 20, at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, Jan. 23, at 8:30 p.m. WGBH-FM will broadcast all three concerts, direct from Symphony Hall. Friday and Tuesday programs will be aired in stereo; the Saturday concert will be in mono.

Joining conductor Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Jerold Siena, bass Donald Gramm and the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 30 1968 New England Newsclip

'Santa Claus' Munch

Santa Claus came to Symphony Hall, Jan. 23. His name was Charles Munch. The musicians in the once first ranking orchestra made music. This season, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there has been no nobility and questionable musicality. The 1640 seats are not filled with musicians. The majority of the musicians are on stage. The audience comes to hear and to feel. If the men in the orchestra play notes only and if they play soullessly, the music lovers have been deprived.

The Tuesday evening program of Berlioz is not on the "best seller" list. The orchestra personnel was the same as it has been all season. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra "gave" to Father Christmas (Charles Munch) and the audience finally this season got to hear and to feel.

BEVERLY ANNE FOX
Boston

36

FRI - SAT XIV / TUES A - VII

Fourteenth Program

Friday afternoon January 19 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 20 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NEWS (e)
SALEM, MASS.
CIRC. 28,550

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Charles Munch Returns To Symphony Hall For For Jan. 19-20 Concerts

Charles Munch, retired Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returns to Symphony Hall for next week's Friday-Saturday (Jan. 19-20) concerts. His program will be devoted entirely to Hector Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet. As soloists Mr. Munch has invited Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena, and Donald Gramm with Boston's Chorus pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, Director. The last performances of Romeo and Juliet by the Orchestra were in April 1961 at Symphony Hall and later that year at Tanglewood also under Mr. Munch.

On Tuesday evening, Jan. 16, Leopold Stokowski will conduct

Continued on Page Eight

will be honored at that time. Patrons unable to attend on March 7 must return Dec. 28 tickets for refund to Symphony Hall Box Office prior to March 5.

Seventh Program

Tuesday evening January 23 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.

DEC 31 1967 New England Newsclip

ROSALIND ELIAS, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, will be a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," conducted by Charles Munch on Jan. 19, 20, 23 and 25.

3 Concerts By Symphony

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the New Year will be given on Tuesday evening and the twelfth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts is also scheduled this week in Symphony Hall. These concerts will mark the midpoint of the orchestra's 87th season.

For the weekend concerts Erich Leinsdorf has chosen an all-orchestral program which will begin with Haydn's Symphony No. 24. The Partitia for Orchestra by the twentieth century Italian composer Goffredo Petrassi and Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, "Scottish" will complete these programs.

On Tuesday evening Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the concert with Bach's Cantata No. 35 with Beverly Wolff as soloist. The remainder of the program consists of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Following the Friday-Saturday concerts Mr. Leinsdorf begins a one-month holiday during which he will conduct the Orchestra National in Paris on Jan. 12 and 17. In his absence Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Leopold Stokowski, Charles Munch, and Seiji Ozawa to conduct the orchestra's concerts during the balance of January.

JOURNAL & PRESS
SOMERVILLE, MASS.
CIRC. 13,600

JAN 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Munch-conducted Symphony Aired On WGBH Jan. 19

Charles Much will return to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a full-length performance of "Romeo and Juliet" by Berlioz, Friday, Jan. 19, at 2 p.m. on WGBH radio.

Munch will also conduct this work Saturday, Jan. 20, at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, Jan. 23, at 8:30 p.m. WGBH-FM will broadcast all three concerts, direct from Symphony Hall. Friday and Tuesday programs will be aired in stereo; the Saturday concert will be in mono.

Joining conductor Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Jerold Siena, bass Donald Gramm and the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 30 1968 New England Newsclip

'Santa Claus' Munch

Santa Claus came to Symphony Hall, Jan. 23. His name was Charles Munch. The musicians in the once first ranking orchestra made music. This season, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there has been no nobility and questionable musicality. The 1640 seats are not filled with musicians. The majority of the musicians are on stage. The audience comes to hear and to feel. If the men in the orchestra play notes only and if they play soullessly, the music lovers have been deprived.

The Tuesday evening program of Berlioz is not on the "best seller" list. The orchestra personnel was the same as it has been all season. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra "gave" to Father Christmas (Charles Munch) and the audience finally this season got to hear and to feel.

BEVERLY ANNE FOX
Boston

36

FRI - SAT XIV / TUES A - VII

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourteenth Program

Friday afternoon January 19 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 20 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Continued from Page One

the last concert of his current guest engagement with the Orchestra. This program, the fourth of the Cambridge series, will open with Mozart's Overture to Don Giovanni and continue with Symphony No. 7 by Beethoven. Also to be heard are Fantasy Overture after Shakespeare, Op. 67a by Tchaikovsky and Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov orchestral excerpts as transcribed by Mr. Stokowski.

An Open Rehearsal will be held Thursday, Jan. 18 at 7:30 p.m. under the direction of Mr. Munch, who initiated the series of Open Rehearsals in 1950. The Rehearsal of Dec. 28, postponed by a snowstorm, will be made up on March 7. Tickets for the Dec. 28 Open Rehearsal will be honored at that time. Patrons unable to attend on March 7 must return Dec. 28 tickets for refund to Symphony Hall Box Office prior to March 5.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Seventh Program

Tuesday evening January 23 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MASS.
DEC 31 1967
New England Newsclip

ROSALIND ELIAS, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, will be a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," conducted by Charles Munch on Jan. 19, 20, 23 and 25.

3 Concerts By Symphony

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the New Year will be given on Tuesday evening and the twelfth pair of Friday-Saturday concerts is also scheduled this week in Symphony Hall. These concerts will mark the midpoint of the orchestra's 87th season.

For the weekend concerts Erich Leinsdorf has chosen an all-orchestral program which will begin with Haydn's Symphony No. 24. The Partitia for Orchestra by the twentieth century Italian composer Goffredo Petrassi and Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, "Scottish" will complete these programs.

On Tuesday evening Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the concert with Bach's Cantata No. 35 with Beverly Wolff as soloist. The remainder of the program consists of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Following the Friday-Saturday concerts Mr. Leinsdorf begins a one-month holiday during which he will conduct the Orchestra National in Paris on Jan. 13 and 17. In his absence Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Leopold Stokowski, Charles Munch, and Seiji Ozawa to conduct the orchestra's concerts during the balance of January.

JOURNAL & PRESS
SOMERVILLE, MASS.
CIRC. 33,500
JAN 11 1968
New England Newsclip

Munch-conducted Symphony Aired On WGBH Jan. 19

Charles Much will return to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a full-length performance of "Romeo and Juliet" by Berlioz, Friday, Jan. 19, at 2 p.m. on WGBH radio.

Munch will also conduct this work Saturday, Jan. 20, at 8:30 p.m. and Tuesday, Jan. 23, at 8:30 p.m. WGBH-FM will broadcast all three concerts, direct from Symphony Hall. Friday and Tuesday programs will be aired in stereo; the Saturday concert will be in mono.

Joining conductor Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Jerold Siena, bass Donald Gramm and the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
JAN 30 1968
New England Newsclip

'Santa Claus' Munch

Santa Claus came to Symphony Hall, Jan. 23. His name was Charles Munch. The musicians in the once first ranking orchestra made music. This season, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there has been no nobility and questionable musicality. The 1640 seats are not filled with musicians. The majority of the musicians are on stage. The audience comes to hear and to feel. If the men in the orchestra play notes only and if they play soullessly, the music lovers have been deprived.

The Tuesday evening program of Berlioz is not on the "best seller" list. The orchestra personnel was the same as it has been all season. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra "gave" to Father Christmas (Charles Munch) and the audience finally this season got to hear and to feel.

BEVERLY ANNE FOX
Boston

THAURS - B II - II

37

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program

Thursday evening January 25 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JAN 24 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

'Romeo' A La Munch

By Peter M. Knapp

Back at the helm of the Boston Symphony for a guest series, Charles Munch naturally brought with him one of the French scores in which he excels: "Romeo and Juliet," Hector Berlioz' "dramatic symphony."

As Berlioz explained it in a preface to the score, the work is "neither an opera in concert form nor a cantata, but a symphony with chorus," based loosely on Shakespeare's tragedy and using the term "symphony" with equal license. Though the form was novel at the time, Berlioz being one of the major symphonic innovators, the hybrid structure is less problematic today than its content.

Unabashed Ardor

No one today needs to be an apologist for Berlioz; certainly Munch has done as much as anyone to accord him an honored place among composers. Yet there is much in Berlioz that remains an acquired taste. As with Liszt, you have to accept the excess confection with the true tidbits, "Romeo and Juliet" needs an accomplished performance to make its points.

Fortunately, Munch understands Berlioz and presents him with unabashed ardor and that luminous gleam of sound he produces in the Gallic repertoire. A less sympathetic reading could be embarrassing in the score's weaker moments, and even Munch cannot make "Romeo" altogether enthralling. But he does as much as anyone can to make the sprawling canvas coherent and palatable.

In the score's finest moments — the Love Scene; the stanzas for contralto solo, sung with an elegant sheen by Rosalind Elias; the Queen Mab scherzo; the introduction to Part II — Berlioz' gift for atmosphere, his melodic ideas, and his tremendous skill as an orchestrator come to full flower. Yet his garden is also full of weeds; the golden moments are surrounded by stretches of banal composition, and even at his best he is inclined to be prolix.

Gramm Excels

Last night's performance began with boisterous and sloppy string playing in the fugal scramble depicting the Montagues and Capulets busily feuding. Then Munch settled things down and the orchestral texture often took on the integrated hues the conductor achieves at his best. He received a warm welcome from the audience at his arrival, somewhat heavier than when we last saw him.

The Chorus Pro Musica, prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, contributed excellent choral work, balanced, precise in intonation and diction. Besides Miss Elias, the solo work was accomplished by tenor Jerold Siena, in the brief scherzetto for Mercutio, and bass-baritone Donald Gramm, who brought unusual distinction to Friar Laurence's scene, matching perfect enunciation of the French text to his customary talents for dramatic expression. Final mention must be made of the woodwinds for their unfailing precision and their beauty of sound.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

JAN 20 1968 New England Newsclip

Munch Leads Symphony In Solid 'Romeo' Concert

Reunited with Charles Munch in yesterday's concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was led by its former director in an exuberant performance of Romeo and Juliette, Hector Berlioz' Third Symphony, (Opus 17).

The two-hour long work, subtitled by the composer Dramatic Symphony resembles an opera in concert form. Berlioz aimed to have it performed in either concert hall or on the operatic stage, though it does not really seem at home in either role.

Romeo and Juliette is divided into 10 parts, instrumental and choral, with three soloists interpolating narrative passages. Contralto Rosalind Elias, who recorded the Symphony in R. C. A. Victor's release with the same orchestra under Dr. Munch has a voice of rich beauty that reminded me of the great Alma Gluck.

Jerold Siena was a smooth tenor; and Donald Gramm, baritone, as Friar Laurence, bringing the feud of Montague and Capulet to an end, used his superb voice with authority and power. Both Miss Elias and Gramm are regular members of the Metropolitan Opera of New York.

The Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor, sang with sensitivity and polish, Berlioz, himself, explains the choral interludes: "The purpose of bringing in voices almost at the beginning is to prepare the hearer for the dramatic sense in which the sentiments and passions must be expressed by the orchestra."

The incurably romantic composer never succeeded in opera, but here he comes close to writing one. The emotional build-up is operatic. There are 12 individual numbers, the high points of Shakespear's play being chosen for musical treatment. Berlioz never achieves the singability of Gounod, but his melodies have more spine and individuality.

The choral narratives seem more philosophical than involved but when the orchestra states Romeo's theme there is a glowing dramatic intensity—a spiritual beauty.

Berlioz, at 36, when he composed this work, had a reputation for being widly radical; today his glowing orchestration and incandescent innovations and combinations show him to be one of the most exciting composers of the 19th Century.

Dr. Munch, who, for 13 years was director of the Boston Symphony conducted superbly. More vigorous than ever, he out-Berliozed Berlioz. His warm empathy for Berlioz made him the ideal conductor for the work. The program will be repeated at today's concert.

PATRICIA BOYD WILSON

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JAN 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Charles Munch to Conduct At Two Symphony Concerts

Charles Munch, retired music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, returns to Symphony Hall for this week's Friday-Saturday concerts.

His program will be devoted entirely to Hector Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." As soloists Mr. Munch has invited Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena and Donald Gramm with Boston's Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director.

The last performances of "Romeo and Juliet" by the Orchestra were in April 1961 at Symphony Hall and later that year at Tanglewood, also under Mr. Munch.

On Tuesday evening Leopold Stokowski will conduct the last concert of his current guest engagement with the orchestra.

This program, the fourth of the "Cambridge" series, will open with Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni" and continue with Symphony No. 7 by Beethoven. Also to be heard are Fantasy Overture after Shakespeare, Op. 67a by Tchaikovsky and Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" orchestral excerpts as translated by Mr. Stokowski.

An open rehearsal will be held Thursday evening at 7:30 under the direction of Mr. Munch, who initiated the series of open rehearsals in 1950.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

JAN 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Munch, Berlioz 'Romeo' Return to B.S.O. Series

The Boston Symphony's former conductor, Charles Munch, returns to Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening to conduct a work with which he has long associations — Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette."

Appearing with the orchestra will be the Chorus pro Musica, and soloists mezzo - soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Donald Gramm. Final preparations will come Thursday at 7:30 at the open rehearsal, a practice initiated by Munch during his tenure, 1949-1962.

Tuesday's concert at 8:30 also will have a guest conductor. Leopold Stokowski will repeat his last weekend's program of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" Overture, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, the Tchaikovsky "Hamlet" and orchestral excerpts from Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" as arranged by Stokowski.

THURS - B II

37

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Second Program
Thursday evening January 25 at 8.30

CHARLES MUNCH guest conductor

BERLIOZ Roméo et Juliette op. 17
Text by Emile Deschamps

Introduction: Combats – Tumult – Intervention of the Prince

Prologue (choral recitative with contralto solo)

Stanzas (contralto and chorus)

Recitative and scherzetto (tenor and chorus)

Romeo alone – Melancholy – Concert and ball – Festivity at the Capulets

Calm night (with chorus) – The Capulets' garden silent and deserted – Love scene

Scherzo: Queen Mab, or the fairy of dreams

INTERMISSION

Juliet's funeral procession (with chorus)

Romeo in the tomb of the Capulets: Invocation – Juliet's awakening – Delirium of joy – Despair – Pangs of death

Finale: Cemetery throng – Brawl of the Capulets and Montagues – Recitative and aria of Friar Laurence – Oath of reconciliation

ROSALIND ELIAS contralto
JEROLD SIENA tenor
DONALD GRAMM baritone

CHORUS PRO MUSICA
ALFRED NASH PATTERSON conductor

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JAN 24 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

'Romeo' A La Munch

By Peter M. Knapp

Back at the helm of the Boston Symphony for a guest series, Charles Munch naturally brought with him one of the French scores in which he excels: "Romeo and Juliet," Hector Berlioz' "dramatic symphony."

As Berlioz explained it in a preface to the score, the work is "neither an opera in concert form nor a cantata, but a symphony with chorus," based loosely on Shakespeare's tragedy and using the term "symphony" with equal license. Though the form was novel at the time, Berlioz being one of the major symphonic innovators, the hybrid structure is less problematic today than its content.

Unabashed Ardor

No one today needs to be an apologist for Berlioz; certainly Munch has done as much as anyone to accord him an honored place among composers. Yet there is much in Berlioz that remains an acquired taste. As with Liszt, you have to accept the excess confection with the true tidbits, "Romeo and Juliet" needs an accomplished performance to make its points.

Fortunately, Munch understands Berlioz and presents him with unabashed ardor and that luminous gleam of sound he produces in the Gallic repertoire. A less sympathetic reading could be embarrassing in the score's weaker moments, and even Munch cannot make "Romeo" altogether enthralling. But he does as much as anyone can to make the sprawling canvas coherent and palatable.

In the score's finest moments — the Love Scene; the stanzas for contralto solo, sung with an elegant sheen by Rosalind Elias; the Queen Mab scherzo; the introduction to Part II — Berlioz' gift for atmosphere, his melodic ideas, and his tremendous skill as an orchestrator come to full flower. Yet his garden is also full of weeds; the golden moments are surrounded by stretches of banal composition, and even at his best he is inclined to be prolix.

Gramm Excels

Last night's performance began with boisterous and sloppy string playing in the fugal scramble depicting the Montagues and Capulets busily feuding. Then Munch settled things down and the orchestral texture often took on the integrated hues the conductor achieves at his best. He received a warm welcome from the audience at his arrival, somewhat heavier than when we last saw him.

The Chorus Pro Musica, prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, contributed excellent choral work, balanced, precise in intonation and diction. Besides Miss Elias, the solo work was accomplished by tenor Jerold Siena, in the brief scherzetto for Mercutio, and bass-baritone Donald Gramm, who brought unusual distinction to Friar Laurence's scene, matching perfect enunciation of the French text to his customary talents for dramatic expression. Final mention must be made of the woodwinds for their unfailing precision and their beauty of sound.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIR. 4[illegible],250

JAN 20 1968 New England Newsclip

Munch Leads Symphony In Solid 'Romeo' Concert

Reunited with Charles Munch in yesterday's concert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was led by its former director in an exuberant performance of Romeo and Juliette, Hector Berlioz' Third Symphony, (Opus 17).

The two-hour long work, subtitled by the composer Dramatic Symphony resembles an opera in concert form. Berlioz aimed to have it performed in either concert hall or on the operatic stage, though it does not really seem at home in either role.

Romeo and Juliette is divided into 10 parts, instrumental and choral, with three soloists interpolating narrative passages. Contralto Rosalind Elias, who recorded the Symphony in R. C. A. Victor's release with the same orchestra under Dr. Munch has a voice of rich beauty that reminded me of the great Alma Gluck.

Jerold Siena was a smooth tenor; and Donald Gramm, baritone, as Friar Laurence, bringing the feud of Montague and Capulet to an end, used his superb voice with authority and power. Both Miss Elias and Gramm are regular members of the Metropolitan Opera of New York.

The Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor, sang with sensitivity and polish. Berlioz, himself, explains the choral interludes: "The purpose of bringing in voices almost at the beginning is to prepare the hearer for the dramatic sense in which the sentiments and passions must be expressed by the orchestra."

The incurably romantic composer never succeeded in opera, but here he comes close to writing one. The emotional build-up is operatic. There are 12 individual numbers, the high points of Shakespear's play being chosen for musical treatment. Berlioz never achieves the singability of Gounod, but his melodies have more spine and individuality.

The choral narratives seem more philosophical than involved but when the orchestra states Romeo's theme there is a glowing dramatic intensity—a spiritual beauty.

Berlioz, at 36, when he composed this work, had a reputation for being widly radical; today his glowing orchestration and incandescent innovations and combinations show him to be one of the most exciting composers of the 19th Century.

Dr. Munch, who, for 13 years was director of the Boston Symphony conducted superbly. More vigorous than ever, he out-Berliozed Berlioz. His warm empathy for Berlioz made him the ideal conductor for the work. The program will be repeated at today's concert.

PATRICIA BOYD WILSON

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JAN 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Charles Munch to Conduct At Two Symphony Concerts

Charles Munch, retired music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, returns to Symphony Hall for this week's Friday-Saturday concerts.

His program will be devoted entirely to Hector Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." As soloists Mr. Munch has invited Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena and Donald Gramm with Boston's Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director.

The last performances of "Romeo and Juliet" by the Orchestra were in April 1961 at Symphony Hall and later that year at Tanglewood, also under Mr. Munch.

On Tuesday evening Leopold Stokowski will conduct the last concert of his current guest engagement with the orchestra.

This program, the fourth of the "Cambridge" series, will open with Mozart's Overture to "Don Giovanni" and continue with Symphony No. 7 by Beethoven. Also to be heard are Fantasy Overture after Shakespeare, Op. 67a by Tchaikovsky and Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" orchestral excerpts as translated by Mr. Stokowski.

An open rehearsal will be held Thursday evening at 7:30 under the direction of Mr. Munch, who initiated the series of open rehearsals in 1950.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

JAN 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Munch, Berlioz 'Romeo' Return to B.S.O. Series

The Boston Symphony's former conductor, Charles Munch, returns to Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening to conduct a work with which he has long associations — Berlioz's "Romeo et Juliette."

Appearing with the orchestra will be the Chorus pro Musica, and soloists mezzo - soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Donald Gramm. Final preparations will come Thursday at 7:30 at the open rehearsal, a practice initiated by Munch during his tenure, 1949-1962.

Tuesday's concert at 8:30 also will have a guest conductor. Leopold Stokowski will repeat his last weekend's program of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" Overture, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, the Tchaikovsky "Hamlet" and orchestral excerpts from Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" as arranged by Stokowski.

38

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 20 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Munch Brings Continuity, Form to 'Romeo and Juliet'

By McLAREN HARRIS

My entire acquaintance with Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo Juliet" is due largely to Charles Munch, either through live performance during his tenure as conductor here or through his recording with the Boston Symphony. I think I'd just as soon keep things that way.

There seemed to be much in yesterday's performance to suggest that it was in some manner a continuation of an earlier time. Munch's baton form has undergone little change. One sees less of the sudden crouches, then quick leaps with feet leaving the podium which he used to emphasize orchestral attacks, but the arm-work is as before: abrupt, even jerky motions, over-the-shoulder upbeats, elbows setting the tempo while wrists beat double time. It has never been regarded as a clean or precise technique, but it usually seemed to work for him (or he succeeded in spite of it) when he believed strongly in the music at hand.

TENUOUS ALLIANCE

Munch believes in "Romeo and Juliet," and fortunately, for it is a kind of tenuous alliance of absolute and programmatic elements which must be believed to be seen. There are sections, notably the orchestral movements of Part Two (forming the heart of the symphonic plan) which can be appreciated as pure music, but the work as a whole is inextricable from Shakespeare's tragedy.

Excepting the music for the death of the two lovers—rather crudely descriptive—the narrative, choral and solo music succeeds in adding dramatic embellishment, not interference to the symphonic scheme, whose only fault is an over-long choral finale. But it takes a leader with complete empathy to keep these forces in tow, close to the central theme, and from falling into a basically metric, dynamically shallow exercise.

For a short while at the beginning I was afraid Munch would not succeed. The tumult of the Introduction was energetic enough but a missed entrance here or there robbed some of its foreboding; in its recitative the Chorus pro Musica was rhythmically accurate but tonally scattered. But through the contralto and tenor verses the substance jelled and by Romeo's orchestral soliloquy the conductor was in firm control. The Fete crackled with spirit, the Love Scene exuded warmth from cellos and horns, the Queen Mab Scherzo was airy and sparkling without being frail.

The chorus, too, gathered its strengths for the Cemetery Throng and Reconciliation, responding in kind to Donald Gramm's Friar Laurence, a deep-toned, ringingly eloquent and flawless-dictioned portrayal. Rosalind Elias' contralto verses were projected with passion and in dark tones, though her words were covered (she was also challenged by an overly-prominent harp accompaniment). Jerold Siena's tenor, of somewhat earthbound inspiration, held an adequate command.

It was yet Munch's inscrutable baton which hammered form and continuity into "Romeo," which some consider as rambling and unapproachable as Strauss' "Don Quixote." He put attention where it was needed, now and then departing from metric patterns to prod a certain instrumental section or add fire to a fortissimo. As I said before, it worked.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JAN 22 1968 New England Newsclip

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Munch's return acclaimed

By Craig Stinson

Friday afternoon's concert at Symphony Hall was a harmonious homecoming for Charles Munch, and a felicitous occasion for all others concerned: the Boston Symphony, the Chorus Pro Musica, the soloists, and—not least—Hector Berlioz, whose "Romeo et Juliette" was the subject of the day.

The effect of a French conductor and a French score on the Boston Symphony was as beneficial as it was immediately evident. The brass-heavy, bottom-heavy quality that has distorted some of the Symphony's more recent offerings gave way to a texture of greater balance and transparency.

Effective sonorities

Credit for this shift, of course, goes not simply to some abstract "national character" in Mr. Munch, but to his understanding of the kind of sonority that makes Berlioz most effective. Mr. Munch's equally valuable asset is a sense of timing, which gives dramatic continuity even to such a perilously cumbersome piece of music.

The dramatic effect was enhanced greatly by Donald Gramm's portrayal of Friar Laurence. The other soloists, contralto Rosalind Elias and tenor Jerold Siena, sang accurately and pleasingly, but without the vocal power and intensity that characterized Mr. Gramm's performance.

The Chorus Pro Musica, prepared under the direction of Alfred Nash Patterson, provided splendid support, with flawless French diction.

Mr. Munch was greeted by a rising ovation, and at the conclusion his listeners were unusually enthusiastic in their applause.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 20 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO performs Berlioz classic

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

"I must leave off all other work and write a masterpiece on a grand new plan, a splendid work, full of passion and imagination." So wrote Hector Berlioz, ready to enjoy the leisure that Paganini's gift to him of 20,000 francs would allow. Less than a year later "Romeo et Juliette," his Opus 17, was complete.

Berlioz was taken by Shakespeare's play years before his own composition; in 1831 he heard Bellini's operatic setting of the story, and complained that there was "no ball at the Capulets, no Mercutio, no grave . . .; in fact, no Shakespeare, nothing but utter failure."

In his "Dramatic Symphony wth Chorus, Vocal Solos, and Prologue in Choral Recitative," led by Charles Munch at Friday's BSO concert Berlioz included the episodes which he missed in Bellini's piece, though if Opus 17 is Shakespeare, it is so in spirit only. The chorus and alto soloist act as narrators, the chorus doubling as the Montague and Capulet families; Mercutio's Queen Mab speech is set in shortened form; and the bass soloist, acting Friar Laurence, gets to sing the most inflated verses written by librettist Emile Deschamps.

As for Friday afternoon's performance, let me start at the periphery. The break to let in late-comers, made between the orchestral introduction and the vocal prologue, was the most antimusical gesture imaginable. The sections are harmonically welded, and it makes as much sense separating them as it does the slow introduction from the body of a Haydn symphony.

Under Munch, several of the sections were made to sound like the real thing, or pretty close to it. 'Romeo in the Tomb of Capulets' was nicely paced, though string articulation not quite so smooth would, I think, have added more character. The love music, too, was well done. Is there a more beautiful love scene written? Wagner's "Tristan" music certainly works wonders, but then it is out to rape the listener; Berlioz's is not, and the distance we are allowed to keep makes it all the more poignant.

There's a good dose of the mindless, too. When the chorus and orchestra reverse roles at mid-point of Juliet's Dirge, the soprano singing of a long string of eighth-notes sounded like spaghetti being wound. We really can have no idea of the phrase, the line meandered so.

The Chorus Pro Musica was terribly stiff in the prologue, and seems to equate recitative with a wooden, uninvolved delivery, which doesn't work. Donald Gramm, the Friar Laurence, was — one muffed passage aside — first-rate; he sang forcefully, with fine sound and much character. Jerold Siena brings the wrong voice to Mercutio, and strains at that; and Rosalind Elias, in her 'Strophes,' sounded near hysterical.

Orchestral balance in general was lacking in woodwind color which worked most harm in the purely orchestral movements. Among these the 'Mab' scherzo was most sloppily played. Berlioz wrote that the work had to be studied "very nearly as though it were to be played by heart." This performance wasn't.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch, Guest Conductor; Rosalind Elias, contralto; Jerold Siena, tenor; Donald Gramm, baritone; with the Chorus Pro Musica, performing "Romeo et Juliette," Opus 17, by Hector Berlioz. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

FRI - SAT XV

39

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifteenth Program
Friday afternoon January 26 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 27 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA guest conductor

GLUCK — Iphigénie en Aulide – Overture

BERNSTEIN — The Age of Anxiety – Symphony no. 2 for piano and orchestra
(after W. H. Auden's poem)

PART ONE
The prologue: lento moderato
The seven ages: variations 1 - 7
The seven stages: variations 8 - 14

PART TWO
The dirge: largo
The masque: extremely fast
The epilogue: adagio – andante – con moto

YUJI TAKAHASHI piano

INTERMISSION

JOACHIM — Contrastes
First performance in Boston

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – Suite no. 2
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse générale

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

JAN 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa to conduct Boston Symphony here

The Boston Symphony will have Seiji Ozawa as guest conductor of its concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. These will be his first concerts in Boston with this orchestra, although he has conducted several Summers at Tanglewood.

Ozawa's program lists Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," Bernstein's Symphony No. 2 "Age of Anxiety," with Yuji Takahashi as piano soloist, Otto Joachim's "Contrastes" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2.

Born in Japan, Ozawa studied in 1960 at the B.S.O.'s Berkshire Music Center. He is music director of the Toronto Symphony. In this capacity he commissioned "Contrastes" for the 1967 Canadian Centennial. The German-trained composer is now resident in two other concerts this Canada.

The orchestra will give week, both to be conducted by Charles Munch. Tuesday and Thursday, both at 8:30, he will direct Berlioz' "Romeo et Juliette," with the Chorus pro Musica and soloists mezzo-soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Donald Gramm.

The week of Jan. 29 the orchestra will be on tour, playing in Hartford, Philadelphia and New York.

SUNDAY COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 188,450

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Concert Tonight In New Britain

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to the Bushnell Memorial Monday for its annual concert in the Bushnell Symphony Series it will include in its program two works not previously heard in this area. They are Leonard Bernstein's "Age of Anxiety," also known as his Symphony No. 2, and Otto Joachim's "Contrastes."

Also on the program, to be conducted by 32-year-old Seiji Ozawa in his first Hartford performance, will be: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie in Aulis" and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JAN 24 1968 New England Newsclip

By Whitestone

Weekend conductor

Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Toronto Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

FEB 7 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Ozawa On The Way Up

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . ends Hub guest stint

By Peter M. Knapp

Not too many years ago, Seiji Ozawa was a gifted Tanglewood student. Now, the 32-year-old Japanese conductor is making it big.

Already the music director of the Toronto Symphony and the Ravinia Festival, Ozawa has just been named conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra beginning in 1970 — the first Japanese to head a major American orchestra.

In Boston for guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, Ozawa is showing the qualities that have moved him up the ladder. He's precise and graceful in his motions, easy to follow. Aside from these externals. Ozawa is a musical conductor, one with the ability to draw impressive sounds from an orchestra, maintain discipline, infuse a sturdy underpinning of rhythm, and at times, to elicit excitement.

Weighty Gluck

The dimunitive conductor with a shaggy Beatle-style hairdo chose an interesting program for last night's Symphony Hall concert, the weight of it from the 20th century. The 18th century was represented briefly by Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," curiously performed in the manner one used to hear Mozart and Haydn — with a full house of strings. With the thick overlay of sound this imposed upon Gluck, Ozawa evoked a romantic sound for this dark-hued overture and crisp articulation from his players.

Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 2 — the "Age of Anxiety," based on W.H. Auden's 1946 "baroque eclogue" about the encounter of four persons in a bar during World War II and their search for an enduring faith in an age of nightmares — presented Yuji Takahashi as piano soloist.

Takahashi is also Japanese, also studied at Tanglewood, also has a westernized black mane. He played with a good sense of rhythm, a notably pure tone, but at times without much personality, and without the exuberance the jazz of the scherzo (Masque) requires.

Bernstein's music, however, doesn't really give the pianist much to bite into. According to the composer, the pianist "provides an almost autobiographical protagonist set against an orchestral mirror" in this programmatic symphony. Yet the protagonist is not a very interesting one; his music rambles like a pianist improvising his midnight moods for his own pleasure. Bernstein's symphony at any rate is most effective in Part I, notably in the two sets of seven variations each, and least attention-holding in the empty Coplandisms of the finale — a Hollywooden vision of faith.

No Two Alike

Otto Joachim's "Contrastes" moves still further along the musical time-line. It was premiered last May in Montreal by Ozawa, who commissioned it from the German-born composer, a violinist, violist and director of the Montreal Ensemble of ancient instruments.

"Contrastes" is a contemporary mixture of 12-tone and aleatory (chance) techniques, and since it all depends on the interpretation of the conductor and the individual players, no two performances can be the same, the conductor notes. The piece presents a gaggle of contrasting sounds, textures, intensities, with the recurring solo flute seemingly providing a pivotal point. But there seems little new here that similar pieces haven't provided.

Back in familiar territory, Ozawa concluded with an aurally splendid, rhythmically driving reading of the Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2, winding up in a virtuosic climax.

The Boston Symphony is mourning the death of Harold Thompson, a percussionist with the orchestra since 1952. Mr. Thompson was killed Monday when struck by a truck on the Massachusetts Turnpike.

FRI – SAT XV

39

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifteenth Program
Friday afternoon January 26 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 27 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA guest conductor

GLUCK — Iphigénie en Aulide – Overture

BERNSTEIN — The Age of Anxiety – Symphony no. 2 for piano and orchestra
(after W. H. Auden's poem)

PART ONE
The prologue: lento moderato
The seven ages: variations 1 - 7
The seven stages: variations 8 - 14

PART TWO
The dirge: largo
The masque: extremely fast
The epilogue: adagio – andante – con moto

YUJI TAKAHASHI piano

INTERMISSION

JOACHIM — Contrastes
First performance in Boston

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – Suite no. 2
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse générale

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday
and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

JAN 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa to conduct Boston Symphony here

The Boston Symphony will have Seiji Ozawa as guest conductor of its concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. These will be his first concerts in Boston with this orchestra, although he has conducted several Summers at Tanglewood.

Ozawa's program lists Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," Bernstein's Symphony No. 2 "Age of Anxiety," with Yuji Takahashi as piano soloist, Otto Joachim's "Contrastes" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2.

Born in Japan, Ozawa studied in 1960 at the B.S.O.'s Berkshire Music Center. He is music director of the Toronto Symphony. In this capacity he commissioned "Contrastes" for the 1967 Canadian Centennial. The German-trained composer is now resident in two other concerts this Canada.

The orchestra will give week, both to be conducted by Charles Munch. Tuesday and Thursday, both at 8:30, he will direct Berlioz' "Romeo et Juliette," with the Chorus pro Musica and soloists mezzo-soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Donald Gramm.

The week of Jan. 29 the orchestra will be on tour, playing in Hartford, Philadelphia and New York.

SUNDAY COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 188,450

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Concert Tonight In New Britain

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to the Bushnell Memorial Monday for its annual concert in the Bushnell Symphony Series it will include in its program two works not previously heard in this area. They are Leonard Bernstein's "Age of Anxiety," also known as his Symphony No. 2, and Otto Joachim's "Contrastes."

Also on the program, to be conducted by 32-year-old Seiji Ozawa in his first Hartford performance, will be: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie in Aulis" and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JAN 24 1968 New England Newsclip

By Whitestone

Weekend conductor

Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Toronto Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

FEB 7 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Ozawa On The Way Up

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . ends Hub guest stint

By Peter M. Knapp

Not too many years ago, Seiji Ozawa was a gifted Tanglewood student. Now, the 32-year-old Japanese conductor is making it big.

Already the music director of the Toronto Symphony and the Ravinia Festival, Ozawa has just been named conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra beginning in 1970 — the first Japanese to head a major American orchestra.

In Boston for guest appearances with the Boston Symphony, Ozawa is showing the qualities that have moved him up the ladder. He's precise and graceful in his motions, easy to follow. Aside from these externals. Ozawa is a musical conductor, one with the ability to draw impressive sounds from an orchestra, maintain discipline, infuse a sturdy underpinning of rhythm, and at times, to elicit excitement.

Weighty Gluck

The dimunitive conductor with a shaggy Beatle-style hairdo chose an interesting program for last night's Symphony Hall concert, the weight of it from the 20th century. The 18th century was represented briefly by Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," curiously performed in the manner one used to hear Mozart and Haydn — with a full house of strings. With the thick overlay of sound this imposed upon Gluck, Ozawa evoked a romantic sound for this dark-hued overture and crisp articulation from his players.

Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 2 — the "Age of Anxiety," based on W.H. Auden's 1946 "baroque eclogue" about the encounter of four persons in a bar during World War II and their search for an enduring faith in an age of nightmares — presented Yuji Takahashi as piano soloist.

Takahashi is also Japanese, also studied at Tanglewood, also has a westernized black mane. He played with a good sense of rhythm, a notably pure tone, but at times without much personality, and without the exuberance the jazz of the scherzo (Masque) requires.

Bernstein's music, however, doesn't really give the pianist much to bite into. According to the composer, the pianist "provides an almost autobiographical protagonist set against an orchestral mirror" in this programmatic symphony. Yet the protagonist is not a very interesting one; his music rambles like a pianist improvising his midnight moods for his own pleasure. Bernstein's symphony at any rate is most effective in Part I, notably in the two sets of seven variations each, and least attention-holding in the empty Coplandisms of the finale — a Hollywooden vision of faith.

No Two Alike

Otto Joachim's "Contrastes" moves still further along the musical time-line. It was premiered last May in Montreal by Ozawa, who commissioned it from the German-born composer, a violinist, violist and director of the Montreal Ensemble of ancient instruments.

"Contrastes" is a contemporary mixture of 12-tone and aleatory (chance) techniques, and since it all depends on the interpretation of the conductor and the individual players, no two performances can be the same, the conductor notes. The piece presents a gaggle of contrasting sounds, textures, intensities, with the recurring solo flute seemingly providing a pivotal point. But there seems little new here that similar pieces haven't provided.

Back in familiar territory, Ozawa concluded with an aurally splendid, rhythmically driving reading of the Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2, winding up in a virtuosic climax.

The Boston Symphony is mourning the death of Harold Thompson, a percussionist with the orchestra since 1952. Mr. Thompson was killed Monday when struck by a truck on the Massachusetts Turnpike.

40 TUES A – VIII / THURS A – IV

Eighth Program

Tuesday evening February 6 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA guest conductor

GLUCK — Iphigénie en Aulide – Overture

BERNSTEIN — The Age of Anxiety – Symphony no. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden's poem)

PART ONE
The prologue: lento moderato
The seven ages: variations 1 - 7
The seven stages: variations 8 - 14

PART TWO
The dirge: largo
The masque: extremely fast
The epilogue: adagio – andante – con moto

YUJI TAKAHASHI piano

INTERMISSION

JOACHIM — Contrastes

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – Suite no. 2
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse générale

Tues A – VIII

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

JAN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa Leads BSO In Splendid Concert

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Seiji Ozawa, spectacular young Japanese conductor of the Toronto Symphony and Ravinia (Chicago) Festival was guest on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's podium yesterday afternoon. His beat is explicit and incisive; his facility for eliciting elegant string tone is exemplary.

They began with Gluck's most important overture, that to "Iphigenia in Aulis," greatly admired by Wagner, who wrote a concluding segment of 33 measures so it could be played as a concert piece. Wagner recognized in this work "a cry born of the painful, gnawing suffering of the heart." There was a bright orchestral sheen to the well-disciplined performance.

Seiji Ozawa

Leonard Bernstein's second symphony, "Age of Anxiety," (1949, revised 1965), scored for piano and full orchestra, followed, with Yuji Takahashi at the keyboard. As was the W.H. Auden poem, upon which it was based, this quasi-symphony is concerned with man's present insecurity and his need for abiding faith.

The work is in two parts, the first including a prologue, seven ages and seven stages. The second part consists of a dirge, masque and epilogue. Four characters try detaching themselves from their conflicts through alcohol. In the dirge they mourn the loss of their "Colossal Dad," to whom they look for guidance. In the masque they are at a party. In the epilogue each has found finally the faith for which they had been groping. Yesterday's guest conductor, a Bernstein protege, offered a performance quite as resplendent as the composer's own with the New York Philharmonic.

After the intermission there was a first BSO performance of "Contrastes" by Otto Joachim, German-trained composer now living in Canada. With much orchestral improvisation, it was a typical "jam" session—orange marmarade, laced with curdled vinegar, but rare fun.

To conclude was the second orchestral suite from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis & Chloe" ballet. This cunningly and gorgeously orchestrated music well bears excerption from the complete ballet. The last dance, a final bacchanale, with its dionysiac glow, gleams momentarily with steely incandescence, recalling Paul Dukas' "Peri" or Stravinsky's "Firebird," ending in the disciplined jubilation of every kind of rhythm.

Ozawa almost succeeded in matching Serge Koussevitzky's tonal wizardry, though not quite.

Fourth Program

Thursday evening February 8 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA guest conductor

GLUCK — Iphigénie en Aulide – Overture

BERNSTEIN — The Age of Anxiety – Symphony no. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden's poem)

PART ONE
The prologue: lento moderato
The seven ages: variations 1 - 7
The seven stages: variations 8 - 14

PART TWO
The dirge: largo
The masque: extremely fast
The epilogue: adagio – andante – con moto

YUJI TAKAHASHI piano

INTERMISSION

JOACHIM — Contrastes

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – Suite no. 2
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse générale

Thurs A – IV

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

40 TUES A – VIII / THURS A – IV

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Eighth Program

Tuesday evening February 6 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA guest conductor

GLUCK — Iphigénie en Aulide – Overture

BERNSTEIN — The Age of Anxiety – Symphony no. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden's poem)

PART ONE
The prologue: lento moderato
The seven ages: variations 1 - 7
The seven stages: variations 8 - 14

PART TWO
The dirge: largo
The masque: extremely fast
The epilogue: adagio – andante – con moto

YUJI TAKAHASHI piano

INTERMISSION

JOACHIM — Contrastes

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – Suite no. 2
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse générale

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 4[illegible]250

JAN 27 1968

New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa Leads BSO In Splendid Concert

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Seiji Ozawa, spectacular young Japanese conductor of the Toronto Symphony and Ravinia (Chicago) Festival was guest on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's podium yesterday afternoon. His beat is explicit and incisive; his facility for eliciting elegant string tone is exemplary.

They began with Gluck's most important overture, that to "Iphigenia in Aulis," greatly admired by Wagner, who wrote a concluding segment of 33 measures so it could be played as a concert piece. Wagner recognized in this work "a cry born of the painful, gnawing suffering of the heart." There was a bright orchestral sheen to the well-disciplined performance.

Seiji Ozawa

Leonard Bernstein's second symphony, "Age of Anxiety," (1949, revised 1965), scored for piano and full orchestra, followed, with Yuji Takahashi at the keyboard. As was the W.H. Auden poem, upon which it was based, this quasi-symphony is concerned with man's present insecurity and his need for abiding faith.

The work is in two parts, the first including a prologue, seven ages and seven stages. The second part consists of a dirge, masque and epilogue. Four characters try detaching themselves from their conflicts through alcohol. In the dirge they mourn the loss of their "Colossal Dad," to whom they look for guidance. In the masque they are at a party. In the epilogue each has found finally the faith for which they had been groping. Yesterday's guest conductor, a Bernstein protege, offered a performance quite as resplendent as the composer's own with the New York Philharmonic.

After the intermission there was a first BSO performance of "Contrastes" by Otto Joachim, German-trained composer now living in Canada. With much orchestral improvisation, it was a typical "jam" session—orange marmalade, laced with curdled vinegar, but rare fun.

To conclude was the second orchestral suite from Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis & Chloe" ballet. This cunningly and gorgeously orchestrated music well bears excerption from the complete ballet. The last dance, a final bacchanale, with its dionysiac glow, gleams momentarily with steely incandescence, recalling Paul Dukas' "Peri" or Stravinsky's "Firebird," ending in the disciplined jubilation of every kind of rhythm.

Ozawa almost succeeded in matching Serge Koussevitzky's tonal wizardry, though not quite.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fourth Program

Thursday evening February 8 at 8.30

SEIJI OZAWA guest conductor

GLUCK — Iphigénie en Aulide – Overture

BERNSTEIN — The Age of Anxiety – Symphony no. 2 for piano and orchestra (after W. H. Auden's poem)

PART ONE
The prologue: lento moderato
The seven ages: variations 1 - 7
The seven stages: variations 8 - 14

PART TWO
The dirge: largo
The masque: extremely fast
The epilogue: adagio – andante – con moto

YUJI TAKAHASHI piano

INTERMISSION

JOACHIM — Contrastes

RAVEL — Daphnis et Chloé – Suite no. 2
Lever du jour
Pantomime
Danse générale

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JAN 29 1968 New England Newsclip

January 29, 1968 THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Ozawa's mod manner stirs Symphony Hall

By Clifford Barnes

"Theatrical" has several shades of meaning. Some of them were explored at Symphony Hall this weekend when Seiji Ozawa was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not only does the conductor have a strong personal impact, but his program had a great affinity for the theater.

Mr. Ozawa lives each work he conducts with youthful passion—marked by audible deep breathing. He is authoritative, knowing exactly what he wants. And he gets it, unless appearances are deceiving. The trick is for the audience not to be fooled by his mod manner.

Opening the concert with Gluck's Overture to the French opera, "Iphigénie en Aulide," was the only bow to music before the 20th century. Its 18th-century drama evokes reserved emotions today, but it was a pleasant beginning.

Twin hair styles

Leonard Bernstein admits that every work he writes, for whatever medium, is really theater music in some way. In his own program note for "The Age of Anxiety—Symphony No. 2," the composer concedes that this composition is an excellent example of the fact. To begin with, the music follows rather closely W. H. Auden's poem of the same title. It also served well to stimulate Jerome Robbins's choreographic genius for a ballet in the repertoire of the New York City Ballet.

This symphony uses a solo piano as "an almost autobiographical protagonist" throughout the unfolding of the drama. Yuji Takahashi, pianist and composer presently in New York and Buffalo, moved from moments of quiet introspection to bursts of frenetic energy. Most striking is his close resemblance to Mr. Ozawa—identical hair cuts and the same slight build.

Mr. Bernstein has created a chef d'oeuvre in this symphony by reflecting in sharp images life at the middle of the 20th century. His revision of the finale in 1965 only points this up more clearly. The section in twelve-tone writing is effective, and the jazz sequence which follows is infectious, in spite of its theatricality.

Otto Joachim's "Contrastes" was also a piece of theatrics at its Boston première Friday. Mr. Ozawa commissioned the work and conducted its first performance last year at Expo 67. The programmatic reference made by the composer to the "diversity of this earth and its people" seems to have been an attempt at relating the music to Expo's motto: "La Terre des Hommes."

Finger cues

The piece lasted 15 minutes—the shortest time the conductor allows that it might take, since its aleatoric design leaves duration up to the conductor and the individual musician. The most immediately observable contrasts were in dynamics, tempi, and timbres. Mr. Ozawa dispensed with a baton by simply pointing cues with a finger, a hand, or even a nod of the head.

Ravel, the supreme master of orchestral color, approached the theater best with his ballet music for "Daphnis et Chloé." Even with the omission of the wordless mixed chorus, the score for the Second Suite has an hypnotic effect. From a "sunrise" that was almost matter-of-fact, Mr. Ozawa led the listener through the "pantomime" and "danse générale," building to a tremendous, though calculated, climax.

Soviet violinist

David Oistrakh will give a recital Sunday, Feb. 4, at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Ozawa, Former Student of Munch Emerging as a Major Conductor

By McLAREN HARRIS

There should be little doubt in the minds of anyone who attends this week's Symphony concerts that Seiji Ozawa is emerging as one of the major conducting talents on this continent. He has energy, discipline, confidence in his musical convictions and the technique to carry them out.

This is Ozawa's first appearance with the orchestra in Boston, though he has conducted for the past four seasons at Tanglewood. In prior years he was a student there under Charles Munch, and he has contracted some of the latter's flair — slashing strokes at sudden dynamic peaks, pointing — pulling cues at prominent entrances, rhythmic pulse vibrating from the arms, shaking of the head and bouncing from the toes.

But unlike those of his former mentor at times, there is no ambiguity to Ozawa's gestures, no erratic or off-balance deliveries, even at their most flamboyant. He turns toward a particular instrumental section to add emphasis to a musical figure, yet never relinquishes cognizance of the entire substance. And again (may I say?) unlike Munch, he is exacting in his precision.

Perhaps it should be noted that the program he chose is in large measure theatrical: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenie en Auldie," Bernstein's "The Age of Anxiety" (Symphony No. 2), Otto Joachim's now 12-tone, now aleatoric "Contrastes" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," second suite. Such works, after all, are good foils for a broad, dramatic baton approach.

The Bernstein and Ravel are especially extrovertive, Bernstein's symphony even waxing to a melodramatic plane. It is based inspirationally (occasionally somewhat literally, admits the composer) on the poem be W. H. Auden about a sort of theosophic search by a girl and three men. Bernstein represents the speculative wrangling through a conventional orchestra with a solo piano as a contrasting ingredient (and an autobiographical symbol).

It is, as someone said, much more Bernstein than Auden. The fluid, vari-colored orchestral episodes sound more akin to accompaniment for a stage or screen drama than to a self-contained musical unit. The symphony is technically expert, to be sure; but it attempts to translate action and follow a plot rather than convey emotion or impression, and from there on it becomes a theater-piece.

Ozawa's countryman, Yuji Takahashi, performed the solo piano and the two were closely in touch throughout. Takahashi eschewed vehemence for a direct, energetic brilliance, wisely choosing not to take on the orchestra single-handed. The warm reception was deserved.

Joachim's "Contrastes," commissioned by Ozawa and the Toronto Symphony for Canada's centennial, alternates between measured, serialist sections and aleatoric, or semi-improvisatory, stretches. I found the approach interesting, though the former were much more rewarding than the latter — which I attribute to the undistinguished material available to the performers, who allowed considerable latitude in presenting it. As an overall study in tone-volume contrasts it gets certain points across, yet never rises above a level of pure exercise.

Ozawa's control here, even in aleatoric passages, was full of assurance, ready with cues, picking up measured strains with smoothness. The orchestra, too, was instantly responsive and fully spirited.

The Gluck overture was expansively toned, moving in the deliberate gait judged appropriate to its dramatic significance — that is, much slower than a classical Allegro. The Wagner concert-ending (certainly not Gluck's!) was given great care, expiring, I must say, beautifully. And Ravel's "Daphnis" suite exploded in the grand Munch tradition — crackling, rippling, roaring, exulting in lush color. The audience loved it.

42

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Toronto's Ozawa Conducts Boston Symphony

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Seiji Ozawa has conducted the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood several times, but Friday afternoon's was his first concert with the orchestra in Symphony Hall. There was impressive mastery of the orchestra, but at time an almost complete non-identification with the music.

He began with Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" Overture, and from the first notes it was evident that the orchestra was comfortable with the conductor's rhythmically alive beat, his clarity, his relaxed assurance generally. The playing was beautifully in tune, the sound was luminous, the execution elegant and refined in every way. But of Gluck the pedantically chopped out main theme, the stilted and arbitrary phrasing of the lyric melody, the static conception of the whole, left no trace.

Next came Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 2, based on Auden's "Age of Anxiety." Like much of Bernstein's music, it commutes between Broadway and Aaron Copland's country house in Ossining, N.Y. It is obvious and not quiet fresh — that was no different in 1949 when it was new —and it has rather few engaging moments. There is a concertante piano part, in which was played by Yuji Takahashi, who has a beatle hairdo like Mr. Ozawa, but who is even younger and more diminutive, and whose playing was quick-fingered, small-toned, uninflected and boring.

Ozawa's main post now is with the Toronto Symphony, and he brought a score by the German-born Canadian composer Otto Joachim. "Contrasts" is for large orchestra, and it is part aleatory, that is, the general order of events is composed and there are fixed nodes all along, but some of the stuffing is elastic, enough so for the piece to be as short as 15 minutes or as long as 25.

Ozawa conducted a short form of "Contrasts," about 16 minutes. It struck me as a piece in which the gestures are more interesting than the notes themselves, one with a lively, even entrancing surface, but not richly composed in the sense of being replete with abundant associative devices and references. It makes as good a case as any piece I have heard for loosening the compositional process with patches whose detailed configuration is left to chance or to the notion of the moment. "Contrasts" is an effective showcase for individual and ensemble virtuosity. With his liveliness of reaction and the precision of his signals, and in a situation making no demands on a feeling for continuity in the conventional sense, Ozawa was thoroughly in his element here; the orchestra's playing was of an extraordinary brilliance, and much of the solo playing had an unusual, excitingly inflected vividness of contour.

The concert ended with the 2d Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe;" this Ozawa rammed through in a rigid, anti-sensual way that completely missed the point.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

FEB 1 1968

Music: Boston Symphony

Seiji Ozawa Conducts at Philharmonic Hall

BY HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

OF the young star conductors currently in action, Seiji Ozawa seems to have the closest identification and alliance with the vanguard. Where most of the others are programing Bach, Brahms, Mahler and Bruckner, Mr. Ozawa is tackling Ives and beyond. Last night in Philharmonic Hall, he was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, and his program contained two pieces of recent vintage. One was Leonard Bernstein's Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety." The other was Otto Joachim's "Contrastes."

In many respects the Bernstein cannot be classified as a "modern" work, being a tepid rehash of Copland, dated jazz and mild dissonance. Even when it was composed it looked back rather than forward, and time has not dealt kindly with it.

•

Otto Joachim is a German-born composer currently active in Montreal as first violist of the orchestra there. His "Contrastes" is what the name implies—an investigation of various textures and sonorities in the post-serial idiom. It contains all of the devices—a row, two wildly dissonant aleatoric sections toward the end, some point-illistic Webernisms, disjunct melody and the like.

Yet in some respects the score is a hybrid. Here and there mottoes pop up that are actually tonal. "Contrastes" illustrates the breaking-away of strict serialism or strict anything, a process that has been going on the last few years and recently has become a real force.

In a score like this it is next to impossible to discuss structure and relationships—not unless the score and an accompanying tape are on hand. It is a safe assumption that everything is organized, including the aleatoric sections. But at first hearing the ear and mind can take little of it in.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Seiji Ozawa conducting, with Yuji Takahashi, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Overture to Iphigenie en Aulide ..... Gluck
Symphony No. 2, "The Age of Anxiety" ... Bernstein
Contrastes ..... Joachim
"Daphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2 ..... Ravel

But whatever the organization, the materials themselves did not sound distinguished. The impression here was that Mr. Joachim has skillfully put together a score that is modern for the sake of being modern, and he has not ben able to impress his own personality upon the techniques. Everything that was heard last night has previously been heard in one composition or another of this school.

The two pieces where one could get a more accurate index of Mr. Ozawa were the "Iphigenie en Aulide" Overture by Gluck and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, that old Boston Symphony warhorse from the days of Monteux and Koussevitzky. Mr. Ozawa led the Gluck at full Boston Symphony strength, and it is hard to understand why. Surely the orchestra should be cut down. This is a classic 18th-century piece and should be presented as such. Mr. Ozawa is a talented conductor, and he has sparkle and rhythm, but not even he could prevent the Gluck from sounding turgid and swollen.

•

In the Ravel, he all but marked time until the closing dance. He approached the score in a very objective, late 20th century manner, refusing to let the strings sing out, refusing to enter the sensuous world of the music.

The hall's acoustics had something to do with the general bleakness. Philharmonic Hall is the worst in the world for this kind of music. But when the measures of the "Danse générale" started, Mr. Ozawa was where he belonged. He led the Boston Symphony crispiy and firmly, unerringly building to the big climax. It was vital and exciting, and it was too bad the rest of the conception did not match this.

New York Post
D. 702,000 SUN. 350,000

FEB 1 1968

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Ozawa Leads Bernstein's 'Anxiety'

Seiji Ozawa brought detachment and a brilliant concept of instrumental accent and blend last night to his appearance as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall.

When he walked on stage, 32 years old, with a mane of jet hair spilling over his collar, his head overpowered the rest of his body. And so was his conducting last night which was immensely impressive. He was calmly controlled, his muscles moving with sensitive premeditation, not jumping wildly from reflexes. He made four dramatically different styles unfold like frescoes each in its proper perspective.

He began with the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide," and the sensuous, unweighted quality of the sound was almost startling in its beauty. As the piece continued with classic grandeur, it was apparent that the great orchestra was in hands that understood, at least, this piece.

The same authority continued throughout the concert. Leonard Bernstein's "The Age of Anxiety," Symphony No. 2 for Piano and Orchestra, followed the Gluck with the aid of another diminutive man with a mop, and this one with a mustache too—29-year-old Yuji Takahashi. He looked ageless enough to be a boy puppet, but the clipped clear bravura of his technique and his wistful perception of Bernstein's clash of faith and conflict in this music after W. H. Auden's poem, was anything but naive.

Music Matches Poem

Since Bernstein's 1965 revision, which integrates the piano part into the Epilogue, the musical shape is more logical, and its relation to the poem more meaningful. "The Age of Anxiety" varies from jazz, to pounding cacophony, to relative serenity during its 35-minutes, merging with effective theatricality for the composer's purposes. If one follows Bernstein's lucid program notes, the direct expressiveness of the music is vividly apparent, even though it may be too discursive for its content and style.

Otto Joachim's "Contrastes" had eery whispers alternating with blasts which Ozawa led mostly from graphs rather than from conventional notation. Joachim's program notes said that "choice of entrance, dynamics and speed depends mostly on the decision of the conductor." Well, Ozawa made well considered decisions, I should say, and showed superb common sense when he chose to stop at the short end of the piece, 16 minutes. Joachim states that "the duration can be anything from 15 to 25 minutes."

"Lever du jour," movement 1, from "Daphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2, which closed the program, then floated its sound to the ecstacy of the ear. Ozawa really lifted us from the Joachim stalactite cave with its exploding flash bulbs into Ravel's blessed ether.

The Webster Hall Salon series presented the Centrum Baroque Quartet, Shirley Perregaux, soprano; T. Newton Stewart, flute; Cynthia Treggor Majoni, violin and Philip Treggor, harpsichord in a program containing songs by A. Scarlatti and Purcell, and instrumental music by Corelli, Telemann and Bach.

Miss Perregaux's singing was musically fine in every respect-her sense of style, vocal technique and diction admirable. She sang the Scarlatti song with lightness and the Purcell with the warmth and poignance necessary.

Mr. Stewart played efficiently but the lack of warmth and careful attention to phrasing made for a pedestrian performance of both the Telemann and Bach Sonatas.

Philip Treggor, at the harpsichord, played expert accompaniments and gave ensemble playing of high order, proving once again his versatility.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Seiji Ozawa, guest conductor, came to the Bushnell on Monday night playing an unusual and exciting program. That this young man is exceptional, as musician and conductor, is practically an understatement. The music is transmitted through the conductor to the players.

Leonard Bernstein's "Age of Anxiety", Symphony No. 2, for orchestra and piano, is program music, based on W. H. Auden's poem. Romantic in spirit and utilizing contemporary idioms, it is rather contrived at the beginning. The most convincing section was the "Masque" a scherzo for piano and percussion, in which a kind of fantastic piano jazz was employed most effectively. The climax was intense and stirring.

Tuji Takahashi, the young virtuoso pianist who expertly played the difficult piano part in this symphony displayed rare pianistic skill and exceptional memory.

A 1967 opus, "Contrasts" by Otto Joachim, a Canadian composer, lived up to its title. Fragmentary, with frequent periods of silence, it followed the aleatoric or "chance" style of composition now pursued by many composers. The players were permitted to improvise within periods of 11 seconds, and thematic motives in the score were varied and repeated as indicated by the conductor. It was interesting as an "event", but taxed one's attention and left one with little to remember.

"Daphnis et Chloe", Suite No. 2 by Ravel, was an enjoyable conclusion to this fascinating concert. Its lushness, rich orchestration and rhythmic variety was "modern" a few decades ago, but it seemed relaxing on this occasion. And the performance was excellent.

A program such as this demands much from the listener, and it is necessary for us to stretch our ears to keep abreast of the new music.

The mid-season weeks are very busy ones for the Hartford Symphony Orchestra, in early February two special concerts are scheduled in addition to the regular subscription concert on February 7. Arthur Winograd will conduct a special concert with the singer Eddy Arnold appearing as guest artist on Saturday, February 3 at 8:30 p.m. at the Bushnell.

On Wednesday, February 7 at 8:15 p.m. the Hartford Symphony Orchestra will play one of its regular subscription concerts. The guest conductor-composer will be Lukas Foss who has chosen his own "Parable of Death" for the concluding number.

Mr. Foss' music may be somewhat startling to conservative ears, but it has been acknowledged as significant and representative of the best of today's music.

A special program honoring the Armenian-Russian composer Aram Khachaturian will be given by the Hartford Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 12 at 8:15 p.m. at the Bushnell. Mr. Khachaturian will conduct and the soloist will be Karine Georgian, cellist who will play the Cello Concerto by the guest artist with the orchestra.

This concert is not a part of the regular subscription series and tickets must be obtained at the Symphony Society's office or at the Bushnell box office.

On Feb. 9 two musical events are on the calendar. The Renaissance Quartet will perform at 8 p.m. at Gray Fellowship Hall, South Church in Hartford, this being one of the events sponsored by the Fine Arts Foundation. Tickets may be purchased at the door.

On the same evening, Feb. 9, at 8:15 p.m. at the Bushnell, the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, conducted by George Szell, will play the fifth and final concert of this season's Bushnell Symphony Series. The program, conservative in character, includes Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Delius' Prelude to "Irmelin"; Walton's Partita for Orchestra and Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4. A limited number of tickets for the Cleveland Orchestra concert are available at the Bushnell box office.

NEWS
W. HARTFORD, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,300

FEB 1 1968 New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN CANARSIE DIGEST
Saturday, February 10, 1968

Underlites

by CHARLES REICHENTHAL

What special words are left to describe this past week at the Brooklyn Academy of Music ?? What can truly capture the incandescence in which the stately old house was bathed ? What praise can be left to herald an institution that brought to B'klyn audiences, in one week, two brilliant evenings of music and dance?

The occasion on Sat. was The Jose Limon Dance Company, an event of the first magnitude for the ballet world, because it marked the first N.Y.C. performance of Limon's recent work, "The Winged."

This latest Limon achievement is his finest, and an enraptured audience greeted its conclusion with a well-earned burst of Bravo's. I stopped counting the curtain calls after the fifth.

"The Winged," first of all, is a ballet almost devoid of a musical score. Most of the time is spent in stunning silence, with only some bird sounds fluttering from the tape recorder. There are a few cool jazz moments of incidental music by Hank Johnson, but they are kept to a minimum.

We see Limon's dancers tracing the many facets of bird mythology, bird character, et al, and they perform their roles with a rare, attuned athletic grace. And the strength and power of each member of the troupe is given a showcase. As one might expect, Louis Falco was the most striking--all muscle and tension, creating deep significance with every sinewy move.

But there were others only slightly less overpowering in appearance and talent: Betty Jones, Clyde Morgan, Daniel Lewis, Diane Mohrmann, Jennifer Muller, and more.

"The Winged" has drama and dynamism. It also has moments of playful humor. In short, the Academy gave to New York a chance to see one of the finest of modern ballets. I found myself remembering the first time I had seen "Billy the Kid" or the debut performance of the Pennsylvania Ballet's "Villon," both at the Academy. It was a superb night for the dance.

* * *

Only days before, however, the Academy had created still another masterful program--The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Seiji Ozawa as Guest Conductor, and Yuji Takahashi as soloist.

Seldom in my memory have I seen so well balanced a program, so beautifully performed and so stylishly conducted. Gluck's Overture to "Iphigene en Aulide" provided the proper entrance into an evening of the highest quality in modern music.

Leonard Bernstein's "The Age of Anxiety," featuring Takahashi, provided the second section, and, for those of us who love the modern Bernstein idiom, it was easily the best performance of the work we had ever heard. Ozawa and the Orchestra missed nary a nuance of the complicated work. All of the fire, the freight, the romance, and the musical charisma were there.

Joachim's "Contrastes" was the next remarkable section of the evening. This is a rare excursion into the atonal, because the work never loses a silky warmth and familiarity in spite of its ultra-modern tones.

The best was saved for last. Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" was given a rarely-equalled showing. The tingle of this exceptional musical moment remained with at least one Academy-goer for some time.

* * *

At the same time as the Limon recital, other Academy visitors watched a program that featured Ossie Davis and Ruby Dee in the Music Hall. It is to Brooklyn's credit that we have a cultural mecca that offers us such a sparkling choice of activities. Plaudits must go to director, Harvey Lichtenstein, and to his most capable staff and advisers for giving to us, in 1967-68, a brilliant year of the arts. The Academy is alive---and well!!!

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 1 1969 New England Newsclip

Japanese Pianist and Conductor

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Editor's Note: Mr. Sproul is retired after a career which included the teaching of English at the University of Minnesota, Amherst and Rollins Colleges and music at Reed College, Columbia University and the City College of New York. A musician himself, he has for fourteen summers been director of the Cummington School of Arts.

On Friday and Saturday last the Japanese invasion of Symphony Hall was welcomed by a delighted audience, and to judge by its response, a convinced orchestra. Both Yuji Takahashi, pianist for the Bernstein Symphony No. 2, and Seiji Ozawa, guest conductor, are in their early thirties, and have come to us by high powered routes of study and performance since graduating from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. The moody interjections of the piano in the Bernstein did not give Takahashi much room to show his stuff but were sensitively handled. It is good to know that he is joining the adventurous Center for the Creative and Peforming Arts at the New York State University of Buffalo.

The more obvious star was the conductor (and, need I say, an inspired Boston Symphony). He was slight, ~~intense, kinetic~~ but beautifully controlled, like a dancer, for a precise beat and that anticipation which helps to create the musical evolution in the flow of time. His sometimes theatrical motions were no distraction; they were entirely appropriate to the music and the whole program was intelligently built of theatrical material.

Any well educated young musician now realizes that the mainstream of music has always been polarized by drama and the dance (Mozart is a prime example) and Ozawa's program slyly exploited that fact. The Gluck Iphigenie en Aulide overture spelled it out with a warm and clear nobility. The Bernstein Symphony No. 2 for piano and orchestra from Auden's "Age of Anxiety" and presents the pianist (to quote the composer) as a "protagonist set against an orchestral mirror". Two lone and lost clarinets press on each other in melancholy counterpoint and, after effective orchestral vicissitudes, including a jazzy passage, a wow ending — all systems go. Bernstein confesses to theatrical motivation quite frankly, and there is a place for music halfway between Broadway and Lincoln Center. When Bernstein was studying composition with Piston at Harvard he was not a consistent learner, according to his teacher, because he had a finger in too many pies. But he certainly learned how to make music that sounds. Perhaps his retirement from the New York Philharmonic will allow time for deeper intuition.

The Otto Joachim Contrasts was a first performance for Boston. There is no need for a listener to unravel his tone row or spot the passages of chance noodling (aleatoric" merely means that certain instruments indulge themselves in a chancy way within limits set by composer and timed by the conductor, beautifully controlled in this case by Ozowa). The result here was like a college of bits and pieces, expressive as decorative, rather static excitements. Joachim has an electronic studio and in Contrasts manipulates the live orchestra as if it were in that studio. He is an expert researcher in the realm of sound. The stereophonic effect of instrumental divisions into many parts produces a shimmer of colors punctuated by sudden crescendoes and silences. That Contrasts "reflects the diversity of this earth and its people" (to quote Joachim) may be true by motivation but is moonshine to the audience. Why dress up a delightful bunch of surprises with meaning that music cannot express?

All questions was washed away by the concluding Ravel. The Boston Symphony Orchestra can play Daphnis et Chloe —Suite No. 2 with their eyes closed, but with Ozawa their eyes were wide open and their playing superb. Without trickery, he revitalized this war horse into a prance that made visual ballet. The music glowed and swirled with inner life and propulsion, climaxes with more brass to blare than usual, but justified by the controlled approach. These young guys want to disturb us — as we should be disturbed, to our greater glory, by all creation.

44

FRI - SAT - XVI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixteenth Program

Friday afternoon February 9 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 10 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

GLUCK — Music of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Eurydice'

In memory of Harold Thompson

TCHAIKOVSKY — Le Voyevode, symphonic ballad op. 78

STRAVINSKY — Le baiser de la fée

Scene one – Prologue: the lullaby in the storm
Scene two – A village fête
Scene three – At the mill
Scene four – Epilogue: the lullaby of the land beyond time and place

First complete performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Piano concerto no. 5 in E flat 'The Emperor' op. 73

Allegro
Adagio un poco mosso
Rondo: allegro ma non tanto

GRANT JOHANNESEN

Grant Johannesen plays the Steinway piano

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

971

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 15 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: MORE PROMISE THAN FULFILMENT

Mr. Leinsdorf's return to Symphony Hall from a month's vacation carried with it an impression more of fatigue than reinvigoration. Curious, this, for the raw materials of the proceedings suggested a better-than-average concert. They included selections from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice," in memory of Harold Thompson; Tchaikovsky's "Le Voyevode," symphonic ballad; Stravinsky's "Le baiser dela fee," in its first complete performance by the Boston Symphony; and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, with Grant Johanneson as soloist.

The Tchaikovsky represents yet another of those characteristically prodigious Leinsdorfian efforts from time to time to get away from the hackneyed orchestral repertory and air something long retired to the archives if not to the crypt. And as almost invariably has been the case, the judgment of history was proved sound.

The Ballad deals with quite a narrative: A moustachioed general returning from the wars catches his wife in flagrante in the garden and orders his servant to shoot her down. The servant misses and dispatches the general instead. End of the story. Whatever Tchaikovsky's virtues, and they are more considerable than audiences of the sixties are wont to credit them, descriptive writing a la Berlioz, Strauss or Wagner is not among them. Recognizing this, he once conceded, "When I write a program symphony I always feel I am not paying in sterling coin but in worthless paper dollars." In one of his all too rare instances of self-criticism, Tchaikovsky tore up the score of Le Voyevode after the first performance, but it was resurrected from the orchestral parts by the conductor, one Seloti. Thus, did the piece make its way back here after sixty-four years of absence.

Here and there are intimations of Tchaikovsky's melodic gifts, snatches of his Italianate warmth and glimmerings of his piquant genius for orchestration. But for the overwhelming moiety of the work, Tchaikovsky's own estimate of it cannot be faulted. The Ballad's virtue, then, is that it is "interesting."

For Tchaikovsky's music as it should really have been composed, programatically or any other way, one need look no farther than "Le Baiser de le Fee." Stravinsky took some Tchaikovsky piano and vocal music, added some quotations from the quartet, the Fifth and other symphonies, and came out with an undeniable masterpiece. The lithe scoring, the Mozartian ecohomy, the effortless interchanges of his own and borrowed materials make this ballet a consummate exercise in boldness and wit. Or so they are when interpreted by a conductor to their manner born. Mr. Leinsdorf seems not. He produced good orchestral sound (brass always excepted), and by and large got first-class soloist response, but this music is really not his medium. As a consequence, all forty-five minutes seemed every second that long and the witty sometimes bordered on the campy.

The drear did not abate with the Beethoven concerto. Mr. Johannesen is less poetry than fingers, and in this performance the latter tended to forsake him more than is good for an artist still making his way. Nor was his sound any Serkin's. The security and precision in accompanying that Mr. Leinsdorf usually manifests were out of kilter: scales ended and chords sounded disparately. The "Emperor" seemed temporarily deposed by a somewhat unruly democratic mob.

The Gluck which opened the program was, however, deeply felt and beautifully played, and the moment of silence followed was most moving. The assurance and artistry Harold Thompson's contribution to a strong section of the orchestra is going to be missed.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony tribute for a great artist

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Harold Thompson, the Boston Symphony's percussion player who was killed in a turnpike accident last Monday, was a great artist. He could be terribly funny, but even more, he was supremely gentle and kind. There was about him a quality that made Erich Leinsdorf's choice of the Elysian Fields music from Gluck's "Orpheus" to open Friday's concert far more than a merely formal gesture: It was an appropriate and touching commemoration of a man whose craft I shall miss for as long as I hear the Boston Symphony.

The foreseen part of the program began with a curiosity, Tchaikovsky's "Le Voyevode," his last piece for orchestra before the "Pathetique." Sousa conducted a band transcription at the Tremont Temple in 1902, I learned from the program, and the Symphony played it under Gericke the following year. I don't suppose it has been played here since, and I must admit that until about four weeks ago, I had not even heard of the piece.

It is an illustration to something one hardly needs to know to enjoy the piece, a ballad by Mickiewicz about a general who comes home to find his wife in bed—in the garden, actually—with one of the servants. He orders another servant to shoot the lady, but the old codger gets the general instead. Tchaikovksy gets out of this first a splendid gallop which leads to a more melancholic music that is fairly expansively developed, and returns to the gallop, a shot, and some dying shudders, all in a single movement of about 10 minutes.

"Le Voyevode" makes a curious impression of being all a study in development and transition. The material is rather neutral, but the timing is worked out with great skill, and the orchestration is virtuosic, sensitive, and interesting in a way that is characteristic of late Tchaikovsky.

The composer himself didn't care for the piece, and destroyed the score after the premiere, though the conductor managed to save the orchestral parts. One thing that seems to have disgusted him was the miscalculation that made the celesta inaudible. It can't be heard 76 years later, either, but other than that Tchaikovksy would have had some reason to like the performance Friday, and I am grateful to Leinsdorf for having brought back so effective a piece of writing that was a lot of fun to listen to.

From Tchaikovsky, Leinsdorf went to "The Fairy's Kiss," that magic amalgam of Tchaiovsky and Stravinsky, again earning gratitude by playing not just the usual Divertimento, but Stravinsky's entire ballet score. It is a marvelous example of Stravinsky's wit and of his deliciously detailed workmanship, but it also has a vein of expressive tenderness that occurs nowhere else in his music, and that in "Fairy's Kiss" occurs mostly in sections not included in the Divertimento.

The performance was not bad, but not quite good either. It was well paced, except for the haste with which the final Berceuse was done, and there were details communicating Leinsdorf's enjoyment of the score; on the other hand, rhythms were not always sharp, and neither was the ensemble. Some of the solo playing was beautiful, notably Doriot Anthony Dwyer's on the flute — she had done a lovely job with the Gluck, too — and Ralph Gomberg's on the oboe. On the other hand, there is no good reason why in a major orchestra one should have to put up with the sheer out-of-tune incompetence of Gino Cioffi's clarinet playing, and it's not as though Friday's concert was exceptional in that respect.

After intermission, Grant Johannesen was soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat, the one vulgarly known as "The Emperor." Let's rename it "The President." Johannesen and Leinsdorf, working effectively together, played it energetically and tastefully, with a nice sense of joy in the finale, and nowhere very searchingly.

I am not supposed to mention brand names of musical instruments, and since I would not want either the Baldway or the Steinwin company to take the rap for something not their responsibility, I shall refrain from saying that the tuning job done on the piano was an exceedingly shoddy one.

A number of the ladies showed their superiority of culture and manner by picking the mysterious transition from Adagio to finale as the moment for their conspicuous exits. Of course, the program had promised that the concert would finish at four, and four it was.

44

FRI - SAT - XVI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixteenth Program

Friday afternoon February 9 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 10 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

GLUCK — Music of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Eurydice'

In memory of Harold Thompson

TCHAIKOVSKY — Le Voyevode, symphonic ballad op. 78

STRAVINSKY — Le baiser de la fée

Scene one – Prologue: the lullaby in the storm
Scene two – A village fête
Scene three – At the mill
Scene four – Epilogue: the lullaby of the land beyond time and place

First complete performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Piano concerto no. 5 in E flat 'The Emperor' op. 73

Allegro
Adagio un poco mosso
Rondo: allegro ma non tanto

GRANT JOHANNESEN

Grant Johannesen plays the Steinway piano

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 15 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: MORE PROMISE THAN FULFILMENT

Mr. Leinsdorf's return to Symphony Hall from a month's vacation carried with it an impression more of fatigue than reinvigoration. Curious, this, for the raw materials of the proceedings suggested a better-than-average concert. They included selections from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice," in memory of Harold Thompson; Tchaikovsky's "Le Voyevode," symphonic ballad; Stravinsky's "Le baiser dela fee," in its first complete performance by the Boston Symphony; and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, with Grant Johanneson as soloist.

The Tchaikovsky represents yet another of those characteristically prodigious Leinsdorfian efforts from time to time to get away from the hackneyed orchestral repertory and air something long retired to the archives if not to the crypt. And as almost invariably has been the case, the judgment of history was proved sound.

The Ballad deals with quite a narrative: A moustachioed general returning from the wars catches his wife in flagrante in the garden and orders his servant to shoot her down. The servant misses and dispatches the general instead. End of the story. Whatever Tchaikovsky's virtues, and they are more considerable than audiences of the sixties are wont to credit them, descriptive writing a la Berlioz, Strauss or Wagner is not among them. Recognizing this, he once conceded, "When I write a program symphony I always feel I am not paying in sterling coin but in worthless paper dollars." In one of his all too rare instances of self-criticism, Tchaikovsky tore up the score of Le Voyevode after the first performance, but it was resurrected from the orchestral parts by the conductor, one Seloti. Thus, did the piece make its way back here after sixty-four years of absence.

Here and there are intimations of Tchaikovsky's melodic gifts, snatches of his Italianate warmth and glimmerings of his piquant genius for orchestration. But for the overwhelming moiety of the work, Tchaikovsky's own estimate of it cannot be faulted. The Ballad's virtue, then, is that it is "interesting."

For Tchaikovsky's music as it should really have been composed, programatically or any other way, one need look no farther than "Le Baiser de le Fee." Stravinsky took some Tchaikovsky piano and vocal music, added some quotations from the quartet, the Fifth and other symphonies, and came out with an undeniable masterpiece. The lithe scoring, the Mozartian ecohomy, the effortless interchanges of his own and borrowed materials make this ballet a consummate exercise in boldness and wit. Or so they are when interpreted by a conductor to their manner born. Mr. Leinsdorf seems not. He produced good orchestral sound (brass always excepted), and by and large got first-class soloist response, but this music is really not his medium. As a consequence, all forty-five minutes seemed every second that long and the witty sometimes bordered on the campy.

The drear did not abate with the Beethoven concerto. Mr. Johannesen is less poetry than fingers, and in this performance the latter tended to forsake him more than is good for an artist still making his way. Nor was his sound any Serkin's. The security and precision in accompanying that Mr. Leinsdorf usually manifests were out of kilter: scales ended and chords sounded disparately. The "Emperor" seemed temporarily deposed by a somewhat unruly democratic mob.

The Gluck which opened the program was, however, derly felt and beautifully played, and the moment of silence followed was most moving. The assurance and artist' Harold Thompson's contribution to a strong section of chestra is going to be missed.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony tribute for a great artist

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Harold Thompson, the Boston Symphony's percussion player who was killed in a turnpike accident last Monday, was a great artist. He could be terribly funny, but even more, he was supremely gentle and kind. There was about him a quality that made Erich Leinsdorf's choice of the Elysian Fields music from Gluck's "Orpheus" to open Friday's concert far more than a merely formal gesture: It was an appropriate and touching commemoration of a man whose craft I shall miss for as long as I hear the Boston Symphony.

The foreseen part of the program began with a curiosity, Tchaikovsky's "Le Voyevode," his last piece for orchestra before the "Pathetique." Sousa conducted a band transcription at the Tremont Temple in 1902, I learned from the program, and the Symphony played it under Gericke the following year. I don't suppose it has been played here since, and I must admit that until about four weeks ago, I had not even heard of the piece.

It is an illustration to something one hardly needs to know to enjoy the piece, a ballad by Mickiewicz about a general who comes home to find his wife in bed—in the garden, actually—with one of the servants. He orders another servant to shoot the lady, but the old codger gets the general instead. Tchaikovksy gets out of this first a splendid gallop which leads to a more melancholic music that is fairly expansively developed, and returns to the gallop, a shot, and some dying shudders, all in a single movement of about 10 minutes.

"Le Voyevode" makes a curious impression of being all a study in development and transition. The material is rather neutral, but the timing is worked out with great skill, and the orchestration is virtuosic, sensitive, and interesting in a way that is characteristic of late Tchaikovsky.

The composer himself didn't care for the piece, and destroyed the score after the premiere, though the conductor managed to save the orchestral parts. One thing that seems to have disgusted him was the miscalculation that made the celesta inaudible. It can't be heard 76 years later, either, but other than that Tchaikovksy would have had our reason to like the performance Friday, and I am grateful to Leinsdorf for having brought back so effective a piece of writing that was a lot of fun to listen to.

From Tchaikovsky, Leinsdorf went to "The Fairy's Kiss," that magic amalgam of Tchaiovsky and Stravinsky, again earning gratitude by playing not just the usual Divertimento, but Stravinsky's entire ballet score. It is a marvelous example of Stravinsky's wit and of his deliciously detailed workmanship, but it also has a vein of expressive tenderness that occurs nowhere else in his music, and that in "Fairy's Kiss" occurs mostly in sections not included in the Divertimento.

The performance was not bad, but not quite good either. It was well paced, except for the haste with which the final Berceuse was done, and there were details communicating Leinsdorf's enjoyment of the score; on the other hand, rhythms were not always sharp, and neither was the ensemble. Some of the solo playing was beautiful, notably Doriot Anthony Dwyer's on the flute — she had done a lovely job with the Gluck, too — and Ralph Gomberg's on the oboe. On the other hand, there is no good reason why in a major orchestra one should have to put up with the sheer out-of-tune incompetence of Gino Cioffi's clarinet playing, and it's not as though Friday's concert was exceptional in that respect.

After intermission, Grant Johannesen was soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat, the one vulgarly known as "The Emperor." Let's rename it "The President." Johannesen and Leinsdorf, working effectively together, played it energetically and tastefully, with a nice sense of joy in the finale, and nowhere very searchingly.

I am not supposed to mention brand names of musical instruments, and since I would not want either the Baldway or the Steinwin company to take the rap for something not their responsibility, I shall refrain from saying that the tuning job done on the piano was an exceedingly shoddy one.

A number of the ladies showed their superiority of culture and manner by picking the mysterious transition from Adagio to finale as the moment for their conspicuous exits. Of course, the program had promised that the concert would finish at four, and four it was.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Harold Thompson Memorial Piece Raises Tenor of BSO Concert

By McLAREN HARRIS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf, saddened by the death last Monday of Harold Thompson, a percussionist for 15 years, paid tribute to his memory yesterday with a performances of the hushed and ethereally melodic Music of the Blessed Spirits, from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice", preceding the regular program.

As a memorial it should not be considered an integral part of that program, yet it raised the tenor of the concert to a higher level than would have been achieved otherwise.

PURE TCHAIKOVSKY

The two works which followed immediately, Tchaikovsky's "Le Voyevode" and Stravinsky's "The Fairy's Kiss," are both alive and apart: "Le Voyevode" is pure Tchaikovsky and "The Fairy's Kiss" is reconstructed Tchaikovsky, but there the similarity ends.

"Le Voyevode," Op. 78, is one of Tchaikovsky's symphonic fantasies on themes of love and tragedy. It is based on a translation by Alexander Pushkin of Adam Mickiewicz' poem about a returning general who seeks vengeance upon his wife and her former lover but falls victim to the bullet intended for her. According to the program Tchaikovsky was disheartened by Taneyev's reserved appraisal and destroyed the score (the orchestral parts escaped his wrath).

No one should claim that Tchaikovsky should have been presented the parts as well for destruction, but I am inclined to agree with Taneyev. The music begins in modestly stormy fashion, then meanders through lukewarm expressions of love and passages of mild foreboding, then staggers to an abrupt conclusion after the general's shooting, as if expiring at the same moment he does. The pictorialism is weak and the formal balance is upset.

BLAND PASSAGES

As for Stravinsky's "Fairy's Kiss," ballet music in four scenes, it too had an early and unfavorable criticism — by none other than Diaghilev. To accompany a choreographic tale of an infant who received the kiss of a fairy who returns 18 years later to claim him as he enters manhood, Stravinsky reconstructed material from Tchaikovsky's piano pieces and songs, plus snatches of more familiar instrumental works. The degree of assimilation is high; Stravinsky's technique and Tchaikovsky's material work in such fusion that the result is not recognizable as Tchaikovsky, hardly more as Stravinsky, and I had difficulty in identifying most of the sources.

But again I find Diaghilev's evaluation creditable: that the music is often tiresome, lachrymose, drab and lacked vitality. The scene of the village feast was fairly colorful, Scene III at the youth's abduction became rhythmically sharpened and the epilogue contained a keenly melancholic quietitude. The spaces in between, however were filled with bland passages characteristic of neither action nor emotion.

Leinsdorf and the orchestra concluded with Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, with Grant Johannesen at the keyboard. It was a strong, straightforward reading with plenty of tonal lustre and thrust. Johannesen was forceful and direct, not in the least hesitant about attacking Beethoven's blazing scale work at full tempo, assisting the aura of brilliance with a little pedal, though not to the point of hindrance.

GOOD DYNAMIC CONTROL

Johannesen may not be the most sensitive pianist-poet around, but he has good dynamic control; if the Adagio was not magic it yet formed effective contrast with the relative bombast of the outer movements. The orchestral work was also favorable, as it had been most of the afternoon (the horns were excellent in the Stravinsky), save for flat intonation from the solo clarinet.

Next week Leinsdorf will conduct Haydn's "The Creation," assisted by soloists Beverly Sills, John McCollum and Ara Berberian and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 16th program of the 87th season yesterday at Symphony Hall. Music of the Blessed Spirits, from "Orpheus and Eurydice" — Gluck
Le Voyevode, Op. 78 — Tchaikovsky
Le baiser de la fee — Stravinsky
Piano Concerto No. 5, in E flat, Op. 73, "Emperor" — Beethoven

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf Back on Podium After Vacation

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) — Erich Leinsdorf returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's podium yesterday after his mid-winter vacation. He expounded a somewhat incongruous program of music by Gluck, Tchaikovsky, pseudo-Tchaikovsky (Stravinsky) and Beethoven.

The compositional travesty behind Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee" is identical with that behind his pastiches of works of earlier composers. They are not so much music as fabulous personalizing of others' music. In this "Fairy's Kiss," a first complete BSO performance fabrication was openly acknowledged, for in this ballet piece a series of Tchaikovsky's lesser piano sketches undergo protean rather than protein treatment.

Stravinsky

"Le Baiser de la Fee" perhaps is Stravinsky's most surrealist work, combining the nationalistic appeal of "Firebird" with his later neo-classic stance. At the same time, the very fact that the thematic material was derived from the always-fertile Tchaikovsky gives this ballet outstanding charm despite its lack of originality.

Melody after melody from the "Russian Weeper's" prolific pen weaves its way through Stravinsky's ingenious score. Though it was beautifully played, it seemed interminable, for ballet without dancers is like Wagner without godz and goddeshes.

Curtain-raiser was the music of the blessed spirits from Gluck's "Orphous & Eurydice," played in memory of Harold Thompson, percussionist who died last Monday in a tragic traffic accident.

Tchaikovsky's symphonic ballad, "Le Voyevode" (Op. 78) ensued. It had not been performed by the BSO since 1903, but did not suffer from the long passage of years.

After the interval, Grant Johannesen, American pianist, joined the orchestra as soloist in Beethoven's fifth concerto (Op. 73, in E. flat), the so-called "Emperor," by far and away the most popular with concert audiences, yet, in comparison with the less-pretentious but far more musicianly fourth concerto (Op. 58, in G), it is an empty showpiece, precursor of the bravura concerti of the nineteenth century. The only really great segment is the lovely slow movement and transition into the first bars of the finale. The "Emperor" bears some resemblance to the "Eroica" symphony: obviously in the tonality of E flat and in the general outlines of the first movement of the concerto.

Though the middle, slow movement does not have the funereal character of the symphony inspired by Napoleon, it is similarly elegiac. In fact, the concerto's slow movement is among the finer outpourings of that quality which much of Beethoven's music presents so superbly - human compassion. From this mood he proceeds, without pause, to the last movement, a rondo expressing the most Beethovenish exultation.

Johannsen's reading scarcely could be called exciting; it was proficient technically, overly deliberate and rather uninspired.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

FEB 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Johannesen soloist at Symphony

The Boston Symphony began its Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall by paying respects to its recently deceased percussionist, Harold Thompson. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Elysian Fields music from Gluck's "Orfeo," following which a moment of silence was observed.

The rest of the concert consisted of two major works and another Tchaikovsky fantasy-overture-tone poem. The latter, entitled "Le Voyevode," symphonic ballad, Op. 78, and last played in Boston during the season of 1903-04, may have been programed for the sake of comparison with the Stravinskified Tchaikovsky that followed.

Coordination and finish

"Le Baiser de la Fée" is a ballet by Stravinsky based (to an indeterminate extent) on the style of Tchaikovsky, and incorporating several of the elder Russian's melodic ideas. The Boston Symphony proved that the work is a greater challenge than much of Tchaikovsky's own music, for whereas "Le Voyevode" was played with a degree of coordination and finish, the Stravinsky performance was a poor approximation of the composer's intentions.

Stravinsky put some pretty tough licks into the piece, and on this occasion the men simply were unable to handle them. The toughest job of all is that of the conductor, and Mr. Leinsdorf proved to be equally unequal to the task. He had some effective moments, particularly in the sustained lyricism of the epilogue; elsewhere the work simply was limp and without the rhythmic vitality that Stravinsky—even in "Le Baiser de la Fée"—demands.

The second half of the program featured Grant Johannesen in the "Emperor" Concerto. The performance, while not a model of piano-orchestral coordination, included some lovely playing by the soloist in the slow movement and the secondary thematic material of the first.

In the more brilliant chordal passages of the first movement, Mr. Johannesen had a tendency to obscure detail. The problem may only have been one of nerves, however, for the finale produced excitement without sacrifce to clarity.

46

FRI - SAT - XVII

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Seventeenth Program
Friday afternoon February 16 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 17 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — The Creation
Text prepared by Gottfried van Swieten

Part One

INTERMISSION

Part Two

There will be a short pause between
Part Two and Part Three during which the audience is asked to remain in their seats

Part Three

Gabriel BEVERLY SILLS
Uriel JOHN McCOLLUM
Raphael ARA BERBERIAN
Eve BEVERLY SILLS
Adam ARA BERBERIAN

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE deVARON conductor

MARSHA VLECK sings the part for solo contralto
in the final chorus

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

These performances are given in honor of the centennial of
the New England Conservatory of Music

The concert will end at about 4.30 on Friday
and at about 11 o'clock on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1035

Fri - Sat - XVII

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

FEB 11 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO to Feature Haydn's 'Creation'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday, Saturday concerts this week will be devoted to performances of Haydn's "The Creation," presented in honor of the 100th anniversary of the New England Conservatory. Music director Erich Leinsdorf has invited Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian to be the soloists. The New England Conservatory Chorus will take part in these concerts.

The orchestra has performed portions of "The Creation" in the past but the weekend concerts will be the first time the complete work has been given by the Boston Symphony. "The Creation" is the first of two great oratorios by Haydn and was simultaneously published in English and German. The English version will be heard at the Symphony Hall concerts.

An open rehearsal will take place on Thursday evening at 7:30. This will be the fourth scheduled open rehearsal of the season, but holders for the rehearsals are reminded that the open rehearsal of Dec. 28, postponed by a snowstorm, has been rescheduled for March 7.

This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 143rd Pension Fund concert with Jack Benny as soloist. All tickets for this concert have been sold.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

FEB 19 1968

A COMPLETE performance of Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will be broadcast by WAMC-FM at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday.

The concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The New England Conservatory Chorus and soloists, soprano Beverly Sills, tenor John McCollum and bass Ara Barberian will join the orchestra in the performance.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

FEB 11 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO to Perform Haydn's 'Creation' At Symphony Hall

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday-Saturday concerts this week will be devoted to performances of Haydn's "The Creation" presented in niversary of the New honor of the 100th an- England Conservatory. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf has invited Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian to be the soloists. The New England Conservatory Chorus will take part in these concerts.

Complete Work

The orchestra has performed portions of "The Creation" in the past but the weekend concerts will be the first time the complete work has been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Creation" is the first of two great oratorios by Haydn and was simultaneously published in English and German. The English version will be heard at the Symphony Hall concerts.

An open rehearsal will take place Thursday night at 7.30. This will be the fourth scheduled open rehearsal of the season, but holders for the rehearsals are reminded Dec. 28, postponed by a snowstorm, has been rescheduled for March 7.

Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 143d pension fund concert with Jack Benny as soloist. The program is sold out.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

FEB 22 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony, Chorus Radiant in Haydn Work

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Among the world's oratorios, Haydn's "The Creation" ranks in popularity with Handel's "Messiah" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah." In Symphony Hall, in a program of the Tuesday "B" Series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, assisted by the New England Conservatory Chorus and competent guest soloists, presented a beautifully conceived performance of the Haydn work.

Originally presented in Vienna in 1798, "The Creation" sets to music texts taken from the Book of Genesis and Milton's "Paradise Lost."

Primarily, the work is an inspiring tribute to the glories created by God. Part I opens, for example, with an overture suggesting chaos; then the spirit of God breathes upon the waters, creation begins, and with the words, "Let there be light" serenity occurs. In this part, there is a lovely aria, "With verdure clad;" a remarkable fugued chorus, "Awake the Harp," in which the angels shout a paean of praise, and the rousing and reverential closing chorus, "The Heavens Are Telling."

Part Two is concerned with the creation of animal life, culminating in man. And the third part, an idyllic one, depicts Adam and Eve in the first happy days in the Garden of Eden; some of the arias in this sequence are overly sweet and rather insipid. However, the final section concludes with a glorious burst of sound, a laudamus of great beauty.

In this performance, in which orchestra, chorus, and the three soloists were admirably integrated, Mr. Leinsdorf had both music and musicians under expert control. The three soloists — soprano Beverly Sills singing both Gabriel and Eve, tenor John McCollum as Uriel, and bass Ara Berberian as both Raphael and Adam gave good accounts of themselves, with Miss Sills' clear, bell-like tone quality perhaps emerging with top honors. The three singers were notably good in the several trios in the work.

As for the New England Conservatory Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron, these young singers came forth with some lovely sound, were well-disciplined, and lucidly phrased.

In the final performance of this Tuesday series on April 16, Julius Rudel, general director of the New York City Opera, will be guest conductor.

46

FRI – SAT – XVII

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Seventeenth Program
Friday afternoon February 16 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 17 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — The Creation
Text prepared by Gottfried van Swieten

Part One

INTERMISSION

Part Two

There will be a short pause between
Part Two and Part Three during which the audience is asked to remain in their seats

Part Three

Gabriel — BEVERLY SILLS
Uriel — JOHN McCOLLUM
Raphael — ARA BERBERIAN
Eve — BEVERLY SILLS
Adam — ARA BERBERIAN

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE deVARON conductor

MARSHA VLECK sings the part for solo contralto
in the final chorus

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

These performances are given in honor of the centennial of
the New England Conservatory of Music

The concert will end at about 4.30 on Friday
and at about 11 o'clock on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1035

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

FEB 19 1968

A COMPLETE performance of Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will be broadcast by WAMC-FM at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday.

The concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The New England Conservatory Chorus and soloists, soprano Beverly Sills, tenor John McCollum and bass Ara Barberian will join the orchestra in the performance.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

FEB 11 1968 New England Newsclip

/12

BSO to Feature Haydn's 'Creation'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's ~~Friday, Saturday~~ concerts this week will be devoted to performances of Haydn's "The Creation," presented in honor of the 100th anniversary of the New England Conservatory. Music director Erich Leinsdorf has invited Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian to be the soloists. The New England Conservatory Chorus will take part in these concerts.

The orchestra has performed portions of "The Creation" in the past but the weekend concerts will be the first time the complete work has been given by the Boston Symphony. "The Creation" is the first of two great oratorios by Haydn and was simultaneously published in English and German. The English version will be heard at the Symphony Hall concerts.

An open rehearsal will take place on Thursday evening at 7:30. This will be the fourth scheduled open rehearsal of the season, but holders for the rehearsals are reminded that the open rehearsal of Dec. 28, postponed by a snowstorm, has been rescheduled for March 7.

This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 143rd Pension Fund concert with Jack Benny as soloist. All tickets for this concert have been sold.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

FEB 11 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO to Perform Haydn's 'Creation' At Symphony Hall

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra's~~ Friday-Saturday concerts this week will be devoted to performances of Haydn's "The Creation" presented in niversary of the New honor of the 100th an- England Conservatory. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf has invited Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian to be the soloists. The New England Conservatory Chorus will take part in these concerts.

Complete Work

The orchestra has performed portions of "The Creation" in the past but the weekend concerts will be the first time the complete work has been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "The Creation" is the first of two great oratorios by Haydn and was simultaneously published in English and German. The English version will be heard at the Symphony Hall concerts.

An open rehearsal will take place Thursday night at 7.30. This will be the fourth scheduled open rehearsal of the season, but holders for the rehearsals are reminded Dec. 28, postponed by a snowstorm, has been rescheduled for March 7.

Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 143d pension fund concert with Jack Benny as soloist. The program is sold out.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

FEB 22 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony, Chorus Radiant in Haydn Work

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Among the world's oratorios, Haydn's "The Creation" ranks in popularity with Handel's "Messiah" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah." In Symphony Hall, in a program of the Tuesday "B" Series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under ~~the baton of~~ Erich Leinsdorf, assisted by the New England Conservatory Chorus and competent guest soloists, presented a beautifully conceived performance of the Haydn work.

Originally presented in Vienna in 1798, "The Creation" sets to music texts taken from the Book of Genesis and Milton's "Paradise Lost."

Primarily, the work is an inspiring tribute to the glories created by God. Part I opens, for example, with an overture suggesting chaos; then the spirit of God breathes upon the waters, creation begins, and with the words, "Let there be light" serenity occurs. In this part, there is a lovely aria, "With verdure clad;" a remarkable fugued chorus, "Awake the Harp," in which the angels shout a paean of praise, and the rousing and reverential closing chorus, "The Heavens Are Telling."

Part Two is concerned with the creation of animal life, culminating in man. And the third part, an idyllic one, depicts Adam and Eve in the first happy days in the Garden of Eden; some of the arias in this sequence are overly sweet and rather insipid. However, the final section concludes with a glorious burst of sound, a laudamus of great beauty.

In this performance, in which orchestra, chorus, and the three soloists were admirably integrated, Mr. Leinsdorf had both music and musicians under expert control. The three soloists — soprano Beverly Sills singing both Gabriel and Eve, tenor John McCollum as Uriel, and bass Ara Berberian as both Raphael and Adam gave good accounts of themselves, with Miss Sills' clear, bell-like tone quality perhaps emerging with top honors. The three singers were notably good in the several trios in the work.

As for the New England Conservatory Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron, these young singers came forth with some lovely sound, were well-disciplined, and lucidly phrased.

In the final performance of this Tuesday series on April 16, Julius Rudel, general director of the New York City Opera, will be guest conductor.

TUES B - V / THURS AA - V

47

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program

Thursday evening February 22 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — The Creation
Text prepared by Gottfried van Swieten

Part One

INTERMISSION

Part Two

There will be a short pause between
Part Two and Part Three during which the audience is asked to remain in their seats

Part Three

Gabriel	BEVERLY SILLS
Uriel	JOHN McCOLLUM
Raphael	ARA BERBERIAN
Eve	BEVERLY SILLS
Adam	ARA BERBERIAN

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE deVARON conductor

MARSHA VLECK sings the part for solo contralto
in the final chorus

This performance is given in honor of the centennial of
the New England Conservatory of Music

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Thurs A - V

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

FEB 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Haydn's 'Creation' at Symphony

By Craig Stinson

Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," distills the events of six days into two hours of the most inspired descriptive music. For vividness of imagery, for richness of musical invention, the literature has little else to touch it. And though two hours is generally enough music for a symphony concert, one walks away from the "Creation" wishing that Haydn had gone on to depict the entire Book of Genesis.

The Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon, gave its first complete performance of this work. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus (prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron), and soloists Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian.

Ups and downs

The performance had its unsurprising complement of ups and downs. Mr. Leinsdorf was responsible for some remarkably dramatic moments, particularly in the well-paced choral fugues. He also elicited some agreeably clean string playing.

The problems arose in more transparent numbers, such as the Introduction, where improperly balanced and improperly tuned wind soloists produced a more literal representation of chaos than the composer had intended.

The soloists, too, had their rather clearly defined strengths and weaknesses. Both Mr. Berberian and Mr. McCollum were at their best in the recitatives. Mr. Berberian's large bass voice is effective in its middle to upper regions, where most declamatory music is apt to lie. In the arias, especially those that took him to the bottom of the bass clef, his tone was constricted and unlovely. His diction, fine in the recitatives, was inadequate elsewhere, producing some amusing malaprops—such as "livid brook" for "limpid brook."

Mr. McCollum, like Mr. Berberian, proved to be an adequate musical orator. His words were easy to understand, thought they were not delivered with notable tonal beauty.

Unidiomatic text

Miss Sills has a pretty, if somewhat slight, voice, pleasant to listen to at low dynamic levels, agile, but undependable as to pitch. Haydn's aria about the birds ("On mighty wings uplifted soars") is just the sort of thing for her—and she made it one of the best numbers of the afternoon.

Miss deVaron's well-trained chorus provided a sturdy backbone for the entire performance.

Some enterprising translator ought to work out a new English text for the "Creation." The present text, a retranslation of Gottfried van Swieten's German translation of Milton and Moses, doesn't scan properly and is full of unidiomatic gaucherie.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program

Tuesday evening February 20 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — The Creation
Text prepared by Gottfried van Swieten

Part One

INTERMISSION

Part Two

There will be a short pause between
Part Two and Part Three during which the audience is asked to remain in their seats

Part Three

Gabriel	BEVERLY SILLS
Uriel	JOHN McCOLLUM
Raphael	ARA BERBERIAN
Eve	BEVERLY SILLS
Adam	ARA BERBERIAN

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE deVARON conductor

MARSHA VLECK sings the part for solo contralto
in the final chorus

This performance is given in honor of the centennial of
the New England Conservatory of Music

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Tues B - V

TUES B - V / THURS A - V

47

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program
Thursday evening February 22 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — The Creation
Text prepared by Gottfried van Swieten

Part One

INTERMISSION

Part Two

There will be a short pause between
Part Two and Part Three during which the audience is asked to remain in their seats

Part Three

Gabriel BEVERLY SILLS
Uriel JOHN McCOLLUM
Raphael ARA BERBERIAN
Eve BEVERLY SILLS
Adam ARA BERBERIAN

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE deVARON conductor

MARSHA VLECK sings the part for solo contralto
in the final chorus

This performance is given in honor of the centennial of
the New England Conservatory of Music

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

THURS A - V

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

FEB 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Haydn's 'Creation' at Symphony

By Craig Stinson

Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," distills the events of six days into two hours of the most inspired descriptive music. For vividness of imagery, for richness of musical invention, the literature has little else to touch it. And though two hours is generally enough music for a symphony concert, one walks away from the "Creation" wishing that Haydn had gone on to depict the entire Book of Genesis.

The Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon, gave its first complete performance of this work. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus (prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron), and soloists Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian.

Ups and downs

The performance had its unsurprising complement of ups and downs. Mr. Leinsdorf was responsible for some remarkably dramatic moments, particularly in the well-paced choral fugues. He also elicited some agreeably clean string playing.

The problems arose in more transparent numbers, such as the Introduction, where improperly balanced and improperly tuned wind soloists produced a more literal representation of chaos than the composer had intended.

The soloists, too, had their rather clearly defined strengths and weaknesses. Both Mr. Berberian and Mr. McCollum were at their best in the recitatives. Mr. Berberian's large bass voice is effective in its middle to upper regions, where most declamatory music is apt to lie. In the arias, especially those that took him to the bottom of the bass clef, his tone was constricted and unlovely. His diction, fine in the recitatives, was inadequate elsewhere, producing some amusing malaprops—such as "livid brook" for "limpid brook."

Mr. McCollum, like Mr. Berberian, proved to be an adequate musical orator. His words were easy to understand, thought they were not delivered with notable tonal beauty.

Unidiomatic text

Miss Sills has a pretty, if somewhat slight, voice, pleasant to listen to at low dynamic levels, agile, but undependable as to pitch. Haydn's aria about the birds ("On mighty wings uplifted soars") is just the sort of thing for her—and she made it one of the best numbers of the afternoon.

Miss deVaron's well-trained chorus provided a sturdy backbone for the entire performance.

Some enterprising translator ought to work out a new English text for the "Creation." The present text, a retranslation of Gottfried van Swieten's German translation of Milton and Moses, doesn't scan properly and is full of unidiomatic gaucherie.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program
Tuesday evening February 20 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — The Creation
Text prepared by Gottfried van Swieten

Part One

INTERMISSION

Part Two

There will be a short pause between
Part Two and Part Three during which the audience is asked to remain in their seats

Part Three

Gabriel BEVERLY SILLS
Uriel JOHN McCOLLUM
Raphael ARA BERBERIAN
Eve BEVERLY SILLS
Adam ARA BERBERIAN

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE deVARON conductor

MARSHA VLECK sings the part for solo contralto
in the final chorus

This performance is given in honor of the centennial of
the New England Conservatory of Music

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

11

TUES - V

48

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 22 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

SYMPHONY: HAYDN'S "CREATION"

"In the end," Robert Schumann once asserted, "you will tell us that you can actually hear the grass growing in Haydn's 'Creation' ".

Schumann's reverential judgment in pretty much in accord with posterity's, which has always regarded this late fruit of Haydn's genius, from its very first performance, as one of the greatest choral masterpieces ever penned. Last week the oratorio finally received its Boston Symphony Orchestra rendition. It was given in honor of the centennial of the New England Conservatory of Music, and joining Mr. Leinsdorf and a reduced orchestra were Beverly Sills, soprano, John McCollum, tenor, and Ara Berberian, baritone. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, conductor, completed the forces.

The origins of the "Creation" are interesting and to a considerable extent help explain a text otherwise difficult to countenance. Haydn, during his English visit, had been greatly impressed by the performance of Handel's religious music and swiftly divined the potential in an obscure poem for music taken from Milton's "Paradise Lost" which Salomon handed him just prior to his departure from London. He showed the poem to his Viennese patron, Baron van Swieten, who translated the test into German and then retranslated the German back into English. All this may help allay some of the stupefaction which arises from such lines as:

"His welcome bids to morn the merry lark,
And cooing calls the tender dove his mate."

But if the devotional text is to poetry as reconstituted orange juice is to authentic fruit, the score is eternal in the freshness of its melody, its invention, radiance, richness of development and orchestration, and utterly expressive treatment of the voices. No matter what Haydn is depicting — the void before there was light, the advent of light itself, of the sea, of land, of animals, and so on through Adam and Eve — he does so with a sureness, naturalness and commitment which both touches every pictorial detail and at the same time invokes a sense of inexorability as the drama of creation unfolds.

A reasonably well rendered performance was bound, then, to make the "Creation" one of the high points of this and a number of other seasons, and indeed that is how it was in this instance. The pity of it is that the performance didn't jell sufficiently to leave one with that sense of one that is felt so unmistakably on those rare occasions of encountering enduring beauty.

Mr. Leinsdorf's direction was sensitive, intelligent and well-paced, and the orchestra performed eloquently for him. However, the catalytic substance that sparks a merely good performance into incandescence never appeared and so the excitement which the noble score can inspire only rarely materialized.

A number of elements besides want of charisma may account for this. The highly musical and well-disciplined New England Conservatory Chorus should have been twice as large for this work. Haydn's orchestral scoring in the "Creation" is sufficiently full to have required the whole complement of strings. As for the soloists, Beverly Sills was marvelously skilled; but John McCollum's personality and resourceful projection do not give him a first-rate voice and Ara Berbarian cannot really deal with the upper register notes and is only adequate otherwise.

Kudos to the management is herewith gratefully recorded. With commendably candid recognition of the rampant philistinism in the audience, the program commanded them at the foot of each page of text to turn the page quietly and to refrain from doing so altogether until the end of the movement.

This week the program will consist of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Ginastera's Concerto for piano and orchestra with Joao Carlos Martins as soloist, and Strauss' Also Sprach Zarathustra. Mr. Leinsdorf will again conduct.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 17 1968 New England Newsclip

'Creation' beautiful, moving

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Six times, once for each of the days of Creation, Haydn carries us through the pattern of scriptural narrative, poetic comment, and angelic praise. The simplicity of the design is the root of its grandeur, but what makes "The Creation" exciting is Haydn's response to the challenge of doing "the same thing" differently each time.

Later, in the oratorio's third part, there is a problem, but it is not the composer's as much as it is that of the librettist who, as Tovey pointed out, lost sight of the idea that his proper subject was the Creation, and allowed himself, to become too expansive about Adam and Eve.

At that, it is Adam and Eve who inspire Haydn's greatest music. One would hardly believe that the music of the first two parts could be surpassed, but the duet with chorus, "By Thee with bliss," is worked out with an architectural sense at once so spacious and so full of energy that it takes us to a plane of compositional inspiration unprecedented in this work and, I think, unsurpased by Haydn in any other. And if the final hymn of praise, "For ever blessed be His power," is not grander than what goes before, it contains, in the sudden blaze with which the harmonic horizon expands 13 measures before the end, one of the most dramatically thrilling details in "The Creation."

It is characteristic of "The Creation," as it is of Haydn's best music anyway, that its marvels occur both in the manifestations of the large form and in the lovingly applied detail—indeed, the unflagging inventiveness in small things is part of what makes possible the control of the boldest and grandest formal adventures.

The details, as they go by, bring constant joy. There are the delicious, and famous, pictorial ones. There are the harmonic surprises, some of them dramatic, some of them achieving miracles with a barely palpable gesture like the change of chord for the repetition of "a new-created world springs up at God's command." Most astonishing of all are the sounds the orchestra makes, every bar of "The Representation of Chaos," things as simple as the wind chords of "In native worth," the shuddering kettledrums in the first Adam and Eve duet.

And behind all this, there is the mixture of delight and reverence with which the 60-year-old Haydn, his sense of wonder intact, viewed his subject. The expressive range of "The Creation" is vast, something that is projected at once through the contrast between the sophisticated, exploratory "Chaos," and that daring of simplicity for "and there was Light."

To hear all this again at Friday's Boston Symphony concert was beautiful and moving, and the performance was by and large very good. Erich Leinsdorf paced the work well, gathered energy as it went on, but sometimes let the larger rhythmic shapes go slack in slow movements so that they came out a bit shapeless.

The New England Conservatory Chorus sang with clean pitch reasonable diction, a lovely sound in quiet passages, and a somewhat toneless one in the loud. John McCollum, whose tenor has never been a glamorous instrument, did singing of great musical and stylistic distinction, and his handling of English words was a special pleasure. Beverly Sills did some exquisite vocalizing and was unfailingly musical, but projected almost no sense of text. Ara Berberian was a competent bass soloist, quite good with words and rather rough-voiced. The Boston Smphony played well, and there were some finely wrought woodwind solos by Mrs. Dwyer and Messrs. Gomberg and Hadcock. I also thought that cellist Jules Eskin and bass player William Rhein did a notably good job of providing the linear foundation for Charles Wilson's hardsichord accompaniments.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,000

FEB 17 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Conservatory Chorus too Strong For BSO in Haydn's 'Creation'

By McLAREN HARRIS

I sat in Symphony Hall yesterday and listened to the Boston Symphony's performance of Haydn's "Creation" — a performance which was in most respects very well made — and felt rather curiously unmoved.

Such lack of response was due, as far as I can determine, to various minor factors which in league served to blunt the effect of the whole. For one thing, I became annoyed whenever reading that the opening instrumental "Representation of chaos" resembles "Tristan" more than Haydn. It does not. It is Haydn with a few unprepared dissonances and no more. The opening movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" is much more adventurous harmonically and was written barely five years later.

Second, the text borders on the ludicrous at some points and the English version stumbles here and there. Here is Uriel's description of Man:

"In native worth and honour clad, With beauty, courage, strength, adorn'd, Erect, with front serene, he stands. A man, the lord and king of nature all. His large and arched brow sublime of wisdom deep declares the seat; . . . ."

It is a bit too much. As for the English (which version was published simultaneously with the German) it serves up displaced accents all too frequently, causes occasional words to be run together and requires the singer to contend with such an unsingable item as "hierarchy."

Third, my jaundiced ear will not allow me to sit contentedly through Haydn's musical descriptions of animals as they appear. This, of course, is being unfair to the composer; the passages were marveled at for pure originality in Haydn's time. But one can no longer rekindle the same impressions.

Finally, Erich Leinsdorf called for an orchestra too small and a chorus too large. The New England Conservatory Chorus numbered more than one hundred, the orchestra approximately half that. There was, as a result, no such thing as balance; whenever the chorus opened its collective mouth it swallowed everything else.

The chorus, however, sang beautiful of itself, as did the vocal soloists. The Conservatory voices were capable of sublime hushes (rarely called for), sang securely in tune and with internal balance and blend. Also, they were alert in response, save only for the slight splash at "and there was light."

Soprano Beverly Sills fulfilled her roles of Gabriel and Eve with lightness and some vocal virtuosity now and then striking, as in her turns and trills for "On mighty wings"; elsewhere she was a lyric delight. John McCollum's tenor was likewise excellently poised for his airs, especially the transcendentally tender close to "In native worth," as Eve joins Adam.

Ara Berberian sustained strength throughout the bass roles of Raphael and Adam. His robustness in the earlier stages of the Creation, including a slightly jovial cast in the animal section, was tapered to a gentle, eloquent flow for his duets with Miss Sills.

As I say, each soloist or each group seemed to do well indeed, and the truly beauteous sections of Haydn's score shone. But there was an air of inconsistency both in performance and music which seemed to rob its potential. Perhaps on another afternoon . . . .

FRI - SAT - XVIII

49

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Eighteenth Program

Friday afternoon February 23 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 24 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN Symphony no. 8 in F major op. 93
Allegro vivace e con brio
Allegretto scherzando
Tempo di menuetto
Allegro vivace

GINASTERA Concerto for piano and orchestra (1961)
Cadenza e varianti
Scherzo allucinante
Adagissimo
Toccata concertata
JOÃO CARLOS MARTINS

First performance in Boston

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS Also sprach Zarathustra, symphonic poem, op. 30

João Carlos Martins plays the Baldwin piano

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

XVIII

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

FEB 28 1968

Postlude

Bostonians Present Strauss Tone Poem

By Paul Hume

There was a wonderful look of just the slightest puzzlement on Erich Leinsdorf's face last night when he walked out to conduct the closing half of the Boston Symphony's Constitution Hall concert. As he stepped onto the podium, he leaned over the railing that guards it, and looking about, framed with his lips the words, "Where's my organist?" Then, spotting the young man in question already seated at the out-of-the-way console of the hall's organ, he smiled and turned to begin the serious business of "Also sprach Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss.

While the Constitution Hall organ is incapable of providing the sound, either in substance or in quantity that Strauss needs in his voluminous score, it is nevertheless able to give an approximation that suffices to permit the vast tone poem to be heard.

And heard it certainly should be. It has in it singular beauties that Strauss did not duplicate in any other work. The string writing, with solo violin over massed violas, gives some of the early pages a radiant texture, while the composer's usual virtuosity is often at its finest in all other choirs. If a conductor yields to the temptation to linger in some of the juiciest passages of the work it can splinter a bit. This temptation Leinsdorf sternly resisted.

He took the brass-intoned sunrise without a trace of that overwhelming stretching process that used to make Koussevitsky's opening one of music's most hair-raising experiences.

Warmth in plenty he gave to the pages of longing and of sorrow. And the murky fugal section was marvelously clarified and enlarged. But the Dance Song was rushed just that touch that kept it from achieving the lovely little expanded moments that make such a difference. And when the rapid tempo continued with good effect in the huge midnight-bell section but failed to slacken for the final page, we lost the true depths of the mystery with which the music closes. The bell, incidentally, swinging too freely on its scaffold, refused to clunk properly until about the seventh of its twelve bops, which rather crabbed up the intended effect.

Zarathustra, however, comes all to rarely to our halls, and it was moving to have once more the reminder of its particular glories in a reading as generous with them as Leinsdorf gave.

Earlier in the evening he brought a complete novelty by, of all people, Tschaikowsky, in the symphonic ballad, Voyevode, or The General. While it is late on the composer's lists, of the era of Sleeping Beauty whose scoring it recalls, it is second-rate Tschaikowsky which not even last night's fine, if restrained account could resuscitate.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony separated the evening's program music, with a lovely sound in the slow movement and a clear, business-like approach in the rest. For those who have wished to hear the Bostonians but could not get tickets, they will return on March 30 for a non-subscription concert, which means that all seats are now on sale.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

FEB 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Martins Symphony Soloist

Among the three works to be performed at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday-Saturday concerts next weekend is Alberto Ginasterai Piano Concerto. Joao Carlos Martins, who played the permiere of the Ginastera Concerto in 1961, will be the soloist.

Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation in the Library of Congress and dedicated to the memory of Serge and Natalie Koussevitzky, the concerto will be played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the weekend concerts.

Mr. Martins, a Brizilian, will be performing for the first time with the orchestra. He followed his musical studies in Brazil with appearances at the Casals Festival and with various orchestras in this country and Canada.

For these concerts Erich Leinsdorff has also scheduled Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

On Tuesday and Thursday evenings the orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction will present Haydn's "The Creation." The soloists will be Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian with the New England Conservatory Chorus. Subscribers to the Tuesday evening concert are reminded that the starting hour is 7:30.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 220,629 SAT. 173,407

FEB 28 1968

The Boston Was Brilliant

It was the same conductor and the same orchestra but what a difference one night made.

The concert Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at Constitution Hall Monday night was enjoyable, except for minor lapses, but last night's was nothing short of sensational.

Perhaps it was the fact the musicians had a good night's sleep or that it was a different program. In any event, the second concert made it quite clear why the Boston ranks among the world's greatest orchestras.

The performance of Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra," certainly could not be improved upon. Mr. Leinsdorf probed the tone poem with unerring perception and the orchestra responded superbly.

The Mendelssohn Symphony No. 3 in A minor ('Scottish') and the novelty of the evening, the Tchaikowsky symphonic ballad "Le Voyevode," were no less brilliantly performed.

"Le Voyevode" opens dramatically with pulsing string passages that are punctuated by sharp drum beats. After moving to a great forte, the ballad turns romantic, rambles a bit, repeats a not too seductive theme several times and then trails off. But it was well worth hearing, at least once.

M. B.

FRI - SAT - XVIII

49

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Eighteenth Program

Friday afternoon February 23 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 24 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN Symphony no. 8 in F major op. 93
Allegro vivace e con brio
Allegretto scherzando
Tempo di menuetto
Allegro vivace

GINASTERA Concerto for piano and orchestra (1961)
Cadenza e varianti
Scherzo allucinante
Adagissimo
Toccata concertata
JOÃO CARLOS MARTINS

First performance in Boston

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS Also sprach Zarathustra, symphonic poem, op. 30

João Carlos Martins plays the Baldwin piano

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

FEB 28 1968

Postlude

Bostonians Present Strauss Tone Poem

By Paul Hume

There was a wonderful look of just the slightest puzzlement on Erich Leinsdorf's face last night when he walked out to conduct the closing half of the Boston Symphony's Constitution Hall concert. As he stepped onto the podium, he leaned over the railing that guards it, and looking about, framed with his lips the words, "Where's my organist?" Then, spotting the young man in question already seated at the out-of-the-way console of the hall's organ, he smiled and turned to begin the serious business of "Also sprach Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss.

While the Constitution Hall organ is incapable of providing the sound, either in substance or in quantity that Strauss needs in his voluminous score, it is nevertheless able to give an approximation that suffices to permit the vast tone poem to be heard.

And heard it certainly should be. It has in it singular beauties that Strauss did not duplicate in any other work. The string writing, with solo violin over massed violas, gives some of the early pages a radiant texture, while the composer's usual virtuosity is often at its finest in all other choirs. If a conductor yields to the temptation to linger in some of the juiciest passages of the work it can splinter a bit. This temptation Leinsdorf sternly resisted.

He took the brass-intoned sunrise without a trace of that overwhelming stretching process that used to make Koussevitsky's opening one of music's most hair-raising experiences.

Warmth in plenty he gave to the pages of longing and of sorrow. And the murky fugal section was marvelously clarified and enlarged. But the Dance Song was rushed just that touch that kept it from achieving the lovely little expanded moments that make such a difference. And when the rapid tempo continued with good effect in the huge midnight-bell section but failed to slacken for the final page, we lost the true depths of the mystery with which the music closes. The bell, incidentally, swinging too freely on its scaffold, refused to clunk properly until about the seventh of its twelve bops, which rather crabbed up the intended effect.

Zarathustra, however, comes all to rarely to our halls, and it was moving to have once more the reminder of its particular glories in a reading as generous with them as Leinsdorf gave.

Earlier in the evening he brought a complete novelty by, of all people, Tschaikowsky, in the symphonic ballad, Voyevode, or The General. While it is late on the composer's lists, of the era of Sleeping Beauty whose scoring it recalls, it is second-rate Tschaikowsky which not even last night's fine, if restrained account could resuscitate.

Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony separated the evening's program music, with a lovely sound in the slow movement and a clear, business-like approach in the rest. For those who have wished to hear the Bostonians but could not get tickets, they will return on March 30 for a non-subscription concert, which means that all seats are now on sale.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 220,629 SAT. 173,407

FEB 28 1968

The Boston Was Brilliant

It was the same conductor and the same orchestra but what a difference one night made.

The concert Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at Constitution Hall Monday night was enjoyable, except for minor lapses, but last night's was nothing short of sensational.

Perhaps it was the fact the musicians had a good night's sleep or that it was a different program. In any event, the second concert made it quite clear why the Boston ranks among the world's greatest orchestras.

The performance of Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra," certainly could not be improved upon. Mr. Leinsdorf probed the tone poem with unerring perception and the orchestra responded superbly.

The Mendelssohn Symphony No. 3 in A minor ('Scottish') and the novelty of the evening, the Tchaikowsky symphonic ballad "Le Voyevode," were no less brilliantly performed.

"Le Voyevode" opens dramatically with pulsing string passages that are punctuated by sharp drum beats. After moving to a great forte, the ballad turns romantic, rambles a bit, repeats a not too seductive theme several times and then trails off. But it was well worth hearing, at least once.

M. B.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

FEB 18 1968

New England Newsclip

Martins Symphony Soloist

Among the three works to be performed at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday-Saturday concerts next weekend is Alberto Ginasterai Piano Concerto. Joao Carlos Martins, who played the permiere of the Ginastera Concerto in 1961, will be the soloist.

Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation in the Library of Congress and dedicated to the memory of Serge and Natalie Koussevitzky, the concerto will be played for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the weekend concerts.

Mr. Martins, a Brizilian, will be performing for the first time with the orchestra. He followed his musical studies in Brazil with appearances at the Casals Festival and with various orchestras in this country and Canada.

For these concerts Erich Leinsdorff has also scheduled Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

On Tuesday and Thursday evenings the orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction will present Haydn's "The Creation." The soloists will be Beverly Sills, John McCollum, and Ara Berberian with the New England Conservatory Chorus. Subscribers to the Tuesday evening concert are reminded that the starting hour is 7:30.

50

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

FEB 24 1968

New England Newsclip

Ginastera's Concerto Given Premiere by BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL) —. Alberto Ginastera's piano concerto received its first local performance yesterday afternoon from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, with Joao Carlos Martins, Brizilian pianist, at the keyboard. It is a spectacular and expansive example of pianistic writing, owing something to Rachmaninoff and Prokovieff, and superbly orchestrated.

It was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation in the Library of Congress and first played, in 1961, by yesterday's soloist, at Washington, D. C. However, one cannot agree with the Herald Tribune's Alan Rich in describing it "as the most brilliant essay in this genre produced anywhere since the war."

J. C. Martins

Ginastera has jettisoned his folkloristic properties for nonnational material and international techniques. This piano concerto may well be an amalgam, a subjectively intense, Argentine-flavored melange, stemming from his own clever adaptation of the twelve-tone technique.

Curtain-raiser was Bethoven's ebullient eighth symphony (Op. 93, in F) whose brisk opening theme, though unmistakably the composer's own, would not have strained credulity had it turned up in a work by Mozart or Haydn. Indeed, in his favorite "little symphony," Beethoven, in a sense, reverted to his Mozart-Haydn origins, writing a relatively small-scaled work, though Dr. Leinsdorf used a full-sized orchestra.

Unusual touches, abound, such as the odd transition to the second subject of the first movement, which seems about to make its appearance in a remote key before making an orthodox entry at the dominant. There is no slow movement, its place being taken by a merry allegreto scherzando in 2/4 time.

This segment, more hoydenish, stems from a canon Beethoven improvised at a dinner given to the inventive artisan Johann Nepomuk Maelzel, sung to the words: "Ta-ta-ta, ta-ta-ta, lieber Maelzel," to honor the devisor of the musical chronometer. The ticking accompaniment of the first theme of this sprightly movement is notably metronomic.

Here, more than anywhere else in Beethoven's music, is that indefinable Viennese quality, Gemuetlichkeit. Dr. Leinsdorf's reading was properly genial and gracious.

After the interval came "Also Sprach Zarathustra" (Op. 30) of Richard Strauss, marked by flowing cantilena, jagged rhythmic effects and virile brass writing. Here Strauss reverted to the romantic conception, conforming structurally to the principle of transformation of a single theme, announced with hte opening sunrise, proclaimed by a cutting trumpet fanfare. This runs throughout the work, dominating it as a leitmotiv.

There is more of Faust in the character of the principal protagonist than of Nietzsche's Zoroaster. The theme of disgust blared out triumphantly in "Don Juan" reappears in "Zarathustra." In place of the arrogant, triumphant figure conceived and portrayed by Nietzsche we are confronted by a human being tormented by doubts and disillusion seeking relief in religion, passion, science and intellectual ecstasy and finally ending up where he began—in doubt and disillusionment.

Strauss' Zoroaster is, in fact, only an intellectualized Don Juan—the composer himself. An odd-ball superman this; one wonders what Nietzsche would have said about it. Dr. Leinsdorf's performance was strongly integrated, though the orchestral sound was a little luxurious for this so-called philosophical treatise in music.

Music: Leinsdorf and Bostonians Visit

Ginastera, Tchaikovsky and Strauss Offered

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

Times 29 Feb 68
NY Times

BY now, João Carlos Martins must feel that he owns the Piano Concerto by Alberto Ginastera. The young Brazilian pianist, now 27 years old, played the world premiere of the work in 1961. Then he introduced it to New York the following year. Then he played it once again in New York in 1966. And last night he did it again, in Philharmonic Hall with the Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

He did not play it as though he was frustrated. Mr. Martins—tall and thin, with a beatnik head of hair and something of a defiant glare at the audience — dashed through the difficult work with extraordinary élan. He had everything in hand and everything figured out, including a final flourish that lifted him from the keyboard right into the waiting arms of the conductor. This young man plays a lot of piano, and plays it with exuberance. One of these days we might even be hearing him in a concerto that will tell us more about him.

•

The Ginastera concerto is not the kind of work that can offer a pianist much more than technique and rhythm. It is very, very effective pianistically, but it is also very, very thin musically. It is a highly eclectic score that takes elements of serial technique and attempts a fusion with a more conservative kind of writing. There is nothing wrong in that, and the serial school badly needs a work that will attract performers and a wide public. But the Ginastera Concerto is not the answer.

Its basic fault is that, despite all its skill, the quality of its ideas is second-rate. And there also is a basic inconsistency, what with a serial kind of opening and a Prokofiev-like conclusion. In between is a long section culled from Bartók's "night music." Too many styles jostle. At least the last movement, taken by itself, is a whiz-bank that out-Prokofievs Prokofiev. And Mr. Martins gave it the works. He has brilliance, drive and force, and he also has a great deal of personality. Every cheer he got was deserved.

The composer was present to share in the applause. Mr. Ginastera is in New York supervising rehearsals for his opera "Bomarzo," which the New York City Opera will present March 14.

Tchaikovsky's "Le Voyevode" opened this evening. Anybody ever hear of it? It is a symphonic ballad (which is about the same thing as a symphonic poem), and apparently Tchaikovsky himself was not interested in it. The late Romantic period produced countless works like this, the progenitor being Liszt's "Mazeppa." Tchaikovsky's story tells the story of a general and his faithless wife. It is not top Tchaikovsky, but the score does have its attractive moments and Tchaikovsky's typically rich and inventive orchestration. The ending is peculiar and trails off inconclusively, as though the composer had lost interest. Nevertheless, it is a novelty worth hearing.

Two Strauss works completed the evening. There was that old bore, "Also sprach Zarathustra," and the "Rosenkavalier" Suite. Mr. Leinsdorf announced the "Rosenkavalier" as being played in honor of Lotte Lehmann's 80th birthday.

The "Zarathustra" score pursued its normal course. There was the gorgeous sound of the sunrise, with the organ, as usual, out of tune, and (last night) also the tympani. There was Mr. Leinsdorf's meticulous attention to detail, which somehow seemed to make the music that much more sterile. There was his inability to make the "Tanzlied" dance.

Every conductor seems to latch onto one of the Strauss symphonic poems. Dimitri Mitropoulos used to be the only one to consistently conduct the "Alpine" Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf has his affair with "Zarathustra," which he conducted a few seasons back. The best that can be said of this overscored monstrosity is that it used to be an effective vehicle for orchestra. But this vehicle has long since run out of gas.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, with Joao Carols Martins, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.
Le Voyevode—Symphonic Ballad (Op. 78) ..... Tchaikovsky
Piano Concerto ..... Ginastera
Also sprach Zarathustra .. Richard Strauss
Suite from Der Rosenkavalier ..... Richard Strauss

Joao Carlos Martins Is the Piano Soloist

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

FEB 26 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

Ginastera triumph

By Craig Stinson

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Alberto Ginastera's Piano Concerto, played locally for the first time Friday afternoon, is the sort of piece that could conceivably become the 20th century's answer to the Tchaikovsky Concerto.

The work is modern, yet by no means offensively so; it sits quite comfortably on the program next to Beethoven and Strauss. Mr. Ginastera composed it in 1961, using serial procedures. But, like many other recent compositions, its musical syntax is recognizably of the 19th century. None of the features that most clearly distinguish our century from the past one—fragmentation, emphasis on horizontal as opposed to vertical sonority, avoidance of psychologically derived climax points, etc.—is present here.

A more important factor in its happy prospects for longevity is the work's utility as a virtuoso display case. Not since Rachmaninoff has there been such a fine vehicle for pianistic pyrotechnics. This puts the Ginastera into a counter-current, working against the contemporaryr trend toward a more baroque style of concerto.

Best of all, the work is not devoid of musical interest. Although much of the percussive solo part seems like pure show, the quieter, cooler passages are often quite appealing.

Balance problems

The young Brazilian pianist, João Carlos Martins, played it Friday to great effect. Mr. Martins stands in about the same relation to this piece as Ruggiero Ricci does to Mr. Ginastera's Violin Concerto (1963); each gave the work its première and has acted as chief evangelist since.

The rest of the Boston Symphony concert consisted of the Beethoven Symphony No. 8 and Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra." Erich Leinsdorf's emotionally restrained version of the Beethoven was plagued with balance problems—with the brass repeatedly overpowering the strings. Its one interesting feature was the third movement, which Mr. Leinsdorf, by playing down accents and taking at a leisurely tempo, made sound remarkably more minuet-like than scherzo-like. The movement's tempo marking "di menuetto" suggests that this is the correct approach, but it was unusual nevertheless.

Mr. Leinsdorf's treatment of "Zarathustra," by contrast, was unabashedly full-blown. It was one of those only occasional performances where Mr. Leinsdorf sounded quite at home in what he was doing and the orchestra's playing was beyond censure.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 29 1968 New England Newsclip

With the BSO

Beethoven, Ginastera and Strauss

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Whenever the Symphony offers a program I would not have chosen I remember Walter Piston's remark to a Harvard student who eyed some free tickets with suspicion, "Well-er-what are they playing?" "My boy", said Walter, "if you could hear the Boston Symphony play a C major scale, you would be lucky." And I felt lucky with the Beethoven No. 8, the Ginasetra Piano Concerto (1961) and the Strauss "Thus spake Zarathustra".

Beethoven came out clean and lyrical, a modest pleasure composed in a time of personal torture and played now with careful grace. The whole symphony found a moment of ultimate loveliness in the sound and phrasing of the French horns, midway in the Minuette, which Leinsdorf took at an appropriate pace. The "lesser" Beethoven Symphonies, like the Opus 18 quartets, might well have been the climax of another composer's production.

Ginastera, of Buenos Aires (of Italian-Spanish extraction), uses piano and orchestra for a kind of tonal impressionism rare today. He really uses the orchestra for magnificent sounds that feel organic and pervasive. The piano, only one voice, sometimes in Lisztian dialogue with the orchestra, is more often an urgent ingredient of the mass. Joan Carlos Martins at the piano, also from Brazil, did a fine job of stroking the orchestra. The Ginastra piece made tonal sense and B.S.O. managed it with subtle color.

That made enough for anyone who listens intently, but I was glad to have stayed for Strauss' "Zarathustra". The Boston Symphony introduced it here in 1897, and it dates, oh how it dates. The feverish Nietzsche poem that programmed the music reads like an L.S.D. trip through a kaleidescope of heaven and hell. But the music stays earthy and one can forget Strauss' idea of conveying "the development of the human race from its origin through various phases of development, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of Superman." Musically one hears a handsome exploitation of orchestra, from subterranean rumbles on low C in the double bass through grand organ chorales, piercing trumpet announcements and much internal struggle, until we come out of turmoil with a final quiet C in the bass.

On the way there is a passage of Viennese waltz that has the gargantuan effect of Lachaise's buxom bronze wheeling into action — a triumphant hausfrau on the loose. And the profound philosophy towards the end made sentimental goo only to be matched by a double banana split — a glorious wallow because Strauss was a great orchestrator.

Since there are "many mansions in heaven", I hope one will be leased to grandiloquent composers who attempt the expressive impossible and maybe come out with at least, visceral results. Leinsdorf and his virtuoso orchestra remind me that, "all life is animal in its origin and Spiritual in its Possible fruits".

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 24 1968 New England Newsclip

Argentinian gumbo mixed at symphony

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Erich Leinsdorf conducting Beethoven's Symphony No. 8; Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ginastera, Joao Carlos Martins, soloist; Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra." Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

There are pieces that achieve a special sort of musical economy by enabling a listener to take in, or at least be reminded of, a large cross-section of repertory all within the time span of a single composition. The Piano Concerto written in 1961 by the Argentine, Alberto Ginastera, and played at Friday's Boston Symphony concert, is an example of the genre. With its rapid traversal of "Wozzeck," "Pictures at an Exhibition," Schuller's Klee Studies the Gershwin Piano Concerto, and various bits of Prokofiev and Bartok, it offered Symphony subscribers the most remarkable bargain since Martinon's performance of Marius Constant's "Preludes" two years ago, or perhaps even since Bernstein's "Kaddish" two years before that.

Ginastera is what the Germans call a "Vielschreiber," literally a much-writer, in other words, a fluent and indiscriminate scribbler. He adopts surface features of various contemporary styles, trivializing them by dissociating them from whatever compositional function they originally projected. It is effect without cause, meretricious, and, to judge from some of the recent critical gaggling about Ginastera, efficient at providing an acceptable simulacrum of contemporary music for persons who hate the real thing.

The young Brazilian pianist, Joao Carlos Martins, made his way through Ginastera's bravura gumbo with energy, using the final chord to catapult himself astonishingly far into the air and thence into Mr. Leinsdorf's arms. While sufficiently visible, his playing was audible only about two-thirds of the time, though I cannot say whether this reflects lacks in his tone or that of his instrument, or an excess either in the scoring of the orchestral part or the execution of it. As much of the playing as I could hear distinctly sounded very good.

This raises questions about the Boston Symphony's program policy. Why is it thought apropriate to play Ginastera, but not as influential and altogether remarkable a work as Stravinsky's "Movements for Piano and Orchestra"? Why Ginastera before more valuable American works like Kirchner's Concerto No. 2 or Wuorinen's? Why, for that matter, Strauss's "Zarathustra" after an interval of only four years, considering what does not get played? And why, indeed, even a great work like Beethoven's Eighth after only three years, when there are, for instance, 76 Haydn symphonies that the orchestra has not played at all, or when as fine and famous a work as No. 82, "The Bear," has not been done in 71 years, or as a great a one as "The Drumroll" not in 18?

In the event, neither "Zarathustra" nor the Beethoven, both of which Mr. Leinsdorf has done excellently on past occasions, went particularly well this time. The Strauss was a bit stiff, also rather casual and underplayed in ways exemplified by the almost indecently hasty sunrise and the ignoring of the composer's directions for the coda to become progressively slower. There was occasion for some fine playing—Sherman Walt's bassoon solo with its flight to the high B exquisitely done—but there was a fair lot of sloppy and untransparent execution too.

In the Beethoven, Mr. Leinsdorf used the full orchestra with double wind, but used it to play nothing above mezzoforte. No Beethoven fortissimo will be as big as one by Strauss, but however delicate the dynamic scale is within which a piece is composed, it is important to give the impression in fortissimo that the instrument is being maximally exploited. What we had here sounded thick but not strong, and the limp dynamics had their analogue in the skidded-over cadences and other tokens of rhythmic inattention.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 210,000

FEB 24 1968 New England Newsclip

The Symphony

Orchestra, Pianist Brilliant

By McLAREN HARRIS

On paper a symphonic program of Beethoven, Ginastera and Strauss holds definite promise with perhaps an uncertain prospect for delivery. In yesterday's actual performance, however, the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf and pianist Joao Carlos Martins delivered.

Alberto Ginastera is a remarkable man. He is a native Argentine of Spanish and Italian descent, and he is a composer par excellence. It is difficult to decide where to begin a description of his Piano Concerto; it embraces a range of expression, instrumental technique and formal structure so far-flung as to lead us to marvel at his invention. And yet there occurs nothing which seems incongruous.

12-Tone Approach

Ginastera's 12-tone approach is voiced through four movements of differing stance, each possessing an introduction and a coda. The opening movement's bombastic cadenza and coda encompass variations of lighter color; an ethereal Scherzo skips along with hushed, fingertip agility; the Adagissimo is languid and full-toned; and the final Toccata concertata develops a sustained rhythmic impulse, exciting and absolutely compelling, which nearly lifted the Symphony Hall audience out of the seats.

The piano and orchestra act as true protagonists in a friendly, often serious rivalry, asserting their strengths at the opening, complementing each other's role in the Scherzo, finally becoming drawn together into a single force as the Toccata approaches its close. By itself the orchestra brings out brute force, lush roundness or the sparkling transparence of some luminous spiderweb. The Toccata's substance is totally virtuosic, through never unidiomatic.

The piano part is not an easy one for it requires great strength and stamina as well as technical brilliance. Martins furnished all three, staying abreast of Leinsdorf and the orchestra until near the end, when the two elements seemed to become a single compound. The composer accompanied both soloist and conductor to the stage for much-deserved applause.

I cannot recall having heard Leinsdorf conduct Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" before, and so yesterday's performance was somthing which I looked forward to. It was, in a word, illuminating. His vision of "Zarathustra" is finely detailed, unhurried yet not lagging. The overall shape was as much built by tempo control and transition as it was by the various dynamic peaks—which, after all, are almost capable of building themselves. The tempos were on the conservative side, without the jerkiness of frequent rubatos, and seemed to give the structure a solid foundation. Perhaps there are more glamourous versions around with greater vertical sweep and more abandon to the shattering climaxes, but Leinsdorf's reading seemed etched in sharp-relief majesty.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, as well, approached what one may be tempted to call a Germanic reading—that is, they fullfilled the composer's ideals about tempo; the Allegretto and Minuet true to the letters, the outer movements providing the dash. Beethoven's taste for timpani in the finale is a little beyond mine, but this remains one of my favorite symphonies, and Leinsdorf and his players did it justice.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour, and the following weekend Sixten Ehrling will conduct Berlioz' Benvenuto Cellini Overture, Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 Paul Creston's Cthonic Ode and Respighi's "Feste Romane."

51

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 29 1968

New England Newsclip

With the BSO

Beethoven, Ginastera and Strauss

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Whenever the Symphony offers a program I would not have chosen I remember Walter Piston's remark to a Harvard student who eyed some free tickets with suspicion, "Well-er-what are they playing?" "My boy", said Walter, "if you could hear the Boston Symphony play a C major scale, you would be lucky." And I felt lucky with the Beethoven No. 8, the Ginasetra Piano Concerto (1961) and the Strauss "Thus spake Zarathustra".

Beethoven came out clean and lyrical, a modest pleasure composed in a time of personal torture and played now with careful grace. The whole symphony found a moment of ultimate loveliness in the sound and phrasing of the French horns, midway in the Minuette, which Leinsdorf took at an appropriate pace. The "lesser" Beethoven Symphonies, like the Opus 18 quartets, might well have been the climax of another composer's production.

Ginastera, of Buenos Aires (of Italian-Spanish extraction), uses piano and orchestra for a kind of tonal impressionism rare today. He really uses the orchestra for magnificent sounds that feel organic and pervasive. The piano, only one voice, sometimes in Lisztian dialogue with the orchestra, is more often an urgent ingredient of the mass. Joan Carlos Martins at the piano, also from Brazil, did a fine job of stroking the orchestra. The Ginastra piece made tonal sense and B.S.O. managed it with subtle color.

That made enough for anyone who listens intently, but I was glad to have stayed for Strauss' "Zarathustra". The Boston Symphony introduced it here in 1897, and it dates, oh how it dates. The feverish Nietzsche poem that programmed the music reads like an L.S.D. trip through a kaleidescope of heaven and hell. But the music stays earthy and one can forget Strauss' idea of conveying "the development of the human race from its origin through various phases of development, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of Superman." Musically one hears a handsome exploitation of orchestra, from subterranean rumbles on low C in the double bass through grand organ chorales, piercing trumpet announcements and much internal struggle, until we come out of turmoil with a final quiet C in the bass.

On the way there is a passage of Viennese waltz that has the gargantuan effect of Lachaise's buxom bronze wheeling into action — a triumphant hausfrau on the loose. And the profound philosophy towards the end made sentimental goo only to be matched by a double banana split — a glorious wallow because Strauss was a great orchestrator.

Since there are "many mansions in heaven", I hope one will be leased to grandiloquent composers who attempt the expressive impossible and maybe come out with at least, visceral results. Leinsdorf and his virtuoso orchestra remind me that, "all life is animal in its origin and Spiritual in its Possible fruits"

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 24 1968

New England Newsclip

Argentinian gumbo mixed at symphony

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

There are pieces that achieve a special sort of musical economy by enabling a listener to take in, or at least be reminded of, a large cross-section of repertory all within the time span of a single composition. The Piano Concerto written in 1961 by the Argentine, Alberto Ginastera, and played at Friday's Boston Symphony concert, is an example of the genre. With its rapid traversal of "Wozzeck," "Pictures at an Exhibition," Schuller's Klee Studies the Gershwin Piano Concerto, and various bits of Prokofiev and Bartok, it offered Symphony subscribers the most remarkable bargain since Martinon's performance of Marius Constant's "Preludes" two years ago, or perhaps even since Bernstein's "Kaddish" two years before that.

Ginastera is what the Germans call a "Vielschreiber," literally a much-writer, in other words, a fluent and indiscriminate scribbler. He adopts surface features of various contemporary styles, trivializing them by dissociating them from whatever compositional function they originally projected. It is effect without cause, meretricious, and, to judge from some of the recent critical gaggling about Ginastera, efficient at providing an acceptable simulacrum of contemporary music for persons who hate the real thing.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Erich Leinsdorf conducting Beethoven's Symphony No. 8; Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ginastera, Joao Carlos Martins, soloist; Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra." Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

The young Brazilian pianist, Joao Carlos Martins, made his way through Ginastera's bravura gumbo with energy, using the final chord to catapult himself astonishingly far into the air and thence into Mr. Leinsdorf's arms. While sufficiently visible, his playing was audible only about two-thirds of the time, though I cannot say whether this reflects lacks in his tone or that of his instrument, or an excess either in the scoring of the orchestral part or the execution of it. As much of the playing as I could hear distinctly sounded very good.

This raises questions about the Boston Symphony's program policy. Why is it thought apropriate to play Ginastera, but not as influential and altogether remarkable a work as Stravinsky's "Movements for Piano and Orchestra"? Why Ginastera before more valuable American works like Kirchner's Concerto No. 2 or Wuorinen's? Why, for that matter, Strauss's "Zarathustra" after an interval of only four years, considering what does not get played? And why, indeed, even a great work like Beethoven's Eighth after only three years, when there are, for instance, 76 Haydn symphonies that the orchestra has not played at all, or when as fine and famous a work as No. 82, "The Bear," has not been done in 71 years, or as a great a one as "The Drumroll' not in 18?

In the event, neither "Zarathustra" nor the Beethoven, both of which Mr. Leinsdorf has done excellently on past occasions, went particularly well this time. The Strauss was a bit stiff, also rather casual and underplayed in ways exemplified by the almost indecently hasty sunrise and the ignoring of the composer's directions for the coda to become progressively slower. There was occasion for some fine playing—Sherman Walt's bassoon solo with its flight to the high B exquisitely done—but there was a fair lot of sloppy and untransparent execution too.

In the Beethoven, Mr. Leinsdorf used the full orchestra with double wind, but used it to play nothing above mezzoforte. No Beethoven fortissimo will be as big as one by Strauss, but however delicate the dynamic scale is within which a piece is composed, it is important to give the impression in fortissimo that the instrument is being maximally exploited. What we had here sounded thick but not strong, and the limp dynamics had their analogue in the skidded-over cadences and other tokens of rhythmic inattention.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 210,000

FEB 24 1968

New England Newsclip

The Symphony

Orchestra, Pianist Brilliant

By McLAREN HARRIS

On paper a symphonic program of Beethoven, Ginastera and Strauss holds definite promise with perhaps an uncertain prospect for delivery. In yesterday's actual performance, however, the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf and pianist Joao Carlos Martins delivered.

Alberto Ginastera is a remarkable man. He is a native Argentine of Spanish and Italian descent, and he is a composer par excellence. It is difficult to decide where to begin a description of his Piano Concerto; it embraces a range of expression, instrumental technique and formal structure so far-flung as to lead us to marvel at his invention. And yet there occurs nothing which seems incongruous.

12-Tone Approach

Ginastera's 12-tone approach is voiced through four movements of differing stance, each possessing an introduction and a coda. The opening movement's bombastic cadenza and coda encompass variations of lighter color: an ethereal Scherzo skips along with hushed, fingertip agility; the Adagissimo is languid and full-toned; and the final Toccata concertata develops a sustained rhythmic impulse, exciting and absolutely compelling, which nearly lifted the Symphony Hall audience out of the seats.

The piano and orchestra act as true protagonists in a friendly, often serious rivalry, asserting their strengths at the opening, complementing each other's role in the Scherzo, finally becoming drawn together into a single force as the Toccata approaches its close. By itself the orchestra brings out brute force, lush roundness or the sparkling transparence of some luminous spiderweb. The Toccata's substance is totally virtuosic, through never unidiomatic.

The piano part is not an easy one for it requires great strength and stamina as well as technical brilliance. Martins furnished all three, staying abreast of Leinsdorf and the orchestra until near the end, when the two elements seemed to become a single compound. The composer accompanied both soloist and conductor to the stage for much-deserved applause.

I cannot recall having heard Leinsdorf conduct Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" before, and so yesterday's performance was somthing which I looked forward to. It was, in a word, illuminating. His vision of "Zarathustra" is finely detailed, unhurried yet not lagging. The overall shape was as much built by tempo control and transition as it was by the various dynamic peaks—which, after all, are almost capable of building themselves. The tempos were on the conservative side, without the jerkiness of frequent rubatos, and seemed to give the structure a solid foundation. Perhaps there are more glamourous versions around with greater vertical sweep and more abandon to the shattering climaxes, but Leinsdorf's reading seemed etched in sharp-relief majesty.

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, as well, approached what one may be tempted to call a Germanic reading—that is, they fullfilled the composer's ideals about tempo; the Allegretto and Minuet true to the letters, the outer movements providing the dash. Beethoven's taste for timpani in the finale is a little beyond mine, but this remains one of my favorite symphonies, and Leinsdorf and his players did it justice.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour, and the following weekend Sixten Ehrling will conduct Berlioz' Benvenuto Cellini Overture, Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 Paul Creston's Cthonic Ode and Respighi's "Feste Romane."

52 MARCH

FRI - SAT - XIX / TUES A - IX

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Nineteenth Program

Friday afternoon March 8 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 9 at 8.30

SIXTEN EHRLING guest conductor

BERLIOZ Benvenuto Cellini – Overture op. 23

NIELSEN Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

INTERMISSION

CRESTON Chthonic Ode (Homage to Henry Moore) op. 90
First performance in Boston

RESPIGHI Feste Romane
Circenses (Circus maximus)
The jubilee
The October festival
Epiphany

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday
and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Fri - sat XIX

ITEM (e)
LYNN, MASS.
CIRC. 34,100

MAR 8 1968 New England Newsclip

* * *

Sixten Ehrling, music director and conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight and tomorrow night. He has previously conducted the orchestra at the 1966 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. The concerts will mark his debut with the Boston orchestra.

Mr. Ehrling has chosen to begin his program with the "Overture to Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz followed by a performance of Nielson's "Symphony No. 5". Also to be heard are Paul Creston's "Cthonic ode" and "Feste Romane" by Respighi.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 9 1968 New England Newsclip

SIXTEN EHRLING, music director of the Detroit Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for concerts tonight and Tuesday at Symphony Hall.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Ninth Program

Tuesday evening March 12 at 8.30

SIXTEN EHRLING guest conductor

BERLIOZ Benvenuto Cellini – Overture op. 23

NIELSEN Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

INTERMISSION

CRESTON Chthonic Ode (Homage to Henry Moore) op. 90

RESPIGHI Feste Romane
Circenses (Circus maximus)
The jubilee
The October festival
Epiphany

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Tues - IX

52 MARCH

FRI - SAT - XIX / TUES A - IX

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Nineteenth Program

Friday afternoon March 8 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 9 at 8.30

SIXTEN EHRLING guest conductor

BERLIOZ Benvenuto Cellini – Overture op. 23

NIELSEN Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

INTERMISSION

CRESTON Chthonic Ode (Homage to Henry Moore) op. 90
First performance in Boston

RESPIGHI Feste Romane
Circenses (Circus maximus)
The jubilee
The October festival
Epiphany

The concert will end at about 3.50 on Friday
and at about 10.20 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

ITEM (e)
LYNN, MASS.
CIRC. 34,100
MAR 8 1968
New England Newsclip

* * *

Sixten Ehrling, music director and conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight and tomorrow night. He has previously conducted the orchestra at the 1966 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. The concerts will mark his debut with the Boston orchestra.

Mr. Ehrling has chosen to begin his program with the "Overture to Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz followed by a performance of Nielson's "Symphony No. 5". Also to be heard are Paul Creston's "Cthonic ode" and "Feste Romane" by Respighi.

* * *

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Ninth Program

Tuesday evening March 12 at 8.30

SIXTEN EHRLING guest conductor

BERLIOZ Benvenuto Cellini – Overture op. 23

NIELSEN Symphony no. 5 op. 50
Tempo giusto – adagio non troppo
Allegro – presto – andante un poco tranquillo – allegro

INTERMISSION

CRESTON Chthonic Ode (Homage to Henry Moore) op. 90

RESPIGHI Feste Romane
Circenses (Circus maximus)
The jubilee
The October festival
Epiphany

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
MAR 9 1968
New England Newsclip

SIXTEN EHRLING, music director of the Detroit Symphony, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for concerts tonight and Tuesday at Symphony Hall.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

MAR 9 1968 New England Newsclip

First Time in Hub

Ehrling Conducts Boston Symphony

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Sixten Ehrling, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra at many Worcester Music Festival concerts, made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, having previously conducted it at Tanglewood in 1966.

He will repeat the program tonight and next Tuesday at Symphony Hall. It includes 19th century French music of Berlioz and 20th century Danish, American and Italian works of Nielsen, Creston and Respighi.

Gazette Review

Ehrling won friendly and respectful applause in the early part of the afternoon, increasing in volume and warmth for the Creston and reaching excited proportions after the final work.

Crisp Beginning

The guest conductor revealed confident command of the Boston players from the crisp beginning of the "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture. Here and even more in the later works, the famous percussion section had a field-day.

Nielsen's Third Symphony was heard at the 1967 Worcester Festival. The Fifth, programmed yesterday, ranges in its two immense movements from the gentle beauties of nature to the stern and often-repeated clatter of snare drum and eloquent use of solo clarinet. Between the loud and sometimes grim episodes are climaxes of ecstatic tonal quality.

Ehrling, conducting the Nielsen, Berlioz and Respighi from memory, gave every indication of enjoying the many rhythmic problems.

Best Remembered

Paul Creston is best remembered in Worcester for his "Three Mysteries" Symphony, commissioned by the Festival some years ago, with funds provided in memory of Aldus C. Higgins. His "Chthonic Ode" (Homage to the sculptor Henry Moore) Opus 90 had its first Boston performance yesterday. Commissioned by Ehrling and given its premiere at Detroit in April, 1967, it suggests seven qualities felt by the composer in Moore's sculpture: vitality, restraint, primitiveness, humanism, womanhood, monumentality and universality. Most of the materials range from sonority to thunder.

Respighi's "Feste Romane" found a willing advocate in Ehrling. The highly pictorial episodes of the bloody Circus Maximus of ancient times, the joy of the pilgrims spying Rome, the country festivals and rowdy pleasures of the street throngs at Epiphany, all reached glowing delineation.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

MAR 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Detroiter Leads BSO in Fine Concert

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Carl Nielsen's spectacular fifth symphony (Op. 50) was yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra featured presentation under the guest conductorship of Sixten Ehrling, talented music director of the Detroit Symphony. It is a massive and muscular orchestral exposition in two long movements, solid, reasonably melodious and eminently professional.

Curiously, but not inexplicably, this symphony bears no subtitle, unlike other Nielsen works except the first. This is rather odd, because this work is, in a sense the most programmatic symphony this eminent Danish composer ever wrote and probably, for that very reason, he avoided putting a label on it.

Sixten Ehrling

The fifth is, in itself, so eloquent that the composer must have felt a sub-title would have limited its scope of suggestion, for it appears to have been a musical protest against the horrible holocaust of the first world war (it was begun 20 months after the signing of the Versailles Treaty.)

It is full of conflict, brilliantly expressed in the first movement, where a long, lyrical passase battles for supremacy over the rataplan of a bellicose snare-drum which would have enthralled Bill Duncliffe. It is a powerful, deeply affecting work and it came across extremely well, thank to the conviction of Ehrling's leadership, the virtuosic playing of the Bostonians, who brought to their exposition unusual depth, width and overall spaciousness.

Curtain-raiser was the rollicking overture to Hector Berlioz' notable flopera, "Benvenuto Cellini" (Op. 23), based on themes from the opera, though not so thrilling as the intermezzo from the same ill-fated work, better known as the "Roman Carnival overture. Ehrling's reading was exemplary, with an ear for detail and a beautifully impulsive sweep to the melodious themes.

After the interval came Paul Creston's "Chthonic Ode" in memory of Henry Moore (Op. 90) in a first local performance. The Greek adjective appertains to the dwellers beneath the earth. Here Creston eschews blatant contemporary mannerisms, though present were impresionistic dabs and rhapsodical plus mystical ramifications.

Although he chooses to be eclectic, he shapes his materials so as to make tem hold together. He has unfailing melodic gifts and an assured hand at interveawing instrumental voices. His flair for scoring is surefire, well-sounding came Ottorino Aespighi's "Feste Romane" (Roman Festivals), third an concluding piece of this Italian composer's evanescent rtilogy dealing with Roman life, manners and customs. There are four connected segments, designed to create "visions and evocations of Roman fetes."

Doubtless the composer conceived this as another in his series of tributes to the imperial city he loved to portray, but what grips the attention throughout some rather blatant orchestral craftsmanship is the gaudy abandon of its colors, the amazing lights and shadows made evident. There was amplitude, boldness and realism in the orchestral presentation.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

MAR 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Conductor Ehrling makes Boston debut

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

Sixten Ehrling, who made his Boston debut with the Symphony on Friday afternoon, commissioned, premiered, and brought with him from Detroit, the 'Chthonic Ode" of Paul Creston. The piece, which was first played about a year ago, was written in homage to Henry Moore: Creston's title is borrowed from Sir Herbert Read's critical writing on the sculptor, and his game is to portray in music seven qualities he finds in Moore's work—Vitality, Restraint, Primitiveness, Humanism, Womanhood, Monumentality, and Universality.

Clearly, these are all Good Things that I'm sure every red-blooded American composer supports; but to claim to have captured these qualities in tone is the height of pretension. The piece divided in four sections, never escapes from a bland and monotonous chromaticism and deadeningly unimaginative rhythms. At its best the scoring is routine, at its worst pure high school band.

A more problematic composer is Carl Nielsen; his Fifth Symphony, which Ehrling also led, can be in parts terrifying. I'm thinking of the ending of the first movement when the snare drum has its insistent and crazy improvisation. Tremendous conflict and tension are possible here, and when I first heard the piece live I thought the hall might collapse. Friday's performance wasn't nearly as scary, but good enough to give a very decent idea of what the piece is all about.

What it's about is how this extraordinary Danish composer saw a couple of German Romantics—Brahms and Bruckner. Harmonically we never get past the former, and there are parts of the second movement so close to being stolen that they are embarrassing. But Nielsen's sense of time, his metabolism, was much closer to Bruckner. They go about making symphonies in different ways, but both need long stretches of time to work out the simplest of ideas. (For example the opening section of the Nielsen 5th). They both love lines, and take a special delight in contrapuntal writing. The fugal part of the second of Nielsen's two movements take us right to Bruckner's world. It's very convincing, sincere writing, demanding of the listener, and worth the effort.

If the Nielsen made the most positive impression, its probably because it was the best piece programmed, and not that the conducting varied wildly in quality. Ehrling's work was consistently clean, business-like, not terribly perceptive, and untouched by Eros.

And only the most burning love, I imagine, can make the "Feste Romane" bearable. This last number of Respighi's technicolor trilogy is vulgar stuff. What ideas there are are hopelessly banal; the orchestration is routine in Hollywood. People have been banished from the Eternal City for less. I left the hall during the "October Festival." it's not my idea of a good time.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 9 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Carl Nielsen's No. 5 Intrigues With Sixten Ehrling Conducting

ByMcLAREN HARRIS

With one possible exception, the collection of works which Detroit music director Sixten Ehrlin conducted at Symphony yesterday, following the opening "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, was like a stale stream from the backwaters of the 20th century.

The exception is Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 5, for though its degree of so-called modernism appears timid to the present generation and may even have appeared so at its advent in 1922, Nielsen's writing is no more, probably less anachronistic than that of Sibelius, who outlived him by 26 years.

Whereas Sibelius draws heavily upon orchestral color, notably string lushness and darker woodwind timbres, and seems to trace dynamic outlines around images of landscape, Nielsen resembles mucn more the absolutist: he works with sharper colors of the brass, with distinctive rhythmic patterns, delineated forms and contrapuntal devices. He, too, has emotion and lyricism; the Fifth Symphony begins with quiet, winding themes over a rippling, quasi-mysterious string background, and there are recurring moments of tranquillity in each of the two movements.

But Nielsen adds elements of increasing tension by insistent rhythm, beat out in a tattoo on a lone snare drum, by incisive combinations of harmonic thirds and an orchestration tinged heavily with brass, reaching its climax in the first movement as the snare drum cracks out its own improvised cadence in opposition, even disregard, to the rest. It is as if Nielsen were clawing at the boundaries of his own expression, and these are perhaps the work's most brilliant measures.

Even the forthright, positive and (to quote the notes) "virile" passages of the second movement do not equal the impact of the first, though the second contains successive feelings of a Scherzo, slow movement and finale along its path. Nielsen's energy, however, never forsakes him, and to the final triumphal bars the listerner is never bored.

The program's newest work was Paul Creston's Chthonic Ode, Op. 90, composed in 1966 as an homage piece to sculptor Henry Moore. "Chthonic," according to Webster, relates to spirits of the underworld, especially gods of the Greeks. What bearing this has to Henry Moore, his sculpture of Creston's music escapes me.

Creston has based his four-sectioned Ode on qualities which he sees in Moore's work: Vitality, Restraint, Primitiveness, Humanism, Womanhood, Monumentality and Universality. Again, the only relation I preceive between the music and these philosophic abstracts is Creston's statement that they are what his music represents. His idom is, if you will, like up-dated Nielsen, though no longer with the rhythmic identity or formal coherence. Technically, it is challenging, and an orchestra may enjoy playing it; on the listener's end, doubts arise.

Then there was Respighi's "Feste Romane." What can one say? It is a gigantic piece of horseplay designed to evoke the revelry of ancient Rome, and what I found most amusing were the looks of increasing disbelief on the faces of those not familiar with it as the score heaped banality upon absurdity. From a serious-music standpoint it is a monstrously-orchestrated orgy of comedy.

So much for the 20th century. Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, though not his best, was propelled in winning motion by Ehrling and the orchestra. Ehrling is a conductor of straightforward gesture, and he encouraged the afternoon's works to live on their metric energy, but he had some difficulty getting dynamic climaxes to build spontaneously, emotionally, rather than by the sheer weight of numbers. They had sufficient edge, yet remained largely hollow underneath.

The orchestral work was capable in the main, though the horns made more than the customary number of missed attacks.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sixten Ehrling conducting, presented the 19th program of the 87th season yesterday at Symphony Hall.

Benvenuto Cellini overture, Op. 23	Berlioz
Symphony No. 5, Op. 50	Nielsen
Chthonic Ode, Op. 90	Creston
Feste Romane	Respighi

54

CAMBRIDGE - V / FRI-SAT XXX

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program

Tuesday evening March 19 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 38 in D major K. 504 'The Prague'
Adagio – allegro
Andante
Finale: presto

PROKOFIEV — Symphony no. 2 op. 40 (1924)
Allegro ben articolato
Theme and variations
Theme: andante
Variations: listesso tempo – allegro non troppo – allegro – larghetto – allegro con brio – allegro moderato
Theme: andante molto

INTERMISSION

MENDELSSOHN — Capriccio brillante for piano and orchestra op. 22
GARY GRAFFMAN

LEES — Piano concerto no. 2
Allegro enfatico
Adagio, vago
Allegro tempestoso
GARY GRAFFMAN

Gary Graffman plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Cambridge - I

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twentieth Program

Friday afternoon March 15 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 16 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 38 in D major K. 504 'The Prague'
Adagio – allegro
Andante
Finale: presto

PROKOFIEV — Symphony no. 2 op. 40 (1924)
Allegro ben articolato
Theme and variations
Theme: andante
Variations: listesso tempo – allegro non troppo – allegro – larghetto – allegro con brio – allegro moderato
Theme: andante molto

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

MENDELSSOHN — Capriccio brillante for piano and orchestra op. 22
GARY GRAFFMAN

LEES — Piano concerto no. 2
Allegro enfatico
Adagio, vago
Allegro tempestoso
GARY GRAFFMAN

World première

The concert will end at about 4.05 on Friday and at about 10.35 on Saturday

Gary Graffman plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Fri - Sat XX

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

MAR 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Concerto here World debut of Lees Piano

The world premiere of the Benjamin Lees Piano Concerto No. 2 will take place at the Boston Symphony's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Gary Graffman, for whom the concerto was written, will be soloist, and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct. Five years ago Leinsdorf and the B.S.O. played the first performances of the Lees Violin Concerto, with Henryk Szeryng as soloist.

The Friday-Saturday program also will include Mozart's "Prague" Symphony and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 2, Before the Lees premiere, Graffman will be heard in the Mendelssohn Capriccio brilliante.

The orchestra's Tuesday concert will be under the direction of guest conductor Sixten Ehrling of the Detroit Symphony. The program, a repeat of last week's Friday-Saturday concert, will be made up of the Berlioz "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture, Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 5, Paul Creston's Cthonic Ode and Respighi's "Feste Romane."

This Thursday, the Boston Symphony will play in Providence.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

APR 4 1968

Graffman Heard in a New Concerto

By DONAL HENAHAN

Composers who look at where music is heading these days and decide not to follow are faced with a serious problem: At what point should they try to arrest the flow of musical change? If the decision is to return to an earlier period in sound and esthetics, as Stravinsky and others did in a famous neoclassical about-face of the twenties, and as other composers are now gingerly beginning to do again, how can theold sounds be related to the emotional lives of contemporary listeners?

Benjamin Lees, whose Piano Concerto No. 2 had its first New York performance last night at Philharmonic Hall by the Boston Symphony, took us back to Bartók and Prokofiev of 40 years ago. This particular time was one of tremendous excitement and ferment in music, and the nostalgia of composers who love the great works of the period is understandable. It is certainly possible that excursions into that past may produce new discoveries.

The Lees concerto, at any rate, did not prove to be such a discovery. Although it was played with awsesome facility and faceless modesty by Gary Graffman (who commissioned the concerto and gave its first performance in Boston last month), the work impressed one chiefly with its flashy surfaces.

A straightforward, neoclassically oriented composition in three movements, complete with a long, busy first-movement cadenza, the Lees went down in three smooth swallows, presenting few problems to anyone who knew the Bartók First or Prokofiev Third concertos. The slow movement contained some imaginative patches, opening and closing with duets for the piano and timpani. But, unless Mr. Lees was pulling our leg, what was that almost literal quotation from Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra doing in there?

The piece, not surprisingly, sounded extremely professional and playable, but it generated no atmosphere of its own, and not even any fresh sonorities to occupy the attention in place of better things. Erich Leinsdorf also conducted the justly neglected Prokofiev Symphony No. 2 in D minor, which was having its first New York performance, and the Beethoven Fifth, which was not.

61

54

CAMBRIDGE -V / FRI-SAT XX

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Fifth Program

Tuesday evening March 19 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 38 in D major K. 504 'The Prague'
Adagio – allegro
Andante
Finale: presto

PROKOFIEV — Symphony no. 2 op. 40 (1924)
Allegro ben articolato
Theme and variations
Theme: andante
Variations: listesso tempo – allegro non troppo – allegro – larghetto – allegro con brio – allegro moderato
Theme: andante molto

INTERMISSION

MENDELSSOHN — Capriccio brillante for piano and orchestra op. 22
GARY GRAFFMAN

LEES — Piano concerto no. 2
Allegro enfatico
Adagio, vago
Allegro tempestoso
GARY GRAFFMAN

Gary Graffman plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twentieth Program

Friday afternoon March 15 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 16 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 38 in D major K. 504 'The Prague'
Adagio – allegro
Andante
Finale: presto

PROKOFIEV — Symphony no. 2 op. 40 (1924)
Allegro ben articolato
Theme and variations
Theme: andante
Variations: listesso tempo – allegro non troppo – allegro – larghetto – allegro con brio – allegro moderato
Theme: andante molto

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

INTERMISSION

MENDELSSOHN — Capriccio brillante for piano and orchestra op. 22
GARY GRAFFMAN

LEES — Piano concerto no. 2
Allegro enfatico
Adagio, vago
Allegro tempestoso
GARY GRAFFMAN

World première

The concert will end at about 4.05 on Friday and at about 10.35 on Saturday

Gary Graffman plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

MAR 10 1968

New England Newsclip

Concerto here World debut of Lees Piano

The world premiere of the Benjamin Lees Piano Concerto No. 2 will take place at the Boston Symphony's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Gary Graffman, for whom the concerto was written, will be soloist, and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct. Five years ago Leinsdorf and the B.S.O. played the first performances of the Lees Violin Concerto, with Henryk Szeryng as soloist.

The Friday-Saturday program also will include Mozart's "Prague" Symphony and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 2, Before the Lees premiere, Graffman will be heard in the Mendelssohn Capriccio brilliante.

The orchestra's Tuesday concert will be under the direction of guest conductor Sixten Ehrling of the Detroit Symphony. The program, a repeat of last week's Friday-Saturday concert, will be made up of the Berlioz "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture, Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 5, Paul Creston's Cthonic Ode and Respighi's "Feste Romane."

This Thursday, the Boston Symphony will play in Providence.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 883,000 SUN. 1,500,000

APR 4 1968

Graffman Heard in a New Concerto

By DONAL HENAHAN

Composers who look at where music is heading these days and decide not to follow are faced with a serious problem: At what point should they try to arrest the flow of musical change? If the decision is to return to an earlier period in sound and esthetics, as Stravinsky and others did in a famous neoclassical about-face of the twenties, and as other composers are now gingerly beginning to do again, how can theold sounds be related to the emotional lives of contemporary listeners?

Benjamin Lees, whose Piano Concerto No. 2 had its first New York performance last night at Philharmonic Hall by the Boston Symphony, took us back to Bartók and Prokofiev of 40 years ago. This particular time was one of tremendous excitement and ferment in music, and the nostalgia of composers who love the great works of the period is understandable. It is certainly possible that excursions into that past may produce new discoveries.

The Lees concerto, at any rate, did not prove to be such a discovery. Although it was played with awsesome facility and faceless modesty by Gary Graffman (who commissioned the concerto and gave its first performance in Boston last month), the work impressed one chiefly with its flashy surfaces.

A straightforward, neoclassically oriented composition in three movements, complete with a long, busy first-movement cadenza, the Lees went down in three smooth swallows, presenting few problems to anyone who knew the Bartók First or Prokofiev Third concertos. The slow movement contained some imaginative patches, opening and closing with duets for the piano and timpani. But, unless Mr. Lees was pulling our leg, what was that almost literal quotation from Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra doing in there?

The piece, not surprisingly, sounded extremely professional and playable, but it generated no atmosphere of its own, and not even any fresh sonorities to occupy the attention in place of better things. Erich Leinsdorf also conducted the justly neglected Prokofiev Symphony No. 2 in D minor, which was having its first New York performance, and the Beethoven Fifth, which was not.

Music Review

Graffman Featured With Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

BOSTON — High hopes were held for the merit of Benjamin Lees' new Piano Concerto No. 2 that was world premiered yesterday in Symphony Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Soloist was Gary Graffman for whom the concerto was written.

Its indelible impression and only precarious bid for survival is technical difficulty that approaches the ridiculous.

There can be no doubt that Lees set out to write a "razzle-dazzle" for Graffman. The young pianist has a pyrotechnique that he usually uses with discernment.

Couldn't Do Much

He couldn't do much else with the Lees' Concerto but pull out all the stops and let loose with everything he has in his equipment.

Ever since Khachaturian wrote his dashing piano concerto in 1935, the only similar work of lasting value, presumably, is Samuel Barber's that was played at the Worcester Festival last October. It was composed in 1962.

There are influences of both in the Lees' Concerto. The two fast movements have the same incisive, jarring rhythms, and harmonic bite of the Barber. The slow movement of the Lees isn't a carbon copy of the Khachaturian, but has close similarities.

The Lees is a bonanza for those who crave to see the world's record broken for dispensing avalanches of notes, along with commensurate noise.

In spite of these, the Lees makes crafty use of instruments as sound producing devices.

Surprisingly, Graffman used his score. It must have been from choice rather than necessity because the work was completed for him nearly two years ago.

It begins with a scherzo-like skirmish, shared by keyboard and orchestra. Even when the piano is pummeled, there's a dead-earnest sound about the music. In spite of pomposity, not much of importance is said.

The slow movement, also loud, follows sinuous melodic paths with strenuous, percussive figures to uphold them. It does not have Khachaturian's subtlety or stamp of oriental authenticity.

The Finale

Finale continues where the first movement left off. After a brief interlude that recalls the substance of the slow movement, splashes of strident sound and technical fireworks are used to reach the finish line.

Graffman gave the concerto a brilliant performance. Leinsdorf and the orchestra supported him with admirable zeal, and when it was over, the composer was called to the stage, either to accept the credit or share in the responsibility.

Graffman displayed his technical dexterity and penchant for traditional style with Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 22.

It was a disarming preface to the Lees.

The pianist made the most of a singing tone and impeccable note-playing to lessen the impression of Mendelssohn's shallow but pretty music. He couldn't fully disguise the gushy sentiment, but gave it as much straight-faced dignity as possible. The orchestra fortified him at all important intersections.

Orchestral part of the program was the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Prokofieff's Symphony No. 2, Opus 40.

Already a Master

Coincidentally, it was composed the year of Lees' birth. Which proves only that Prokofieff was already a master of cacophony and tonal sensationalism.

The Prokofieff is a blatant, screaming piece of boastful and defiant character. Through the din, one hears rhythms that the composer was to use to much better advantage later on, as in the fifth symphony.

It's a virtuoso vehicle for orchestra and the Boston Symphony was not found wanting in resources. One might feel justified in believing that much skill was squandered on the performance.

The two movements (including variations) repeatedly reverted to snarls, clatter and open hostility. As if to make amends, Prokofieff ended the work with an episode of such docility and politeness that it could be attributed to Debussy or Ravel.

Opening work was a mellifluous and beautifully disciplined performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 38, the "Prague." While Leinsdorf's stereotyped gestures gave the work a visual impression of being matter-of-fact, the sounds belied any such condition.

The audience reacted with enthusiasm to the Mozart and Mendelssohn, was restless through the Prokofieff Symphony, and cordial to Lees Graffman and the concerto.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350
MAR 16 1968
New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 139,700
MAR 16 1968
New England Newsclip

Debut for Lees concerto

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The Piano Concerto No. 2 by Banjamin Lees, which was given its world premiere at Friday's Boston Symphony concert, is honest, responsible, competent work, something to command respect.

There are three movements — fast, slow, fast — and they take about 23 minutes. Though stimulatingly dissonant, the music is tonal, E minor being home. The writing is traditional also with respect to the treatment of instruments. Each movement has a constant metrical unit as point of reference, but these units are all the time deployed into patterns of varying lengths, the peppery seasoning of irregular bars being analogous to the dissonance in the harmony.

It is "traditional" composing with a "modern" surface, but there is none of the disjunction between surface and content that characterizes the Ginastera concerto that was played at Symphony recently. In Lees's work, the outside is a coherent articulation of the inside.

Lees's skill at composing in the literal sense, at articulating and ordering his material, is considerable. The three movements are clearly and effectively shaped. The sense of direction is strong, and the composer's resourcefulness at extending his material and finding new developments and combinations of its elements produces something that holds the interest.

The music is not often rich or highly varied in other respects. Much of the piano writing is in octaves, which is a surface manifestation of a compositional approach that is characteristically "single-line." The language is that of middle-to-late Bartok, and in the Adagio, the sonority of the piano percussion dialogue and the night music in the middle come a bit close for comfort to the Sonata for two pianos and percussion. Lee's music is neither original nor personal, but everything else about it is good, and I do admire the intelligence and professionalism in it.

Gary Graffman's mechanical and charmless rattling off of Mendelssohn's pretty Capriccio brillante was no joy, but his style was more suited to the percussive toccatalike requirements of the Lees Concerto. The orchestra was not quite secure with the shifting meters at quick tempo — the strain on players' concentration in such music is great — and the performance was, I would say, good, though no more than that.

The revival of Prokofiev's Symphony No. 2, introduced to Boston five years ago at one of the Prausnitz concerts at the New England Conservatory, was very worthwhile. The piece was written in 1924. It was disliked by almost everyone at its Paris premiere that year, including even Koussevitzky, who, at any rate, never brought it to Boston, nor conducted it again anywhere. It is, in Roger Newhall's phrase, "the most advanced, the most 'far-out' piece he ever wrote," and it represents the road not taken by Prokofiev, much as the extraordinary 4th Symphony does in Shostakovich's career.

There are two movements, a relentless allergro, and a set of six variations on an andante theme that returns to end the work. Its polyphony is boldly dissonant, and the writing is dense and concentrated vertically in texture and harmony, and horizontally, as it were, in the expressive concentration and drive. The sounds all this makes in the orchestra are of effortless and fascinating originality.

I enjoyed hearing the Lees Concerto, I think it likely I would enjoy anything of his once, but I am not curious to hear it again. With the Prokofiev Symphony I feel I have only begun. It seems to me one of the strongest pieces in the 20th Century repertory, and I hope it will be around more than it has been.

Two 'firsts' at the Symphony

By Craig Stinson

The Boston Symphony added two items to its repertory Friday afternoon: a new piano concerto by Benjamin Lees and a relatively old (1924), but neglected symphony of Prokofiev.

The première of Prokofiev's Second Symphony, conducted in Paris by Serge Koussevitzky, met with almost unanimous disfavor. Twenty-five of 28 critics shot it down; Prokofiev went through agonies of reappraisal, and Koussevitzky, to whom the score was dedicated, never played it again.

It appears now that whatever other problems the symphony may have had (it is not an evenly inspired piece), it owes a thing or two to Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," and couldn't help living, for a time at least, under that giant shadow. The most impressive element of the first movement, for example, is its throbbing pulse, the relentless beating-out of what sounds like march music with a sardonic twist. Clusters of brass instruments enter periodically, playing sharp dissonances in parallel motion—a "technique" to be found on almost every page of the "Rite of Spring."

Reflections of 'Sacre'

But although the manners of early Stravinsky show up here and there in this symphony, they show up as reflections rather than imitation. One sees as well the bitter eloquence, quite original to Prokofiev, that one misses in many of his later Soviet works.

The other movement, moreover, reveals Prokofiev's considerable melodic and contrapuntal gifts. Like Beethoven's last piano sonata, this symphony has two movements, the second of which is a theme with variations. Prokofiev's theme is a simple, singable melody, built on typically Russian chord progressions. The variations range from sparse cantus-firmus treatment to textures that are virtually opaque, with thematic elements tossed around amidst complex and fascinating contrapuntal chatter.

The power to fascinate—to grip the attention—was one of many things the Lees Concerto lacked. It was complex, rhythmically and as to texture, and provided a good showcase for the pianistic talents of Gary Graffman.

Melodic paucity

But the concerto suffers from a grave paucity of melodic ideas. Its most notable thematic element is a mordant figure (like the first three notes of Bach's Toccata in D minor) repeated with tedious predictability. Repetition also robs the work of rhythmic interest, there being scarcely a bar in the outer movements that is not somehow syncopated.

Mr. Graffman preceded the concerto with a brittle performance of Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante, Op. 22, and the orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, started the concert off with a restrained but admirably shaped reading of the "Prague" Symphony by Mozart.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400
MAR 18 1968
New England Newsclip

55

Music Review

Graffman Featured With Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

BOSTON — High hopes were held for the merit of Benjamin Lees' new Piano Concerto No. 2 that was world premiered yesterday in Symphony Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Soloist was Gary Graffman for whom the concerto was written.

Its indelible impression and only precarious bid for survival is technical difficulty that approaches the ridiculous.

There can be no doubt that Lees set out to write a "razzle-dazzle" for Graffman. The young pianist has a pyrotechnique that he usually uses with discernment.

Couldn't Do Much

He couldn't do much else with the Lees' Concerto but pull out all the stops and let loose with everything he has in his equipment.

Ever since Khachaturian wrote his dashing piano concerto in 1935, the only similar work of lasting value, presumably, is Samuel Barber's that was played at the Worcester Festival last October. It was composed in 1962.

There are influences of both in the Lees' Concerto. The two fast movements have the same incisive, jarring rhythms, and harmonic bite of the Barber. The slow movement of the Lees isn't a carbon copy of the Khachaturian, but has close similarities.

The Lees is a bonanza for those who crave to see the world's record broken for dispensing avalanches of notes, along with commensurate noise.

In spite of these, the Lees makes crafty use of instruments as sound producing devices.

Surprisingly, Graffman used his score. It must have been from choice rather than necessity because the work was completed for him nearly two years ago.

It begins with a scherzo-like skirmish, shared by keyboard and orchestra. Even when the piano is pummeled, there's a dead-earnest sound about the music. In spite of pomposity, not much of importance is said.

The slow movement, also loud, follows sinuous melodic paths with strenuous, percussive figures to uphold them. It does not have Khachaturian's subtlety or stamp of oriental authenticity.

The Finale

Finale continues where the first movement left off. After a brief interlude that recalls the substance of the slow movement, splashes of strident sound and technical fireworks are used to reach the finish line.

Graffman gave the concerto a brilliant performance. Leinsdorf and the orchestra supported him with admirable zeal, and when it was over, the composer was called to the stage, either to accept the credit or share in the responsibility.

Graffman displayed his technical dexterity and penchant for traditional style with Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 22.

It was a disarming preface to the Lees.

The pianist made the most of a singing tone and impeccable note-playing to lessen the impression of Mendelssohn's shallow but pretty music. He couldn't fully disguise the gushy sentiment, but gave it as much straight-faced dignity as possible. The orchestra fortified him at all important intersections.

Orchestral part of the program was the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Prokofieff's Symphony No. 2, Opus 40.

Already a Master

Coincidentally, it was composed the year of Lees' birth. Which proves only that Prokofieff was already a master of cacophony and tonal sensationalism.

The Prokofieff is a blatant, screaming piece of boastful and defiant character. Through the din, one hears rhythms that the composer was to use to much better advantage later on, as in the fifth symphony.

It's a virtuoso vehicle for orchestra and the Boston Symphony was not found wanting in resources. One might feel justified in believing that much skill was squandered on the performance.

The two movements (including variations) repeatedly reverted to snarls, clatter and open hostility. As if to make amends, Prokofieff ended the work with an episode of such docility and politeness that it could be attributed to Debussy or Ravel.

Opening work was a mellifluous and beautifully disciplined performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 38, the "Prague." While Leinsdorf's stereotyped gestures gave the work a visual impression of being matter-of-fact, the sounds belied any such condition.

The audience reacted with enthusiasm to the Mozart and Mendelssohn, was restless through the Prokofieff Symphony, and cordial to Lees Graffman and the concerto.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 52,350
MAR 16 1968
New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 139,700
MAR 16 1968
New England Newsclip

Debut for Lees concerto

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The Piano Concerto No. 2 by Benjamin Lees, which was given its world première at Friday's Boston Symphony concert, is honest, responsible, competent work, something to command respect.

There are three movements — fast, slow, fast — and they take about 23 minutes. Though stimulatingly dissonant, the music is tonal, E minor being home. The writing is traditional also with respect to the treatment of instruments. Each movement has a constant metrical unit as point of reference, but these units are all the time deployed into patterns of varying lengths, the peppery seasoning of irregular bars being analogous to the dissonance in the harmony.

It is "traditional" composing with a "modern" surface, but there is none of the disjunction between surface and content that characterizes the Ginastera concerto that was played at Symphony recently. In Lees's work, the outside is a coherent articulation of the inside.

Lees's skill at composing in the literal sense, at articulating and ordering his material, is considerable. The three movements are clearly and effectively shaped. The sense of direction is strong, and the composer's resourcefulness at extending his material and finding new developments and combinations of its elements produces something that holds the interest.

The music is not often rich or highly varied in other respects. Much of the piano writing is in octaves, which is a surface manifestation of a compositional approach that is characteristically "single-line." The language is that of middle-to-late Bartok, and in the Adagio, the sonority of the piano percussion dialogue and the night music in the middle come a bit close for comfort to the Sonata for two pianos and percussion. Lee's music is neither original nor personal, but everything else about it is good, and I do admire the intelligence and professionalism in it.

Gary Graffman's mechanical and charmless rattling off of Mendelssohn's pretty Capriccio brillante was no joy, but his style was more suited to the percussive toccatalike requirements of the Lees Concerto. The orchestra was not quite secure with the shifting meters at quick tempo — the strain on players' concentration in such music is great — and the performance was, I would say, good, though no more than that.

The revival of Prokofiev's Symphony No. 2, introduced to Boston five years ago at one of the Prausnitz concerts at the New England Conservatory, was very worthwhile. The piece was written in 1924. It was disliked by almost everyone at its Paris premiere that year, including even Koussevitzky, who, at any rate, never brought it to Boston, nor conducted it again anywhere. It is, in Roger Newhall's phrase, "the most advanced, the most 'far-out' piece he ever wrote," and it represents the road not taken by Prokofiev, much as the extraordinary 4th Symphony does in Shostakovich's career.

There are two movements, a relentless allergro, and a set of six variations on an andante theme that returns to end the work. Its polyphony is boldly dissonant, and the writing is dense and concentrated vertically in texture and harmony, and horizontally, as it were, in the expressive concentration and drive. The sounds all this makes in the orchestra are of effortless and fascinating originality.

I enjoyed hearing the Lees Concerto, I think it likely I would enjoy anything of his once, but I am not curious to hear it again. With the Prokofiev Symphony I feel I have only begun. It seems to me one of the strongest pieces in the 20th Century repertory, and I hope it will be around more than it has been.

Two 'firsts' at the Symphony

By Craig Stinson

The Boston Symphony added two items to its repertory Friday afternoon: a new piano concerto by Benjamin Lees and a relatively old (1924), but neglected symphony of Prokofiev.

The première of Prokofiev's Second Symphony, conducted in Paris by Serge Koussevitzky, met with almost unanimous disfavor. Twenty-five of 28 critics shot it down; Prokofiev went through agonies of reappraisal, and Koussevitzky, to whom the score was dedicated, never played it again.

It appears now that whatever other problems the symphony may have had (it is not an evenly inspired piece), it owes a thing or two to Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," and couldn't help living, for a time at least, under that giant shadow. The most impressive element of the first movement, for example, is its throbbing pulse, the relentless beating-out of what sounds like march music with a sardonic twist. Clusters of brass instruments enter periodically, playing sharp dissonances in parallel motion—a "technique" to be found on almost every page of the "Rite of Spring."

Reflections of 'Sacre'

But although the manners of early Stravinsky show up here and there in this symphony, they show up as reflections rather than imitation. One sees as well the bitter eloquence, quite original to Prokofiev, that one misses in many of his later Soviet works.

The other movement, moreover, reveals Prokofiev's considerable melodic and contrapuntal gifts. Like Beethoven's last piano sonata, this symphony has two movements, the second of which is a theme with variations. Prokofiev's theme is a simple, singable melody, built on typically Russian chord progressions. The variations range from sparse cantus-firmus treatment to textures that are virtually opaque, with thematic elements tossed around amidst complex and fascinating contrapuntal chatter.

The power to fascinate—to grip the attention—was one of many things the Lees Concerto lacked. It was complex, rhythmically and as to texture, and provided a good showcase for the pianistic talents of Gary Graffman.

Melodic paucity

But the concerto suffers from a grave paucity of melodic ideas. Its most notable thematic element is a mordant figure (like the first three notes of Bach's Toccata in D minor) repeated with tedious predictability. Repetition also robs the work of rhythmic interest, there being scarcely a bar in the outer movements that is not somehow syncopated.

Mr. Graffman preceded the concerto with a brittle performance of Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante, Op. 22, and the orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, started the concert off with a restrained but admirably shaped reading of the "Prague" Symphony by Mozart.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400
MAR 18 1968
New England Newsclip

911

56

THURS B - III - III

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program

Thursday evening March 21 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 38 in D major K. 504 'The Prague'
Adagio – allegro
Andante
Finale: presto

MENDELSSOHN — Capriccio brillante for piano and orchestra op. 22
GARY GRAFFMAN

LEES — Piano concerto no. 2
Allegro enfatico
Adagio, vago
Allegro tempestoso
GARY GRAFFMAN

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67
Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro – allegro

Gary Graffman plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Hall B - III

511

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 16 1968

New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Lees Piano Concerto Premiered On BSO Program Lacks Identity

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Boston Symphony program offered the world premiere of a piano concerto, the first BSO performance of a Prokofiev symphony, a revival after eight years of a Mendelssohn piano-orchestra miniature and Mozart's "Prague" Symphony. Which work made the most lasting impression? The "Prague," of course.

Garry Graffman presented the premiere of Benjamin Lees' Piano Concerto No. 2, commissioned by the pianist. Graffman is a powerful exponent for such a work — strong-willed and technically gifted. But even a Graffman can wrest no more personality from a composition than it bears intrinsically and in the case of the Lees concerto there is rather little.

The concerto exhibits such lack of identity that the first movement, Allegro enfatico, and the finale, Allegro tempestoso, could be switched with little apparent alteration in the effect. Both are propulsive, metrically irregular, rhythmically marked and both moved along at a consistent, somewhat heavy dynamic level. Only the Presto coda concluding the finale convinces us that this must be the end, as neither pianist nor orchestra would seem to have the strength to continue.

For all the abundant energy Lees serves, his expression is unclear, for the contest consists of fragmented statements in endless alteration between soloists and ensemble. The keyboard part seems to revolve around small pitch-centers, thus being almost entirely dependent upon rhythm, not tonal succession, for interest; the vertical concept is a sort of nonharmony, neither functional nor incidental. There is, as Lees explains in detail in the program, definite form here: sonata for the first movement, rondo for the finale. Yet even with these notes before me I had trouble following his intents.

The intervening Adagio provides relief on the dynamic scale, anyway, being considerably lighter, but again the back-and-forth exchanges between the piano and various orchestral elements recall a like expression, only slower in tempo, to the outer sections. The composer was present to acknowledge a cordial reception.

Prokofiev's Symphony No. 2, Op. 40, was far more impressive and, perhaps surprisingly, more modern in its tonal combinations. Prokofiev was mindful of harmonic function, yet not the least timid about dissonances (and harsh ones at that), whereas the previous work appeared to tread a path someplace in between. There is a sort of unbridled quality about Prokofiev's dissonances here, some of which run parallel for several notes, reflecting something less than full maturity. The first movement (there are two) contains pages of stern, almost savage impact, though not to the point of complete abandon or fierce monotony.

In contrast the Theme and Variations possess passages of restful beauty and organized counterpoint, wending its way simultaneously through several tonal schemes, culminating in a contrapuntal swirl which becomes nearly opaque. The symphony is not entirely consistent in its inspiration, yet displays enough exterior features to excite some attraction.

Mendelssohn's Capriccio brillante was the program's smallest work, and Graffman disposed of it in now sympathetic, now muscular fashion. The Capriccio has melodic appeal — more than his concertos, at any rate — but the substance is practically hollow: the orchestra is like a fifth wheel while the piano has but three.

All of which left Mozart's Symphony No. 38 as the enduring creation, even in its role as the opener. Erich Leinsdorf's conception was a classic ideal from lusty dynamic contrasts to observing repeats, and the orchestral tone was like pure crystal. The players were particularly commendable in the difficult Prokofiev, with the only touchy situations of coordination occuring during brief moments in the Lees.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Haydn's Symphony No 24, Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana," with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

56

THURS B – III – III

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Third Program
Thursday evening March 21 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 38 in D major K. 504 'The Prague'
Adagio – allegro
Andante
Finale: presto

MENDELSSOHN — Capriccio brillante for piano and orchestra op. 22
GARY GRAFFMAN

LEES — Piano concerto no. 2
Allegro enfatico
Adagio, vago
Allegro tempestoso
GARY GRAFFMAN

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67
Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro – allegro

Gary Graffman plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 16 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

Lees Piano Concerto Premiered On BSO Program Lacks Identity

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Boston Symphony program offered the world premiere of a piano concerto, the first BSO performance of a Prokofiev symphony, a revival after eight years of a Mendelssohn piano-orchestra miniature and Mozart's "Prague" Symphony. Which work made the most lasting impression? The "Prague," of course.

Garry Graffman presented the premiere of Benjamin Lees' Piano Concerto No. 2, commissioned by the pianist. Graffman is a powerful exponent for such a work — strong-willed and technically gifted. But even a Graffman can wrest no more personality from a composition than it bears intrinsically and in the case of the Lees concerto there is rather little.

The concerto exhibits such lack of identity that the first movement, Allegro enfatico, and the finale, Allegro tempestoso, could be switched with little apparent alteration in the effect. Both are propulsive, metrically irregular, rhythmically marked and both moved along at a consistent, somewhat heavy dynamic level. Only the Presto coda concluding the finale convinces us that this must be the end, as neither pianist nor orchestra would seem to have the strength to continue.

For all the abundant energy Lees serves, his expression is unclear, for the contest consists of fragmented statements in endless alteration between soloists and ensemble. The keyboard part seems to revolve around small pitch-centers, thus being almost entirely dependent upon rhythm, not tonal succession, for interest; the vertical concept is a sort of non-harmony, neither functional nor incidental. There is, as Lees explains in detail in the program, definite form here: sonata for the first movement, rondo for the finale. Yet even with these notes before me I had trouble following his intents.

The intervening Adagio provides relief on the dynamic scale, anyway, being considerably lighter, but again the back-and-forth exchanges between the piano and various orchestral elements recall a like expression, only slower in tempo, to the outer sections. The composer was present to acknowledge a cordial reception.

Prokofiev's Symphony No. 2, Op. 40, was far more impressive and, perhaps surprisingly, more modern in its tonal combinations. Prokofiev was mindful of harmonic function, yet not the least timid about dissonances (and harsh ones at that), whereas the previous work appeared to tread a path someplace in between. There is a sort of unbridled quality about Prokofiev's dissonances here, some of which run parallel for several notes, reflecting something less than full maturity. The first movement (there are two) contains pages of stern, almost savage impact, though not to the point of complete abandon or fierce monotony.

In contrast the Theme and Variations possess passages of restful beauty and organized counterpoint, wending its way simultaneously through several tonal schemes, culminating in a contrapuntal swirl which becomes nearly opaque. The symphony is not entirely consistent in its inspiration, yet displays enough exterior features to excite some attraction.

Mendelssohn's Capriccio brillante was the program's smallest work, and Graffman disposed of it in now sympathetic now muscular fashion. The Capriccio has melodic appeal — more than his concertos, at any rate — but the substance is practically hollow: the orchestra is like a fifth wheel while the piano has but three.

All of which left Mozart's Symphony No. 38 as the enduring creation, even in its role as the opener. Erich Leinsdorf's conception was a classic ideal from lusty dynamic contrasts to observing repeats, and the orchestral tone was like pure crystal. The players were particularly commendable in the difficult Prokofiev, with the only touchy situations of coordination occuring during brief moments in the Lees.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Haydn's Symphony No 24, Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana," with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

MAR 16 1968

New England Newsclip

Lees' 2d Concerto World Premiere

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Gary Gaffman, distinguished young American pianist, was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, yesterday afternoon, introducing, at the concert's conclusion, Benjamin Lees' second piano concerto. It is an eclectic work, borrowing heavily from Shostakovitch, Khatchaturian and the late George Antheil (in orchestration), but a notable contribution, nevertheless.

It is notably suited to the pianist's ultrapercussive style and the slow movement (Adagio, vago) was beautifully wrought. However, it is doubtful that it is destined to be included in the repertory.

Gary Graffman

Before that, he was soloist in Mendelssohn's "Capriccio Brilliante" (Op. 22, in B) for piano and orchestra, colorful and brilliantly orchestrated, though, as always in this composer's music, it lacks the contrast of two sonata themes. There is a soft introduction in B major, followed by an allegro con fuoco in B minor. The piece is full of pathos, coquetry, gaiety; it plays with arabesques and march rhythms. For years it was Clara Schumann's favorite bravura piece by a composer other then her husband.

The pianisti needs of this engaging, little known work were neatly supplied by Graffman and Dr. Leinsdorf's direction was, on the whole, apt for this music.

A lively and brightly delineated exposition of Mozart's 38th symphony (KV-504, in D) opened the concert. There is very little trace of that "sunny gaiety of the darling of the gods" which sentimental Mozarteans often regard as the sole significant characteristic of his genius.

What would Mozart be were the enchantment of his melodies not filled with profound sensibilities and passionate feeling and if the demonic strength of his genius did not also pursue the most secret impulses and sufferings of the heart* In this symphony there is a trace of more suffering sensibility than the abundance of divine sensibility than of the abundance of divine gaiety that animated his earlier symphonies.

Also programmed was Proovieff's second symphony (Op. 40), weakest of his seven works in that form. The composer thought so little of it that he set it aside for rewriting, but of the plans for revision there were no more than a few jottings on paper. It was sordid completion of Dr. Leinsdorf's traversal of the seven symphonies.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

MAR 16 1968

New England Newsclip

57

Graffman Is Soloist

The Evening Gazette

Lees' Concerto Is Premiered

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered the world premiere of the Second Piano Concerto of Benjamin Lees, who shared the applause with Gary Graffman, Boston and Tanglewood favorite, for whom the exciting piece was written.

Gazette Review

Erich Leinsdorf's adroit program also included the first BSO performance of Prokofiev's Symphony No. 2, Op. 40, composed in 1924, and which Koussevitzky abandoned after he led its first performance in Paris in 1925. (Critics raved against the work).

Soothed and Pleased

Leinsdorf balanced Mozart against Prokofiev, and Mendelssohn against Lees. These contrasts, which undoubtedly soothed and pleased certain Boston listeners, by no means hurt the modern cause.

The Lees Concerto deserves more eloquent reactions when it is repeated tonight, next Tuesday and Thursday, and is sure to arouse better demonstrations at Philharmonic Hall, New York, on the BSO's forthcoming tour.

Leinsdorf's Mozart (the "Prague" Symphony No. 38) was painstaking, sometimes to the point of fussiness, in the sober first movement and the second's lingering richness. The fleet pace chosen for the finale seemed to tax the woodwinds' agility.

Form and Sense

The Prokofiev Second has few things to daunt us. Its initial tumult of brasses and percussion is tremendous, but the work abounds in form and sense. Its beautiful second movement (theme and variations) offers brooding mystery, static suspense and great climaxes. The symphony ends softly.

Graffman played first a Mendelssohn showpiece, "Capriccio brillante for piano and orchestra," Op. 22. His crisp handling of details helped to offset the basic overdose of romanticism.

The Lees work intentionally posed great problems for the brilliant and equally important participants, soloist, conductor and orchestra. Sonorities required tremendous assets of speed, power and endurance. There were fascinating rhythmic structures. The solo cadenza was vitally written and something to hear.

In this initial performance, Graffman used a score, but turned his own pages.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, March 24, 1968

When the New Music Harks Back to the Old

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

BOSTON — If Benjamin Lees' Piano Concerto No. 2, premiered last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here, has any real value, it is in demonstrating to the audience at large that not all modern music is experimental, unlistenable and unmelodic.

This particular work had an effect attributable to a combination of Sousa and Mendelssohn, a formula for instant popular appeal.

Lees' Piano Concerto No. 2 has done modern music one large favor — it has erased some of the black mark against contemporary composition in the opinion of the routine concert-goer.

Number a Compromise

Any orchestra worth its title schedules a certain number of premieres for each season. The number can usually best be described as a compromise between that dictated by its musical conscience and that tolerated by its subscription audience.

The Philadelphia Orchestra had no sooner settled into the Saratoga Performing Arts Center when the question arose of when the first premiere would take place: the answer is with the opening of the third season next August 1 when Ginastera's setting for Psalm 150 will be offered for the first time in North America.

The presentation of the Lees Concerto by the Boston Symphony was a rather curious event. It was premiered in the 20th program of the season on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. This was routine.

But it occupied fourth and last place on the program. This is not so usual, especially when the earlier portion of the concert consists of two symphonies and another piano piece, Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante for Piano and Orchestra.

The scheduling seems to have been by design, for Symphony Hall was filled for the performance, and yet in the pause between the Mendelssohn work and the Piano Concerto a noticeable portion of the audience left, the premiere obviously not being the major drawing card of the program.

'At Least One Good Piece'

At the close of intermission an elderly lady, a Friday afternoon subscriber of long standing, was asked by an acquaintance if she looked forward to more good music. "At least one good piece," she replied with an inflection that made it obvious she meant the Mendelssohn.

The surprise to the audience was that they were surprised by the Piano Concerto. They liked it and the response was actually quite boisterous. And this was primarily a ladies' concert.

The point is that the role of new compositions is quite precarious and undefined in the actuality of the concert hall. Of course the orchestra and conductor are interested in them if only for the sake of the reputation of their musical integrity . . . but this is only the first reason.

The audience generally isn't interested in new works, at least not categorically. There are exceptions like Ginastera's opera "Bomarzo" now being done by the New York City Opera at Lincoln Center. All performances were sold out almost as fast as the presentation was announced.

The reason in Ginastera's case is easily ascertained. This is merely the New York premiere. The world premiere was last May in Washington where the work was greeted with exclamations of shock and declared to possess large doses of sex and violence. Its reputation was made.

It would be hard to make any such claims for a piano concerto even if such an effect were describable.

Telltale Sign . . .

The Second Piano Concerto was composed by Benjamin Lees for Gary Graffman as the result of previous collaboration in a sonata. Its performance by the Boston Symphony was based on its success a few years ago with Lees' Violin Concerto. The telltale sign is in the program reference to the work, "which was well received by audiences in Boston and New York."

This line is common in promotions for any type of work. The alternative is "well received by critics." Seldom are the two used in reference to the same work. The classic example is in the movie "Sound of Music," but it holds true in music as well.

Incidentally the piano concerto will also be given its New York premiere by the Boston Symphony in the near future.

A year ago the Boston Symphony premiered Elliot Carter's Piano Concerto which had been commissioned by pianist Jacob Lateiner. The recording of that performance has just been released by RCA and was greeted in The New York Times last Sunday with the attitude "excellent, but will anybody listen?"

Chances are they won't.

"They didn't like it at its premiere and it will take longer than a year for "them" to accept this product by one of the leading contemporary-experimental composers.

Even the musicians exhibited a "credibility gap" in their approach to the performance of that particular work. (Musicians on stage are often noted for their conservatism in a vein similar to audiences.)

There was no such skepticism on the part of the orchestra in the performance of Lees' Concerto which the author himself describes as being in a ". . . modified clasical form."

The program notes on the concerto were written by Lees and conclude with his description of the conclusion of the work: "It is short, wild and completely unbridled, hurtling onward in its final sweep to the conclusion of the concerto."

A similar statement could be made about the ending of Tchaikowsky's "1812" Overture.

This is not to undermine the work, or to say that if it is popular it can't be good. What it does say is that the work is reminiscent rather than experimental in sound. It imitates rather than creates in technique. And it lulls rather than challenges in listening.

The orchestra, the concert hall and the composer could not hold out for long without popular support and large scale popular support is not coming in response to the work of Carter and his like. If there is a ready place for each type of composition it could be assumed that there might be a need for both.

It may be argued that there are enough such works already produced by Mendelssohn, Strauss, Tchakowsky, and we don't need more. Maybe we don't.

But if this is what people still want to listen to, maybe it doesn't hurt to give it to them sometimes in modern dress rather than always as an artifact. It just might lead them to listening to something they don't like —and maybe even liking that.

And in the meantime it keeps the field and funds fertile for the encouragement and nurturing of all types of composers, which is the real point at any cost and from any corner.

PIANIST GARY GRAFFMAN
Reminiscent, not experimental 58

PRI - SAT XXXI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-first Program
Friday afternoon March 22 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 23 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 24 in D major
[Allegro]
Adagio
Menuet & trio
Finale: allegro

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

DALLAPICCOLA — Tartiniana, divertimento for violin and orchestra (1951)
Larghetto; molto espressivo, ma semplice – allegro misurato – molto sostenuto – allegro assai, ma non precipitato
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

First performance in Boston

INTERMISSION

MAHLER — Symphony no. 1 in D major (1888)
Langsam: schleppend, wie ein Naturlaut
Kräftig bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell
Feierlich und gemessen, ohne zu schleppen
Stürmisch bewegt

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1291

Fri - Sat XXI

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

MAR 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Silverstein Violin Soloist With Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, will be soloist for the Friday-Saturday concerts next weekend. Music director Erich Leinsdorf has invited Mr. Silverstein to perform Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana."

The Dallapiccola piece is new to the orchestra's repertoire, as is Haydn's Symphony No. 24, which begins these concerts. The second half of the weekend program will be devoted to Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 the fifth program of the "Cambridge" series takes place in Symphony Hall with Gary Graffman as soloist in a performance of Benjamin Lees new Piano Concerto, first performed by the orchestra on March 15. Also scheduled for this concert are Mozart's Symphony No. 38 and Symphony No. 2 by Prokofiev.

The Mozart Symphony and the Lees Concerto will also be heard on Thursday evening, the final program of this season's three-concert Thursday series. Mr. Leinsdorf will conclude the concert with a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

E11

Christian Science Monitor March 25 1968.

Vienna— from Haydn to Mahler

By Craig Stinson

Haydn's Symphony No. 24 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1 make an interesting program combination, because together they constitute a kind of before-and-after shot of a great musical tradition. Haydn, who as we all know was father of the symphony, was still in the throes of labor when he composed his 24th; the work combines baroque and classical elements in utter defiance of category, and offers a fascinating pre-natal glimpse of what textbooks would later call the "symphony."

Mahler, on the other hand, had as much as anyone to do with that final surge of symphonic writing that brought the form to unanswerable conclusions. His first symphony may be seen as a beginning of the end for symphonic writing. (There are, of course, symphonies after Mahler, but with few exceptions they are not amplifications of established forms and styles, but reversions to earlier models.)

When Haydn and Mahler are played with as complete comprehension of the Viennese tradition as Erich Leinsdorf showed on Friday afternoon, the result is not only an integrated concert, but a highly illuminating one as well.

Convincing Mahler

Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony made the Mahler First as convincing a piece of music as it is ever likely to be. He did this with an approach that is rather atypical, in that it emphasized what is most Viennese about the work and played down its more bombastic, superheroic aspects.

There was, to be sure, abundant orchestral pizazz; the trumpet fanfares were brilliantly played (the entire brass section was at its very best) and the tuttis of the final movement were shatteringly effective.

But Mr. Leinsdorf took slower tempos than usual. And surprisingly enough, by making the "schleppend" episodes even more schleppend than ever, kept them from sounding banal. That takes some genuine musical insight.

Viennese Mahler

It was a Viennese Mahler, in the best sense of that term—not simply light-hearted in the stereotypical Strauss manner, but with a kind of inner relaxation. "Philosophical," as the word is popularly used, might be one way of describing it.

Mr. Leinsdorf, by taking his time, by a judicious use of portamento phrasing, but most of all through proper pacing, showed that he understood what the work was about. If he was unable to make its programmatic content meaningful, that at least was not his fault. For most of three movements, the symphony can be understood as absolute music; and the finale, in Mr. Leinsdorf's performance, almost sounded like continuous musical substance, rather than a succession of programmatic happenings.

The Haydn symphony, which opened the concert, got loving treatment from all concerned, especially from Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist, and Charles Wilson, the orchestra's assistant conductor and keyboard utility man. The two of them had the second movement — a solo for flute with continuo accompaniment — almost entirely to themselves.

As a non-chronological interlude, the orchestra offered the Boston première of "Tartiniana," a divertimento for violin and chamber orchestra by Dallapiccola, based, with free harmonic transformations, on a few themes of Tartini. Joseph Silverstein, as violin soloist, evoked pleasant recollections about that 18th century genius.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 21 1968 New England Newsclip

VIOLIN SOLOIST at this weekend's Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony concerts is the Orchestra's concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, who will perform Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana". Erich Leinsdorf will also lead performances of Haydn's Symphony No. 24 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

58

PRI - SAT XXXI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-first Program

Friday afternoon March 22 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 23 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 24 in D major
[Allegro]
Adagio
Menuet & trio
Finale: allegro

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

DALLAPICCOLA — Tartiniana, divertimento for violin and orchestra (1951)
Larghetto; molto espressivo, ma semplice – allegro misurato – molto sostenuto – allegro assai, ma non precipitato
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

First performance in Boston

INTERMISSION

MAHLER — Symphony no. 1 in D major (1888)
Langsam: schleppend, wie ein Naturlaut
Kräftig bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell
Feierlich und gemessen, ohne zu schleppen
Stürmisch bewegt

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1291

Fri - Sat XXI

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

MAR 17 1968 — New England Newsclip

Silverstein Violin Soloist With Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, will be soloist for the Friday-Saturday concerts next weekend. Music director Erich Leinsdorf has invited Mr. Silverstein to perform Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana."

The Dallapiccola piece is new to the orchestra's repertoire, as is Haydn's Symphony No. 24, which begins these concerts. The second half of the weekend program will be devoted to Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 the fifth program of the "Cambridge" series takes place in Symphony Hall with Gary Graffman as soloist in a performance of Benjamin Lees new Piano Concerto, first performed by the orchestra on March 15. Also scheduled for this concert are Mozart's Symphony No. 38 and Symphony No. 2 by Prokofiev.

The Mozart Symphony and the Lees Concerto will also be heard on Thursday evening, the final program of this season's three-concert Thursday series. Mr. Leinsdorf will conclude the concert with a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

Christian Science Monitor March 1968.

Vienna— from Haydn to Mahler

By Craig Stinson

Haydn's Symphony No. 24 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1 make an interesting program combination, because together they constitute a kind of before-and-after shot of a great musical tradition. Haydn, who as we all know was father of the symphony, was still in the throes of labor when he composed his 24th; the work combines baroque and classical elements in utter defiance of category, and offers a fascinating pre-natal glimpse of what textbooks would later call the "symphony."

Mahler, on the other hand, had as much as anyone to do with that final surge of symphonic writing that brought the form to unanswerable conclusions. His first symphony may be seen as a beginning of the end for symphonic writing. (There are, of course, symphonies after Mahler, but with few exceptions they are not amplifications of established forms and styles, but reversions to earlier models.)

When Haydn and Mahler are played with as complete comprehension of the Viennese tradition as Erich Leinsdorf showed on Friday afternoon, the result is not only an integrated concert, but a highly illuminating one as well.

Convincing Mahler

Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony made the Mahler First as convincing a piece of music as it is ever likely to be. He did this with an approach that is rather atypical, in that it emphasized what is most Viennese about the work and played down its more bombastic, superheroic aspects.

There was, to be sure, abundant orchestral pizazz; the trumpet fanfares were brilliantly played (the entire brass section was at its very best) and the tuttis of the final movement were shatteringly effective.

But Mr. Leinsdorf took slower tempos than usual. And surprisingly enough, by making the "schleppend" episodes even more schleppend than ever, kept them from sounding banal. That takes some genuine musical insight.

Viennese Mahler

It was a Viennese Mahler, in the best sense of that term—not simply light-hearted in the stereotypical Strauss manner, but with a kind of inner relaxation. "Philosophical," as the word is popularly used, might be one way of describing it.

Mr. Leinsdorf, by taking his time, by a judicious use of portamento phrasing, but most of all through proper pacing, showed that he understood what the work was about. If he was unable to make its programmatic content meaningful, that at least was not his fault. For most of three movements, the symphony can be understood as absolute music; and the finale, in Mr. Leinsdorf's performance, almost sounded like continuous musical substance, rather than a succession of programmatic happenings.

The Haydn symphony, which opened the concert, got loving treatment from all concerned, especially from Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist, and Charles Wilson, the orchestra's assistant conductor and keyboard utility man. The two of them had the second movement — a solo for flute with continuo accompaniment — almost entirely to themselves.

As a non-chronological interlude, the orchestra offered the Boston première of "Tartiniana," a divertimento for violin and chamber orchestra by Dallapiccola, based, with free harmonic transformations, on a few themes of Tartini. Joseph Silverstein, as violin soloist, evoked pleasant recollections about that 18th century genius.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 21 1968 — New England Newsclip

VIOLIN SOLOIST at this weekend's Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony concerts is the Orchestra's concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, who will perform Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana". Erich Leinsdorf will also lead performances of Haydn's Symphony No. 24 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER.
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

MAR 23 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

A Truly Eloquent Program

By McLAREN HARRIS

There is, I believe, nothing equivocal or of partial conviction to say about yesterday's Symphony program under Erich Leinsdorf. It was musical to the bone, both in material and execution — unstartling but masterfully eloquent.

One could get an idea from the above that it was a program of old favorites. Not entirely. The first local performance was given of "Tartiniana," a divertimento for violin and chamber orchestra by Italian serialist Luigi Dallapiccola, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

Every new experience with Dallapiccola seems to become a revelation. On the surface at least, his music is the most humanly poetic of the serial compositions with which we are most familiar. His lines eschew extreme angularity, often emerging in diatonic phrases; he alludes to conventional harmony though rarely adopts it outright, preserving his flexible position among all key-centers; and his contrapuntal elements, frequently in dissimilar meter and delineated by separate timbres, slip together marvelously.

VIOLIN WORK BRILLIANT

The "Tartiniana," based upon material from Giuseppe Tartini's violin sonatas, transfigures the 18th-century melodic-harmonic idiom into one of exciting metric and rhythmic variety and, if anything, even greater contrapuntal ingenuity. The violin work, via Silverstein, was brilliant, balancing (not dominating) the overall texture. Canonic writing and short-motived imitation is enhanced by transparent orchestration, with its discreet combinations of wind and string (surprisingly, one will notice, like Mahler, also represented on the program).

The orchestra was delicately, yet fully responsive, while Silverstein poured forth virtuosity. Dallapiccola's homage-piece glittered.

Preceding this was Haydn's Symphony in D, No. 24, another expression of Leinsdorf's desire to perform all early Haydn symphonies eventually (if he were to remain long enough). The cheer and polish of the Allegros, the metric decisiveness of the minuet, the sheer dash of the finale are all familiar, welcome characteristics; but the symphony's centerpiece is the Adagio, a delicious cantilena for solo flute, phrased tenderly by Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

LYRIC POETRY

Leinsdorf's utter belief in the music of Mahler is no secret and his ability to communicate it allows for no dispute. The Symphony No. 1 induces an emotional allegiance rather than requiring an analytical understanding. It is even said that Mahler relinquished logic and rhetoric entirely for effect in the finale. But rhetoric, though not ignored, was never the salient feature of his art; his appeal is through lyric poetry, tonal color, harmonic pungence, dynamic climax.

The Symphony's reading bespoke preparation and rewarding willingness on everyone's part. From a premonition-bearing beginning the music moved through a full-throated Scherzo with its languid "Trio," a hauntingly spelled-out funeral march and the cataclysmic finale. Only an anti-Mahlerite would not have had difficulty keeping from coming apart at the seams with latent nervous energy during the final bars.

After two weeks on tour, the orchestra returns on April 12 under Julius Rudel's baton with Mozart's Symphony No. 32 in G, Ginastera's Estudios sinfonicos, the Symphony No. 1 of Sibelius and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting presented the 21st program of the 87th season yesterday at Symphony Hall. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was soloist for the Dallapiccola work.

Symphony No. 24 in D major Haydn
Tartiniana (1951) Dallapiccola
Symphony No. 1 in D major Mahler

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

MAR 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Concertmaster soloist with the B.S.O.

Two works new to the Boston Symphony will be on the orchestra's program Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be soloist in Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana." This will be preceded by Haydn's Symphony No. 24. After intermission will come Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

In concerts Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30, Gary Graffman willl play the new Lees Piano Concerto No. 2 and Mendelssohn's Capriccio brilliante. Both programs will begin with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony. Tuesday's concert will include the Prokofiev Symphony No. 2 and Thursday's Beethoven's Fifth.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

MAR 23 1968 New England Newsclip

Mahler's 1st Symphony Is Presentation of BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Gustav Mahler's first simphony ("The Titan," in D) concluded yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, a sturdy and forward-thrusting performance, uncovering a richness of sentiment, drama and tonal beauty.

None of Mahler's symphonies conform to the classical pattern, though the first, written when the composer was 28, manages to do so for the first three movements; even the finale is revolutionary in the manner of its length. It is definitely programmatic and its poetic inspiration came from a pastoral romance by Jean-Paul Richter called "Titan."

Mahler

Mahler's rather obscure work is divided into two main segments. The first, called "Days of Youth," contains three movements: "Spring Without End," "A Chapter of Flowers" and "Under Full Sail." The second part, under the general title of "Commedia Umana," covers the fourth and fifth movements: "Hunter's Funeral March" and "Dall' Inferno al Paradiso."

SPIRIT OF YOUTH

The whole symphony breathes the love of nature and spirit of youth, with birdsongs and even the familiar cuckoo-call (in fourths rather than thirds). The scherzo contains the German folk-tune "Bruder Martin" (Frere Jacques) in a minor key.

The led off with Haydn's 24th symphony (inD), which places the development b an intense concentration upon one rhythmic and dynamic idea which modulates at a fortissimo level directly into the recapitulation. The same movement, however, decentralizes the power of development by an intense concentration upon one rhythmic and dynamic idea which modulates at a fortissimo level directly into the recapitulation. The same movement, however, decentralizes the power of development by beginning in the recapitulation by fusing development and recapitulation into one, though Haydn still preserves the concept of a binary sonata form.

TARTINI THEMES

Between the two symphomies, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein played Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana," a divertimento for violin and small orchestra,, composed in 1952 on short themes by the 18th-Century violinist-composer Giuseppe Tartini and commissioned by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation. Tartini's thematic material is combined with harmonic and contrapuntal developments drawn and orchestrally colored to scale and perfect fit by Dallapiccola.

Serial methods are used for tonal materials, enhancing the 18th-Century melodicim. The solost played with an eloquent, Elmanesque tone, ably supported by Dr. Leinsdorf and his orchestral colleagues.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 28 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: A SEASONAL HIGHPOINT

The combination of elements necessary to take hold of a performance and send it soaring right up into the sun is an elusive entity. Whatever it may be, it was certainly manifest in Mr. Leinsdorf's rendition of the First Symphony of Mahler, which made last week-end's concert one of the more memorable experiences in some seasons.

For many years I for one had been content to view this piece as just a very good first symphony—a fresh, early declaration that Mahler had arrived or was about to arrive as a major figure in the great line of symphonists but had yet some distance to go. This, of course, was a condescending perception, and it seems perfectly plain now that the First, along perhaps with the Fourth and "Das Lied von der Erde," represents the very pinnacle of Mahler's genius, the full bloom of practically every notion that was subsequently wrought into his symphonies. A top-drawer performance, therefore, was bound to be an experience.

And so it was. Mr. Leinsdorf's affinity for Mahler will turn out to be one of the great legacies of his sojourn here. The hallmark of his approach is now familiar: clarity, proportion, meticulousness of phrasing, strength of line, demonstrated commitment to the score without being perfervid. In this performance he managed to catch just the magical balance between that deliberation required to make the phrases breathe and the spontaneity of release the symphony's enormous vitality.

This was achieved at some risk, for the sentimental second subjects in the slow movement, the scherzo and the finale, respectively, were taken at remarkably slow tempi. Yet they emerged not mawkish but meditative and wholly lovely. The symphony concluded with immense force and grandeur, generating a kind of excitement and emotion that carried over with the audience from the hall right out with them into the streets afterwards.

The Mahler performance tended to overshadow an event with plenty of standing in its own right. This was the first Boston performance of Dallapiccola's Tartiniana, divertimento for violin and orchestra, composed at Tanglewood in 1951. The soloist was concertmaster Joseph Silverstein. The composition consists of themes from four Tartini Sonata movements spliced together with a delicate canonical filegree of twentieth century serial materials. It is scored for a richly orchestrated chamber group. The contrast between the 18th century melodies and the contemporary lacings, together with the instrumental backdrop against the solo violin, made for more than merely effective writing. It was, rather, a composition of considerable inspiration approaching minor genius. Mr. Silverstein handled his assignment with great suavity and aplomb in mediating between the sounds and styles of the two centuries in question.

Opening the concert was yet another first performance here of a Haydn Symphony, this time the 24th in D major. It is a winning little work, with a fine flute concerto adagio for its slow movement. But as with the several other early Haydn symphonies that have been introduced to Boston in recent years, the piquancy of the musical line—usually advanced by one woodwind, was assaulted by the three lower string sections thumping in umpa-pa-pa unison. With all deference, surely there must be some way whereby our symphony string players might achieve some apprehension of the 18th century galante style. Perpetual pianissimos would make for a good beginning.

The orchestra is on tour this week and returns next week, when Julius Rudel, as guest conductor, will present a program of Mozart, Ginastera, Sibelius and Wagner.

59

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

MAR 23 1968 New England Newsclip

SYMPHONY

A Truly Eloquent Program

By McLAREN HARRIS

There is, I believe, nothing equivocal or of partial conviction to say about yesterday's Symphony program given by Erich Leinsdorf. It was musical to the bone, both in material and execution — unstartling but masterfully eloquent.

One could get an idea from the above that it was a program of old favorites. Not entirely. The first local performance was given of "Tartiniana," a divertimento for violin and chamber orchestra by Italian serialist Luigi Dallapiccola, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

Every new experience with Dallapiccola seems to become a revelation. On the surface at least, his music is the most humanly poetic of the serial compositions with which we are most familiar. His lines eschew extreme angularity, often emerging in diatonic phrases; he alludes to conventional harmony though rarely adopts it outright, preserving his flexible position among all key-centers; and his contrapuntal elements, frequently in dissimilar meter and delineated by separate timbres, slip together marvelously.

VIOLIN WORK BRILLIANT

The "Tartiniana," based upon material from Giuseppe Tartini's violin sonatas, transfigures the 18th-century melodic-harmonic idiom into one of exciting metric and rhythmic variety and, if anything, even greater contrapuntal ingenuity. The violin work, via Silverstein, was brilliant, balancing (not dominating) the overall texture. Canonic writing and short-motived imitation is enhanced by transparent orchestration, with its discreet combinations of wind and string (surprisingly, one will notice, like Mahler, also represented on the program).

The orchestra was delicately, yet fully responsive, while Silverstein poured forth virtuosity. Dallapiccola's homage-piece glittered.

Preceding this was Haydn's Symphony in D, No. 24, another expression of Leinsdorf's desire to perform all early Haydn symphonies eventually (if he were to remain long enough). The cheer and polish of the Allegros, the metric decisiveness of the minuet, the sheer dash of the finale are all familiar, welcome characteristics; but the symphony's centerpiece is the Adagio, a delicious cantilena for solo flute, phrased tenderly by Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

LYRIC POETRY

Leinsdorf's utter belief in the music of Mahler is no secret and his ability to communicate it allows for no dispute. The Symphony No. 1 induces an emotional allegiance rather than requiring an analytical understanding. It is even said that Mahler relinquished logic and rhetoric entirely for effect in the finale. But rhetoric, though not ignored, was never the salient feature of his art; his appeal is through lyric poetry, tonal color, harmonic pungence, dynamic climax.

The Symphony's reading bespoke preparation and rewarding willingness on everyone's part. From a premonition-bearing beginning the music moved through a full-throated Scherzo with its languid "Trio," a hauntingly spelled-out funeral march and the cataclysmic finale. Only an anti-Mahlerite would not have had difficulty keeping from coming apart at the seams with latent nervous energy during the final bars.

After two weeks on tour, the orchestra returns on April 12 under Julius Rudel's baton with Mozart's Symphony No. 32 in G, Ginastera's Estudios sinfonicos, the Symphony No. 1 of Sibelius and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting presented the 21st program of the 87th season yesterday at Symphony Hall. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was soloist for the Dallapiccola work.

Symphony No. 24 in D major — Haydn
Tartiniana (1951) — Dallapiccola
Symphony No. 1 in D major — Mahler

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

MAR 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Concertmaster soloist with the B.S.O.

Two works new to the Boston Symphony will be on the orchestra's program Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be soloist in Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana." This will be preceded by Haydn's Symphony No. 24. After intermission will come Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

In concerts Tuesday and Thursday at 8:30, Gary Graffman will play the new Lees Piano Concerto No. 2 and Mendelssohn's Capriccio brilliante. Both programs will begin with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony. Tuesday's concert will include the Prokofiev Symphony No. 2 and Thursday's Beethoven's Fifth.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 138,250

MAR 23 1968 New England Newsclip

Mahler's 1st Symphony Is Presentation of BSO

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Gustav Mahler's first simphony ("The Titan," in D) concluded yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting a sturdy and forward-thrusting performance, uncovering a richness of sentiment, drama and total beauty.

None of Mahler's symphonies conform to the classical pattern, though the first, written when the composer was 28, manages to do so for the first three movements; even the finale is revolutionary in the manner of its length. It is definitely programmatic and its poetic inspiration came from a pastoral romance by Jean-Paul Richter called "Titan."

Mahler

Mahler's rather obscure work is divided into two main segments. The first, called "Days of Youth," contains three movements: "Spring Without End," "A Chapter of Flowers" and "Under Full Sail." The second part, under the general title of "Commedia Umana," covers the fourth and fifth movements: "Hunter's Funeral March" and "Dall' Inferno al Paradiso."

SPIRIT OF YOUTH

The whole symphony breathes the love of nature and spirit of youth, with birdsongs and even the familiar cuckoo-call (in fourths rather than thirds). The scherzo contains the German folk-tune "Bruder Martin" (Frere Jacques) in a minor key.

The led off with Haydn's 24th symphony (inD), which places the development b an intense concentration upon one rhythmic and dynamic idea which modulates at a fortissimo level directly into the recapitulation. The same movement, however, decentralizes the power of development by an intense concentration upon one rhythmic and dynamic idea which modulates at a fortissimo level directly into the recapitulation. The same movement, however, decentralizes the power of development by beginning in the recapitulation by fusing development and recapitulation into one, though Haydn still preserves the concept of a binary sonata form.

TARTINI THEMES

Between the two symphomies, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein played Luigi Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana," a divertimento for violin and small orchestra, composed in 1952 on short themes by the 18th-Century violinist-composer Giuseppe Tartini and commissioned by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation. Tartini's thematic material is combined with harmonic and contrapuntal developments drawn and orchestrally colored to scale and perfect fit by Dallapiccola.

Serial methods are used for tonal materials, enhancing the 18th-Century melodicim. The solost played with an eloquent, Elmanesque tone, ably supported by Dr. Leinsdorf and his orchestral colleagues.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 26,000

MAR 28 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: A SEASONAL HIGHPOINT

The combination of elements necessary to take hold of a performance and send it soaring right up into the sun is an elusive entity. Whatever it may be, it was certainly manifest in Mr. Leinsdorf's rendition of the First Symphony of Mahler, which made last week-end's concert one of the more memorable experiences in some seasons.

For many years I for one had been content to view this piece as just a very good first symphony—a fresh, early declaration that Mahler had arrived or was about to arrive as a major figure in the great line of symphonists but had yet some distance to go. This, of course, was a condescending perception, and it seems perfectly plain now that the First, along perhaps with the Fourth and "Das Lied von der Erde," represents the very pinnacle of Mahler's genius, the full bloom of practically every notion that was subsequently wrought into his symphonies. A top-drawer performance, therefore, was bound to be an experience.

And so it was. Mr. Leinsdorf's affinity for Mahler will turn out to be one of the great legacies of his sojourn here. The hallmark of his approach is now familiar: clarity, proportion, meticulousness of phrasing, strength of line, demonstrated commitment to the score without being perfervid. In this performance he managed to catch just the magical balance between that deliberation required to make the phrases breathe and the spontaneity of release the symphony's enormous vitality.

This was achieved at some risk, for the sentimental second subjects in the slow movement, the scherzo and the finale, respectively, were taken at remarkably slow tempi. Yet they emerged not mawkish but meditative and wholly lovely. The symphony concluded with immense force and grandeur, generating a kind of excitement and emotion that carried over with the audience from the hall right out with them into the streets afterwards.

The Mahler performance tended to overshadow an event with plenty of standing in its own right. This was the first Boston performance of Dallapiccola's Tartiniana, divertimento for violin and orchestra, composed at Tanglewood in 1951. The soloist was concertmaster Joseph Silverstein. The composition consists of themes from four Tartini Sonata movements spliced together with a delicate canonical filegree of twentieth century serial materials. It is scored for a richly orchestrated chamber group. The contrast between the 18th century melodies and the contemporary lacings, together with the instrumental backdrop against the solo violin, made for more than merely effective writing. It was, rather, a composition of considerable inspiration approaching minor genius. Mr. Silverstein handled his assignment with great suavity and aplomb in mediating between the sounds and styles of the two centuries in question.

Opening the concert was yet another first performance here of a Haydn Symphony, this time the 24th in D major. It is a winning little work, with a fine flute concerto adagio for its slow movement. But as with the several other early Haydn symphonies that have been introduced to Boston in recent years, the piquancy of the musical line—usually advanced by one woodwind, was assaulted by the three lower string sections thumping in umpa-pa-pa unison. With all deference, surely there must be some way whereby our symphony string players might achieve some apprehension of the 18th century galante style. Perpetual pianissimos would make for a good beginning.

The orchestra is on tour this week and returns next week, when Julius Rudel, as guest conductor, will present a program of Mozart, Ginastera, Sibelius and Wagner.

211

60 APRIL CAMBRIDGE — VI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Tuesday evening April 9 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

REVISED PROGRAM

GLUCK — Music of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Eurydice'

In memory of Dr Martin Luther King Jr

MOZART — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 14 in E flat K. 449
Allegro vivace
Andantino
Allegro ma non troppo
LILIAN KALLIR

INTERMISSION

MAHLER — Symphony no. 1 in D major (1888)
Langsam: schleppend, wie ein Naturlaut
Kräftig bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell
Feierlich und gemessen, ohne zu schleppen
Stürmisch bewegt

Lilian Kallir plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

APR 1 1968

Leinsdorf Conducts Boston Symphony

By Alan M. Kriegsman

The ovation that followed the performance of Mahler's First Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall Saturday night was overwhelming. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf was recalled to the stage again and again as bravos ricocheted around the hall.

It is disconcerting to feel out in the cold in the face of such a storm of enthusiasm, but in all honesty I was unable to join in the uproar. The music, of course, was glorious, and moving enough on its own account. The sound of the Boston orchestra performing a score of this dimension is irresistibly thrilling. These things got to me. It was Leinsdorf's interpretation to which I couldn't respond. For the most part, it struck me as thick, ponderous and earthbound.

To be sure, there is a thick and even ponderous side to Mahler's symphonic conceptions. But there is more to them than that, certainly in this work, with its song-drenched themes and its buoyant changes of mood and tempo. It was these aspects which I thought Leinsdorf ignored. The lilting Landler of the second movement, for example, just didn't swing. When it came to the lugubrious dirge of the following movement, the conductor seemed to take it at face value, completely overlooking its sardonic leer.

The thundering peroration of the final movement, however, acted like a shot of adrenalin. It spurred Leinsdorf into the most astonishing physical exertions. He gave fierce, lunging cues, shot his arms around in great global sweeps, and all but hurled himself off the podium.

Earlier in the program came a performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 14 in E Flat, K. 449, an extraordinary work that is heard not nearly often enough. The same might be said of the evening's soloist, Lillian Kallir, a pianist whose probing artistry warrants a wider fame than she now enjoys. It is rare to hear Mozart's rhythms projected with such precision and spirit. Just as rare are Miss Kallir's flawlessly even runs and fluent, singing tone.

Leinsdorf, using a sensibly reduced string section, plus the horns and oboes for which the concerto is scored, provided accompaniment that was more respectful than inspired.

The performance of Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude that began the concert passed over some interior details, but was notable for its melodic sweep.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

APR 8 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO changes its program

In observance of the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Erich Leinsdorf has changed the program for the Boston Symphony concert, Tuesday night. The first work will be the Dance of the Blessed Spirits from Gluck's "Orpheus," followed by Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat, K.449, Lilian Kallir, soloist, and the Mahler Symphony No. 1 in D major.

DAY (e)
NEW LONDON, CONN.
CIRC. 34,750

APR 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Dr. King Honored

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra and 2,600 concert patrons bowed their heads and stood silent for one minute Tuesday at the conclusion of a section in tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. 047

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland, Ohio 44115
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

YOUNGSTOWN, VINDICATOR
YOUNGSTOWN, O. 44501
P.M. CIRC. 101,812
SUN. CIRC. 161,859

APR-10-68

Pay Silent Tribute

BOSTON (AP) —The Boston Symphony Orchestra and 2,600 concert patrons bowed their heads and stood silent for one minute Tuesday at the conclusion of a section in tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

60 APRIL CAMBRIDGE – VI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Tuesday evening April 9 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

REVISED PROGRAM

GLUCK — Music of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Eurydice'

In memory of Dr Martin Luther King Jr

MOZART — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 14 in E flat K. 449
Allegro vivace
Andantino
Allegro ma non troppo
LILIAN KALLIR

INTERMISSION

MAHLER — Symphony no. 1 in D major (1888)
Langsam: schleppend, wie ein Naturlaut
Kräftig bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell
Feierlich und gemessen, ohne zu schleppen
Stürmisch bewegt

Lilian Kallir plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

APR 1 1968

Leinsdorf Conducts Boston Symphony

By Alan M. Kriegsman

The ovation that followed the performance of Mahler's First Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall Saturday night was overwhelming. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf was recalled to the stage again and again as bravos ricocheted around the hall.

It is disconcerting to feel out in the cold in the face of such a storm of enthusiasm. but in all honesty I was unable to join in the uproar. The music, of course, was glorious, and moving enough on its own account. The sound of the Boston orchestra performing a score of this dimension is irresistibly thrilling. These things got to me. It was Leinsdorf's interpretation to which I couldn't respond. For the most part, it struck me as thick, ponderous and earthbound.

To be sure, there is a thick and even ponderous side to Mahler's symphonic conceptions. But there is more to them than that, certainly in this work, with its song-drenched themes and its buoyant changes of mood and tempo. It was these aspects which I thought Leinsdorf ignored. The lilting Landler of the second movement, for example, just didn't swing. When it came to the lugubrious dirge of the following movement, the conductor seemed to take it at face value, completely overlooking its sardonic leer.

The thundering peroration of the final movement, however, acted like a shot of adrenalin. It spurred Leinsdorf into the most astonishing physical exertions. He gave fierce, lunging cues, shot his arms around in great global sweeps, and all but hurled himself off the podium.

Earlier in the program came a performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 14 in E Flat, K. 449, an extraordinary work that is heard not nearly often enough. The same might be said of the evening's soloist, Lillian Kallir, a pianist whose probing artistry warrants a wider fame than she now enjoys. It is rare to hear Mozart's rhythms projected with such precision and spirit. Just as rare are Miss Kallir's flawlessly even runs and fluent, singing tone.

Leinsdorf, using a sensibly reduced string section, plus the horns and oboes for which the concerto is scored, provided accompaniment that was more respectful than inspired.

The performance of Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude that began the concert passed over some interior details, but was notable for its melodic sweep.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

APR 8 1968

New England Newsclip

BSO changes its program

In observance of the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Erich Leinsdorf has changed the program for the Boston Symphony concert, Tuesday night. The first work will be the Dance of the Blessed Spirits from Gluck's "Orpheus," followed by Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat, K.449, Lilian Kallir, soloist, and the Mahler Symphony No. 1 in D major.

DAY (e)
NEW LONDON, CONN.
CIRC. 34,750

APR 10 1968

New England Newsclip

Dr. King Honored

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra and 2,600 concert patrons bowed their heads and stood silent for one minute Tuesday at the conclusion of a section in tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland, Ohio 44115
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

YOUNGSTOWN, VINDICATOR
YOUNGSTOWN, O. 44501
P.M. CIRC. 101,812
SUN. CIRC. 161,859

APR 10-68

Pay Silent Tribute

BOSTON (AP) —The Boston Symphony Orchestra and 2,600 concert patrons bowed their heads and stood silent for one minute Tuesday at the conclusion of a section in tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

FRI-SAT XXIII

61

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-second Program
Friday afternoon April 12 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 13 at 8.30

JULIUS RUDEL guest conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 32 in G major K. 318
Allegro spiritoso – andante – allegro spiritoso

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

GINASTERA — Estudios sinfónicos op. 35
1. For the festive mood (fanfare for the Centennial year)
2. For winged motions
3. For densities
4. On a single note
5. For aleatory structures
6. For microtonal complexes
7. For the elegiac mood
8. For strange sonorities
9. For the virtuoso orchestra

First performance in the United States

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 1 in E minor op. 39
Andante ma non troppo – allegro energico
Andante ma non troppo lento
Allegro
Finale (quasi una fantasia): andante – allegro molto

WAGNER — Rienzi – Overture

The concert will end at about 3.45 on Friday
and at about 10.15 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1355

Fri-Sat-XXII

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400
APR 15 1968
New England Newsclip

BSO plays Ginastera's 'Estudios Sinfónicos'

By Clifford Barnes

Julius Rudel introduced Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios Sinfónicos" to Boston at Symphony Hall over the weekend—only two weeks after its world première in Toronto. The guest conductor in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra wisely chose to present another work by this Argentine composer whose operas ("Don Rodrigo" and "Bomarzo") have put him very much in the musical spotlight during the last two years.

At their first performance in the United States, these Symphonic Etudes proved to be the most interesting contemporary composition for orchestra played this season. Not only are they successful experiments in the compositional techniques specified by the titles of the nine "studies," more importantly they communicate worthwhile musical expressions.

Space Odyssey

Interest is piqued by fascinating orchestral timbres, changing dynamic levels, and uncommon rhythmic combinations. Clever bits of orchestration evoked chuckles from the audience. The mechanics of conducting and playing the score kept the listener's eyes fastened on the stage. As usual in music of this nature, the percussionists are busier than the other sections of the orchestra.

Sometimes the program notes are more interesting than what reaches the ears, but not in the performance of this music of the spheres. Tonal clusters fixed in space, a-rhythmic sounds, almost inaudible sonorities, microtonality (five possibilities of the note D which represents the moon), controlled aleatory form, halluciant surrealism, and velocissimamente (extremely fast for virtuoso orchestra) are apt descriptions of way-out music that takes you along without much persuasion.

The musicians had spent time with the score, and the conductor had everything under his finger-tips. His creation of the aleatoric (chance) crescendo and diminuendo specified for the fifth study was brought about by holding up cards numbered from one to eleven in a random order that he controlled. These told the instrumentalists when and what to play. Ginastera has written a work that invites re-hearings.

The Sibelius Symphony No. 1 needed more rehearsal before Friday afternoon's performance. Balance and blend were often lacking. Some rhythms were imprecise, particularly at the beginning of the second movement. Many of the subtleties in the score, such as they are, were passed by too quickly.

The BSO gave the American première of this symphony in 1907, but its revival after 15 years only gave it a fair chance of rehearing. Still this lush romanticism cooled by the northern lights provided a sample of an important part of today's orchestral repertoire under the baton of Mr. Rudel. He was just as at home here as in the more impersonal Ginastera.

The overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi" is the kind of music the BSO plays exceedingly well, without really trying. It told the audience nothing new about the conductor nor the orchestra. The short Mozart Symphony No. 32 provided at best a glimpse of classical charm. It is really an overture in the Italian style: one movement in three sections — fast, slow, fast.

For a work so seldom heard, it was unusual to have it played twice in the same week. The Boston Philharmonia chose it to open its debut concert last Monday. Friday was the first performance by the BSO. It was quite a jolt to be rocketed from the Mozartean chamber orchestra into the world of Ginastera.

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150
APR 21 1968
New England Newsclip

A Note on Alberto Ginastera

Last Tuesday night's Boston Symphony concert, with Julius Rudel as guest conductor, was unusually well played and featured Mozart's very brief but charming "Symphony No. 32," Sibelius' "Symphony No. 1," Wagner's "Rienzi Overture," and Alberto Ginastera's "Estudias Sinfonicos" in its first American performance.

Naturally, the Ginastera work was the one I was most curious about inasmuch as this Argentine composer has been much in the news lately his opera, "Bomarzo," and for the American debut not long ago of his "Piano Concerto."

Much of "Estudias Sinfonicos" is an assault on one's ears since Ginastera, using a series of clusters, really calls upon almost every instrument in the orchestra to blare forth with shattering fortissimo. However, there is also much of musical interest in the nine sections of the work. The Elegy, in particular, and the concluding section, "For the Virtuoso Orchestra" produce unusual sounds that are almost hallucinatory in nature, emanating from skillful use of the 12-tone scale and utilizing microtonal and serial techniques. Moreover, there are occasional flashes of humor, notably in "For Winged Motions" and a contagious sense of delight as Ginastera skillfully builds the entire work on three chords, two formed by six different tones and one of 12 tones.

I do not think that the work is likely to become one of my all-time favorites and I am not anxious to hear it again very soon, but I do respect the composer's craftsmanship and his originality, especially in his unhackneyed orchestration.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850
APR 17 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Shows Brilliance in Series Finale

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Vienna-born Julius Rudel, general director of the New York City Opera, was guest conductor last night for the concluding program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series. With an eye for commendable musical variety, Rudel chose works by Mozart, Sibelius, Alberto Ginastera, and Wagner.

Opening the enjoyable concert was Mozart's "Symphony No. 32 in G Major, K. 338," which, surprisingly enough, was being given its first performance by the orchestra. Really a symphony in miniature (it takes no longer to play than the average overture), it is lively, gay and lucid in both form and content.

Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios Sinfonicos," the next selection, marked the first performance of this work in the United States. Ginastera, the contemporary Argentine composer, has been much in the news of late because of the publicity given to his opera "Bomarzo" and also to the recent performance in Boston of his "Piano Concerto."

"Estudios Sinfonicos" is obviously the work of a sharp musical mind, most of its unusual sonorities and occasional flashes of humor emanating from the composer's utilization of the 12-tone scale and serial and microtonal techniques. In nine parts, the work is notable especially for a remarkable Elegy and for a conclusion that tests the virtuosity of the orchestra—a test that Rudel and his musicians passed with flying colors.

After intermission, the orchestra offered Sibelius 'Symphony No. 1 in E Minor" and Wagner's "Rienzi Overture."

The Sibelius (composed in 1899) is, of course, perhaps the last great symphony in the old romantic tradition—and one of the best first symphonies in musical history. It is marked by dark tonal colors, long pedal points, wailing strings and snarling brass, and occasional overtones of Tschaikovsky and Borodin.

However, in it Sibelius is his own man, already demonstrating what might be called the Northern flavor that is his hallmark. The work was performed with power, with passion, and with that lush tone quality especially in the glorious Finale, that the Boston Symphony can so often produce.

As for the Wagner, it, too, was brilliantly played, its climaxes rising surely, certainly, and effectively. Although it has a certain Meyerbeerian grandiosity that has perhaps become somewhat old hat, the work can, in capable hands, still appeal. Last night's performance was, indeed, in capable hands.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350
APR 6 1968
New England Newsclip

Julius Rudel, general director of the New York City Opera company, will be the guest conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of Friday and Saturday, April 12-13. This will mark the first appearance of the conductor with the Boston Symphony. He will conduct the United States premiere of Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios Sinfonicos" and the first performance in 15 years by the Orchestra of Sibelius' Symphony No. 1. Also included in Mr. Rudel's program are the Symphony No. 32 by Mozart and the Overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi."

FRI-SAT XXIII

61

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-second Program

Friday afternoon April 12 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 13 at 8.30

JULIUS RUDEL guest conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 32 in G major K. 318
Allegro spiritoso – andante – allegro spiritoso

First performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

GINASTERA — Estudios sinfónicos op. 35

1. For the festive mood (fanfare for the Centennial year)
2. For winged motions
3. For densities
4. On a single note
5. For aleatory structures
6. For microtonal complexes
7. For the elegiac mood
8. For strange sonorities
9. For the virtuoso orchestra

First performance in the United States

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 1 in E minor op. 39
Andante ma non troppo – allegro energico
Andante ma non troppo lento
Allegro
Finale (quasi una fantasia): andante – allegro molto

WAGNER — Rienzi – Overture

The concert will end at about 3.45 on Friday
and at about 10.15 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1355

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400
APR 15 1968
New England Newsclip

BSO plays Ginastera's 'Estudios Sinfónicos'

By Clifford Barnes

Julius Rudel introduced Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios Sinfónicos" to Boston at Symphony Hall over the weekend—only two weeks after its world première in Toronto. The guest conductor in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra wisely chose to present another work by this Argentine composer whose operas ("Don Rodrigo" and "Bomarzo") have put him very much in the musical spotlight during the last two years.

At their first performance in the United States, these Symphonic Etudes proved to be the most interesting contemporary composition for orchestra played this season. Not only are they successful experiments in the compositional techniques specified by the titles of the nine "studies," more importantly they communicate worthwhile musical expressions.

Space Odyssey

Interest is piqued by fascinating orchestral timbres, changing dynamic levels, and uncommon rhythmic combinations. Clever bits of orchestration evoked chuckles from the audience. The mechanics of conducting and playing the score kept the listener's eyes fastened on the stage. As usual in music of this nature, the percussionists are busier than the other sections of the orchestra.

Sometimes the program notes are more interesting than what reaches the ears, but not in the performance of this music of the spheres. Tonal clusters fixed in space, a-rhythmic sounds, almost inaudible sonorities, microtonality (five possibilities of the note D which represents the moon), controlled aleatory form, halluciant surrealism, and velocissimamente (extremely fast for virtuoso orchestra) are apt descriptions of way-out music that takes you along without much persuasion.

The musicians had spent time with the score, and the conductor had everything under his finger-tips. His creation of the aleatoric (chance) crescendo and diminuendo specified for the fifth study was brought about by holding up cards numbered from one to eleven in a random order that he controlled. These told the instrumentalists when and what to play. Ginastera has written a work that invites re-hearings.

The Sibelius Symphony No. 1 needed more rehearsal before Friday afternoon's performance. Balance and blend were often lacking. Some rhythms were imprecise, particularly at the beginning of the second movement. Many of the subtleties in the score, such as they are, were passed by too quickly.

The BSO gave the American première of this symphony in 1907, but its revival after 15 years only gave it a fair chance of re-hearing. Still this lush romanticism cooled by the northern lights provided a sample of an important part of today's orchestral repertoire under the baton of Mr. Rudel. He was just as at home here as in the more impersonal Ginastera.

The overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi" is the kind of music the BSO plays exceedingly well, without really trying. It told the audience nothing new about the conductor nor the orchestra. The short Mozart Symphony No. 32 provided at best a glimpse of classical charm. It is really an overture in the Italian style: one movement in three sections — fast, slow, fast.

For a work so seldom heard, it was unusual to have it played twice in the same week. The Boston Philharmonia chose it to open its debut concert last Monday. Friday was the first performance by the BSO. It was quite a jolt to be rocketed from the Mozartean chamber orchestra into the world of Ginastera.

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150
APR 21 1968
New England Newsclip

A Note on Alberto Ginastera

Last Tuesday night's Boston Symphony concert, with Julius Rudel as guest conductor, was unusually well played and featured Mozart's very brief but charming "Symphony No. 32," Sibelius' "Symphony No. 1," Wagner's "Rienzi Overture," and Alberto Ginastera's "Estudias Sinfonicos' in its first American performance.

Naturally, the Ginastera work was the one I was most curious about inasmuch as this Argentine composer has been much in the news lately his opera, "Bomarzo," and for the American debut not long ago of his "Piano Concerto."

Much of "Estudias Sinfonicos" is an assault on one's ears since Ginastera, using a series of clusters, really calls upon almost every instrument in the orchestra to blare forth with shattering fortissimo. However, there is also much of musical interest in the nine sections of the work. The Elegy, in particular, and the concluding section, "For the Virtuoso Orchestra" produce unusual sounds that are almost hallucinatory in nature, emanating from skillful use of the 12-tone scalé and utilizing microtonal and serial techniques. Moreover, there are occasional flashes of humor, notably in "For Winged Motions" and a contagious sense of delight as Ginastera skillfully builds the entire work on three chords, two formed by six different tones and one of 12 tones.

I do not think that the work is likely to become one of my all-time favorites and I am not anxious to hear it again very soon, but I do respect the composer's craftsmanship and his originality, especially in his unhackneyed orchestration.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850
APR 17 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Shows Brilliance in Series Finale

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Vienna-born Julius Rudel, general director of the New York City Opera, was guest conductor last night for the concluding program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series. With an eye for commendable musical variety, Rudel chose works by Mozart, Sibelius, Alberto Ginastera, and Wagner.

Opening the enjoyable concert was Mozart's "Symphony No. 32 in G Major, K. 338," which, surprisingly enough, was being given its first performance by the orchestra. Really a symphony in miniature (it takes no longer to play than the average overture), it is lively, gay and lucid in both form and content.

Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios Sinfonicos," the next selection, marked the first performance of this work in the United States. Ginastera, the contemporary Argentine composer, has been much in the news of late because of the publicity given to his opera "Bomarzo" and also to the recent performance in Boston of his "Piano Concerto."

"Estudios Sinfonicos" is obviously the work of a sharp musical mind, most of its unusual sonorities and occasional flashes of humor emanating from the composer's utilization of the 12-tone scale and serial and microtonal techniques. In nine parts, the work is notable especially for a remarkable Elegy and for a conclusion that tests the virtuosity of the orchestra—a test that Rudel and his musicians passed with flying colors.

After intermission, the orchestra offered Sibelius 'Symphony No. 1 in E Minor" and Wagner's "Rienzi Overture."

The Sibelius (composed in 1899) is, of course, perhaps the last great symphony in the old romantic tradition—and one of the best first symphonies in musical history. It is marked by dark tonal colors, long pedal points, wailing strings and snarling brass, and occasional overtones of Tschaikovsky and Borodin.

However, in it Sibelius is his own man, already demonstrating what might be called the Northern flavor that is his hallmark. The work was performed with power, with passion, and with that lush tone quality especially in the glorious Finale, that the Boston Symphony can so often produce.

As for the Wagner, it, too, was brilliantly played, its climaxes rising surely, certainly, and effectively. Although it has a certain Meyerbeerian grandiosity that has perhaps become somewhat old hat, the work can, in capable hands, still appeal. Last night's performance was, indeed, in capable hands.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350
APR 6 1968
New England Newsclip

Julius Rudel, general director of the New York City Opera company, will be the guest conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of Friday and Saturday, April 12-13. This will mark the first appearance of the conductor with the Boston Symphony. He will conduct the United States premiere of Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios Sinfonicos" and the first performance in 15 years by the Orchestra of Sibelius' Symphony No. 1. Also included in Mr. Rudel's program are the Symphony No. 32 by Mozart and the Overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi."

62.

TUES B - VI / THURS A - VI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Tuesday evening April 16 at 7.30

JULIUS RUDEL guest conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 32 in G major K. 318
Allegro spiritoso – andante – allegro spiritoso

GINASTERA — Estudios sinfónicos op. 35
1. For the festive mood (fanfare for the Centennial year)
2. For winged motions
3. For densities
4. On a single note
5. For aleatory structures
6. For microtonal complexes
7. For the elegiac mood
8. For strange sonorities
9. For the virtuoso orchestra

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 1 in E minor op. 39
Andante ma non troppo – allegro energico
Andante ma non troppo lento
Allegro
Finale (quasi una fantasia): andante – allegro molto

WAGNER — Rienzi,– Overture

Tues B – VI

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Thursday evening April 18 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Fidelio – Overture

MOZART — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 14 in E flat K. 449
Allegro vivace
Andantino
Allegro ma non troppo
LILIAN KALLIR

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS — Also sprach Zarathustra, symphonic poem op. 30

STRAUSS — Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier'

Lilian Kallir plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Thurs A – VI

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

APR 13 1968

New England Newsclip

Symphony marks a non-observance

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The most noteworthy thing about Friday's Boston Symphony concert was, in fact, a non-thing: a program chosen in studied non-observance of its being Good Friday, something altogether unusual in American orchestral practice.

It was a drably inconsequential concert. To be sure, there was the first American performance of Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios sinfonicos," written last year for Vancouver and the Canadian Centennial, but it proved to be only the mixture as before, that is, Ginastera's usual scrambling together of effects without causes, the kaleidoscopic reminiscences one expects by now from this widely-read anthologizer, all of it done with his usual cosmetic expertness.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Julius Rudel conducting Mozart: Symphony No. 32 in G, K.318; Ginastera: Estudios sinfonicos, Op. 35 (first U.S. performance); Sibelius: Symphony No.1 in E minor, Op.39; Wagner: Rienzi Overture. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

In Mozart's G major symphony, the Sibelius 1st, and the "Rienzi" Overture, Julius Rudel proved to be something of a beat-clipper and, in general, as dull a guest conductor as I have heard with the Boston Symphony. The orchestral playing was at best undistinguished, and there were moments in the Sibelius when it was richly disgraceful.

Diane White's Hobbledehoy column, on the Globe's Women's Pages, is tuned in to what's happening in Boston's mad, mod scene. You can have the Globe home delivered immediately by calling 288-8000.

Sun
Lowell MAC
April 6 1968

Next Tuesday evening, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the BSO will close the Orchestra's "Cambridge" series in Symphony hall. Lillian Kallir will be the soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K 449. This concert will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and include two works by Richard Strauss, also Sprach Zarathustra and an orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." The next progrm in the open rehearsal series will be held next Thursday evening at 7:30 p. m.

62

TUES B - VI / THURS A - VI

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Tuesday evening April 16 at 7.30

JULIUS RUDEL guest conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 32 in G major K. 318
Allegro spiritoso – andante – allegro spiritoso

GINASTERA — Estudios sinfónicos op. 35
1. For the festive mood (fanfare for the Centennial year)
2. For winged motions
3. For densities
4. On a single note
5. For aleatory structures
6. For microtonal complexes
7. For the elegiac mood
8. For strange sonorities
9. For the virtuoso orchestra

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 1 in E minor op. 39
Andante ma non troppo – allegro energico
Andante ma non troppo lento
Allegro
Finale (quasi una fantasia): andante – allegro molto

WAGNER — Rienzi – Overture

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Sixth Program
Thursday evening April 18 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Fidelio – Overture

MOZART — Concerto for piano and orchestra no. 14 in E flat K. 449
Allegro vivace
Andantino
Allegro ma non troppo
LILIAN KALLIR

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS — Also sprach Zarathustra, symphonic poem op. 30

STRAUSS — Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier'

Lilian Kallir plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

APR 13 1968

New England Newsclip

Symphony marks a non-observance

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The most noteworthy thing about Friday's Boston Symphony concert was, in fact, a non-thing: a program chosen in studied non-observance of its being Good Friday, something altogether unusual in American orchestral practice.

It was a drably inconsequential concert. To be sure, there was the first American performance of Alberto Ginastera's "Estudios sinfonicos," written last year for Vancouver and the Canadian Centennial, but it proved to be only the mixture as before, that is, Ginastera's usual scrambling together of effects without causes, the kaleidoscopic reminiscences one expects by now from this widely-read anthologizer, all of it done with his usual cosmetic expertness.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Julius Rudel conducting Mozart: Symphony No. 32 in G. K.318; Ginastera: Estudios sinfonicos, Op. 35 (first U.S. performance); Sibelius: Symphony No.1 in E minor, Op.39; Wagner: Rienzi Overture, Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

In Mozart's G major symphony, the Sibelius 1st, and the "Rienzi" Overture, Julius Rudel proved to be something of a beat-clipper and, in general, as dull a guest conductor as I have heard with the Boston Symphony. The orchestral playing was at best undistinguished, and there were moments in the Sibelius when it was richly disgraceful.

Diane White's Hobbledehoy column, on the Globe's Women's Pages, is tuned in to what's happening in Boston's mad, mod scene. You can have the Globe home delivered immediately by calling 288-8000.

Next Tuesday evening, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the BSO will close the Orchestra's "Cambridge" series in Symphony hall. Lillian Kallir will be the soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K 449. This concert will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and include two works by Richard Strauss, also Sprach Zarathustra and an orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." The next progrm in the open rehearsal series will be held next Thursday evening at 7:30 p. m.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIR. 4[illegible],250

APR 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Julius Rudel Leads BSO In Brilliant Concert

(By ROLFE BOSWELL)—Julius Rudel, general director of the New York City Opera, was the Boston Symphony's guest conductor yesterday afternoon. His featured presentation was the first symphony (Op. 39, in E minor) of Jan Sibelius.

The first movement opens strangely, with a melancholy clarinet over a timpani tremolo. The allegro is like a great, heroic ballad. Themes are dry and powerful, but always shaded by climaxes. There are melancholy undertones even in the greatest climaxes.

Julius Rudel

It still ranks as among the very great works in the 19th century romantic tradition, but the guest conductor's readiing was still rushed in its climatic moments.

Curtain-raiser was Mozart's genial and pellucid 32d symphony KV-318, in G), scarcely more than an overture, but full of gay, symphonic allure. It was a decided credit to both guest conductor and orchestra. This was, believe it or not, a first BSO performance.

There followed the United States premier of Alberto Ginastera's "Estudias Sinfonicos" (Op. 35), an Argentine-flavored, subjectively intense study, with elements of nonobjective naturalization, stemming from the twelve-tone system. It was worthy of rehearing—though not too soon, perhaps.

The concert was concluded by the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" (1842), a great piece of introductory music in which the three themes of the opera are elaborated. The music is characterized by its gripping swing and the climaxes are breath-taking.

The master dramatist is emphasized in every bar. The freshness and tempo of Rudel's treatment drew not only interesting but satisfying effects. His tempi were well-chosen and the rich, plushy distinction of the orchestra were thoroughly satisfactory.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

APR 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Rudel guest conductor of B.S.O.

Julius Rudel will conduct the Boston Symphony for the first time this week. His program Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 will include the American premiere of Alberto Ginastera's Estudios Sinfonicos.

General director of the New York City Opera, Rudel has conducted the world and New York premieres of Ginastera's opera, "Bomarzo." Also on his Boston program will be Mozart's Symphony No. 32, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 and Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra's Tuesday evening concert. Lilian Kallir will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 449. The concert will begin with Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture. After intermission, two Strauss works will be heard, "Also sprach Zarathustra" and an orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

Final preparation for the Rudel program will come at an open rehearsal Thursday at 7:30.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

APR 13 1968 New England Newsclip

SATURDAY, APRIL 1[illegible]

Symphony

Orchestra Gets A New Sound

By McLAREN HARRIS

Julius Rudel and the Boston Symphony gave the first United States performance yesterday of Alberto Ginastera's Estudios sinfonicos, Op. 35, which, for an appropriate subtitle, could be called "A Twentieth Century Treatise on Instrumentation."

Ginastera's nine studies are, on the surface, explorations of sound, of instrumental combinations, of technique, of timbral-harmonic relations, of simulated reverberation. They enjoy a large, conventionally-outfitted orchestra (save for the great variety of percussion), and the composer makes use of his forces at all degrees of strength, from the wispiest of string or percussion whispers to shattering outbursts of the entire conclave.

PYRAMIDS OF HARMONY

An essentially vertical approach builds various-size pyramids of close harmonies, often of half-steps and, in some sections, microtones. The fourth study is devoted to a single note, D, with allowances as far as the half-steps on either side and all quarter-tones in between. Other sections contrast instrumental groupings for density, ripple with agile, fleeting motives in woodwinds and strings, introduce unusual percussive effects for nearly all the instruments. As a whole, the studies comprise a virtual encyclopedia of usage.

But a treatise of demonstration is not all Ginastera's work represents. The nine stdies have individual form, usually detectable in the rounded dynamic schemes, and together form a sort of chiastic structure, not unlike that of Bach's cantatas. The opening fanfare corresponds to the energetic finale and the fifth study, a "controlled-aleatoric" succession of varying instrumental passages combined partly at the well of the conductor stands as the keystone of the symmetry. Certain of the atmospheres have emotional overtones as well—the festive attitude of the fanfare or the hushed solemnity of the "elegiac" study.

The reaction to Ginasterais Estudios was nearly as remarkable as the work itself. The Friday Symphony audience, occasionally scorned for its staunch conservatism, was fascinated by Ginastera's products and seemed to await each new combination with anticipation. I am not saying that everything was endorsed or even appreciated; Ginastera's reception was not extraordinary. Yet there was interest, perhaps wonderment, at the depth of his imagination. This may turn out to be an accurate appraisal—that whether or not the Estudios ever becomes a repertory piece, it demands to be heard.

REPEAT PERFORMANCE

The program opened with Mozart's Symphony No. 32 in G major, K. 318, and a few people probably gulped when they discovered it. In the face of all assurances given at the founding of the Boston Philharmonia that the new orchestra was to complement, not compete with, the Symphony, that same work appeared — coincidentaly, of course—on the Philharmonia's first program last Monday, I don't mean to feed fires of competition, but even though Rudel's interpretation was not what one could call heavy, I think I prefer No. 32 with fewer numbers.

Rudel also gave the Symphony audience its first Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in 15 years, and a very sympathetic reading it was. The conductor is not inclined to hurry things at all, dwelling upon Sibelius' rhapsodic lyricism and darkling harmonies with tender care. Unfortunately the players were not so blended in purpose or alike in intonation to make a fully-emotional impact, with dragging feet or weak tones in the winds, protruding timpani during the Scherzo. I am glad to have it back, however, for Sibelius' music can be a welcome (somehow enduring, for all its supposed antiquity) commodity.

Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" concluded. By strange happening this was one of the first works I ever learned, and thus every note is familiar, notwithstanding "Rienzi's" obscurity. From the first note of the trumpet it progressed well until the triangle went off almost like an alarm clock, heightening its air of slight ludicrousness near the finish.

Next week, Mr. Leinsdorf returns to conduct Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde," Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphony No. 2, Karel Husa's Mosaiques pour orchestra and Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite.

64

PRI-SAT ~~XXIII~~ / TUES A - X

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-third Program

Friday afternoon April 19 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 20 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

SCHUBERT	Incidental music to 'Rosamunde' op. 26 Ballet – entr'acte after Act I
RIMSKY-KORSAKOV	Symphony no. 2 'Antar' op. 15 Largo – allegretto vivace Allegro Allegro risoluto alla marcia Allegretto vivace – andante amoroso

INTERMISSION

HUSA	Mosaïques pour orchestre

First performance in Boston

PROKOFIEV	Lieutenant Kije, symphonic suite op. 60 Birth of Kije Romance Kije's wedding Troika Burial of Kije

DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone

Fri - Sat - XXIII

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1419

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Tenth Program

Tuesday evening April 23 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER	Tristan und Isolde – Prelude
STRAUSS	Also sprach Zarathustra, symphonic poem op. 30

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN	Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67 Allegro con brio Andante con moto Allegro – allegro

Tues A - X

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

11

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

APR 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony lists programs for the week

The Boston Symphony's concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 will include the first Boston performances of Mosaics for Orchestra by Karel Husa, who teaches at Cornell.

The program also lists Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije" Suite, with baritone David Clatworthy singing the Russian texts.

The first half of the program will be Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphony No. 2, "Antar." Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Tuesday at 7:30 Julius Rudel will conclude his guest engagement. He will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 32, Ginastera's Estudios Sinfonicos, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 and Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture.

Leinsdorf's program Thursday at 8:30 will consist of Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 449, with Lilian Kallir as soloist, and two works by Strauss, "Also sprach Zarathustra" and an orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

APR 14 1968 New England Newsclip

David Clatworthy to Sing With Boston Smyphony

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 23rd pair of Friday-Saturday concerts Erich Leinsdorf has invited baritone David Clatworthy to take part in a performance of Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite. Mr. Clatworthy has previously performed this work with the orchestra at Tanglewood and again will sing the role in Russian.

Mr. Leinsdorf has also programmed Mosaiques pour orchestra by Karel Husa, a member of the music faculty of Cornell University. These will be the first performances by the orchestra of Mr. Husa's music. The Friday-Saturday concerts will also include ballet music and extracts from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Symphony No. 2, "Antar," by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Great conductor Julius Rudel will direct the final Tuesday Series B concert at 7:30. His program consists of Mozart's Symphony No. 32; Estudios Sinfinicos by Ginastera; Sibelius' Symphony No. 1; and the Overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi."

Thursday evening Mr. Leinsdorf will close the Thursday Series A concerts with Lilian Kallir as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 499. The program will begin with the Overture to "Fidelio" by Beethoven and include two works by Richard Strauss — "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400

APR 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Baritone Invited To Join Symphony

Boston Symphony Director Erich Leinsdorf has invited David Clatsworthy, baritone, to take part in Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite at 2 and 8:30 p. m. Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall This is a role he sang previously at Tanglewood.

Also programmed is a first Boston Symphony performance of Mosaiques pour Orchestra by Karel Husa, a member of the music faculty of Cornell University.

64

PRI-SAT XXIII / TUES A - X

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-third Program

Friday afternoon April 19 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 20 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

SCHUBERT — Incidental music to 'Rosamunde' op. 26
Ballet – entr'acte after Act I

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Symphony no. 2 'Antar' op. 15
Largo – allegretto vivace
Allegro
Allegro risoluto alla marcia
Allegretto vivace – andante amoroso

INTERMISSION

HUSA — Mosaïques pour orchestre
First performance in Boston

PROKOFIEV — Lieutenant Kije, symphonic suite op. 60
Birth of Kije
Romance
Kije's wedding
Troika
Burial of Kije

DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone

The concert will end at about 3.55 on Friday and at about 10.25 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Tenth Program

Tuesday evening April 23 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WAGNER — Tristan und Isolde – Prelude

STRAUSS — Also sprach Zarathustra, symphonic poem op. 30

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 5 in C minor op. 67
Allegro con brio
Andante con moto
Allegro – allegro

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

APR 14 1968 New England Newsclip

David Clatworthy to Sing With Boston Smyphony

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 23rd pair of Friday-Saturday concerts Erich Leinsdorf has invited baritone David Clatworthy to take part in a performance of Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite. Mr. Clatworthy has previously performed this work with the orchestra at Tanglewood and again will sing the role in Russian.

Mr. Leinsdorf has also programmed Mosaiques pour orchestra by Karel Husa, a member of the music faculty of Cornell University. These will be the first performances by the orchestra of Mr. Husa's music. The Friday-Saturday concerts will also include ballet music and extracts from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Symphony No. 2, "Antar," by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Great conductor Julius Rudel will direct the final Tuesday Series B concert at 7:30. His program consists of Mozart's Symphony No. 32; Estudios Sinfinicos by Ginastera; Sibelius' Symphony No. 1; and the Overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi."

Thursday evening Mr. Leinsdorf will close the Thursday Series A concerts with Lilian Kallir as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K 499. The program will begin with the Overture to "Fidelio" by Beethoven and include two works by Richard Strauss. — "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

APR 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony lists programs for the week

The Boston Symphony's concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 will include the first Boston performances of Mosaics for Orchestra by Karel Husa, who teaches at Cornell.

The program also lists Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije" Suite, with baritone David Clatworthy singing the Russian texts.

The first half of the program will be Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphony No. 2, "Antar." Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Tuesday at 7:30 Julius Rudel will conclude his guest engagement. He will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 32, Ginastera's Estudios Sinfonicos, Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 and Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture.

Leinsdorf's program Thursday at 8:30 will consist of Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 449, with Lilian Kallir as soloist, and two works by Strauss, "Also sprach Zarathustra" and an orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400

APR 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Baritone Invited To Join Symphony

Boston Symphony Director Erich Leinsdorf has invited David Clatsworthy, baritone, to take part in Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite at 2 and 8:30 p. m. Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall This is a role he sang previously at Tanglewood.

Also programmed is a first Boston Symphony performance of Mosaiques pour Orchestra by Karel Husa, a member of the music faculty of Cornell University.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 254,100

APR 20 1968

New England Newsclip

The ARTS

Husa's composition provides Symphony concert treat

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Karel Husa, whose "Mosaiques pour orchestre" Erich Leinsdorf conducted at Friday's Boston Symphony concert, is a 46-year-old composer of Czech birth, who has been on the faculty of Cornell University since 1954, and who has, as well, the reputation of being an outstandingly able conductor.

He certainly is a good composer. "Mosaiques" dates from 1961; its five sections take about 15 minutes. It begins with a study in bell-like percussive sounds, followed by a legato piece for strings, touched lightly by sonorities of the first movement. Then comes something of scherzo-like character with woodwinds dominating. The full orchestra enters with the fourth part, which is tremendously energetic, ferocious in spirit, and which seems, though I think it is not actually, the biggest movement. In the finale, the full orchestra is used in chamber-musical fashion, returning to the slow tempo of the opening movements, and bringing back some of their gestures and material.

I infer from the composer's notes that, while he did not intend to write program music, he has no objections to extra-musical responses, to his taking the first three "mosaiques" as portraits of Prague, nor to his feeling that the last two "could be a picture of tragedy and . . . the succeeding moment of quiet."

The genre is that invented early in the century in Schoenberg's Five Pieces and Webern's Six, and still alive today in a piece like Schuller's "Triplum" (with Ginastera's "Estudios sinfonicos," which the Symphony played last week, a false imitation), a genre that within a non-standard formal schema is concerned with evocation of atmosphere and with virtuosic, and if possible original, writing for orchestra.

I do not, in "Mosaiques," hear a voice so individual that I feel sure of recognizing it again in another work of Husa's. But even if he speaks in the common language, or one of them, of mid-20th century music, he has used that language to say something fresh. "Mosaiques" sounds like a new piece. It is interesting and consistently worked, and it is scored with unostentatious, ungimmicky originality, beauty and effectiveness. It is a communicative piece, a valuable addition to orchestral repertory, and I very much hope we may some time have Husa's "Serenade," which was extremely well spoken of when it was introduced in Baltimore some years ago.

Erich Leinsdorf played Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" Symphony, a quasi-novelty at least insofar as it has not been done by the Boston Symphony since 1919 under Rabaud. It sounds like a low-pressure imitation of "Sheherazade," which it actually precedes by 20 years, is rather pretty, and a little bit boring. Perhaps a less bridled performance would make a better case for it.

Here, in the excerpt from Schubert's "Rosamunde," and in Prokofiev's "Lieutenant Kije" music, in which the baritone David Clatworthy was an excellent soloist, the conducting was sensible in its ideas, but without much energy or sharp rhythm. The Husa performance was certainly good enough to be very effective, but the orchestra is going to have to relearn how to make a real pianissimo if it is ever going to do justice to that kind of contemporary music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Schubert: Ballet-entr'acte after Act 1 of "Rosamunde:" Rimsky-Korsakov: Symphony No. 2, "Antar;" Husa, "Mosaiques pour orchestre;" Prokofiev: "Lieutenant Kije," symphonic suite, with David Clatworthy, baritone. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

APR 13 1968

New England Newsclip

Music

String Quartet To Play At Andover

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—William B. Clift, Jr., chairman of the department of music at Philips Academy, Andover, has announced that the Bennington String Quartet will present a program of chamber music tomorrow afternoon, at 3 in the Underwood Room of the Arts and Communication Center.

Members of the ensemble are Eric Rosenblith, first violinist; Robert Zimmer, second violinist; Jacob Glick, violist, and George Finckel, cellist. Their program will include, Quartet, Opus 33, No. 3 (Beethoven), and Quartet, (Haydn); Quartet, Opus 65 Opus in D Major (Debussy).

Erich Leinsdorf

The public is invited to attend and admission is free.

The 23rd pair of Friday and Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be played next week. Conducting will be the Orchestra's musical director, Erich Leinsdorf, and invited as guest artist will be David Clatworthy, baritone, who will essay vocal solo passages in Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite. Mr. Clatworthy has previously performed this work with the Orchestra at Tanglewood, and as on that occasion, will sing the part in Russian. On Thursday evening, (April 18), Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the final event in the Thursday series, and appearing as soloist will be pianist Lilian Kallir, who will perform Mozart's Piano Concerto, K 499.

The music of Karel Husa, a member of the music department faculty at Cornell University, will be heard in the Friday and Saturday programs. Featured will be Mosaiques pour orchestra. This will be the first time the Boston Orchestra has played music by this composer.

Gunther Schuler, president of the New England Conservatory of Music has announced that the Conservatory will be the administrator of a grant of $100,000 from the Avon Foundation of St. Paul, Minnesota which will enable composer Alec Wilder to prepare a definitive book on the American popular song and its composers and lyricists.

The book will aim to deal with a marvelous art in its own terms. The author also added that the book will not be technical, and also not a text book. He plans his writing for the same audience that popular songs were written for.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

APR 14 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Lists Concerts for the Week

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 23d pair of Friday-Saturday concerts Music Director Erich Leinsdorf has invited baritone David Clatworthy to take part in a performance of Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite.

Previous Performer

Mr. Clatworthy has previously performed this work with the orchestra at Tanglewood and again will sing the role in Russian. Mr. Leinsdorf has also programmed Mosaiques pour orchestra by Karel Husa, a member of the Music Faculty of Cornell University.

These will be the first performances by the Orchestra of Mr. Husa's music. The Friday-Saturday concerts will also include ballet music and entractes from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Symphony No. 2, "Antar" by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Guest conductor Julius Rudel will direct the final Tuesday Series B concert on the 16th at 7:30. His program consists of Mozart's Symphony No. 32; Estudios Sinfinicos by Ginastera; Sibelius' Symphony No. 1; and the Overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi."

Thursday Series

Thursday evening Mr. Leinsdorf will close the Thursday Series A concerts with Lilian Kallir as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 499. The program will begin with the Overture to "Fidelio" by Beethoven and include two works by Richard Strauss—Also sprach Zarathustra and the orchestral suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

COMPLETE PROGRAMS

TUES. (April 16) at 7:30

JULIUS RUDEL, Guest Conductors.

MOZART Symphony No. 2 in G Major K. 318

GINASTERA Estudios Sinfonicos

SIBELIUS Symphony No. 1 in E Minor

WAGNER Rienzi - Overture

THURS. (April 18) at 8:30

BEETHOVEN Fidelio - Overture

MOZART Piano Concerto K. 449

LILLIAN KALLIR, Soloist

STRAUSS Also sprach Zarathustra

STRAUSS Suite from Rosenkavalier

FRIDAY (April 19) 2:00
SATURDAY (April 20) 8:30

SCHUBERT Incidental music to "Rosamunde" Op. 26

RIMSKY - KORSAKOV Symphony No. 2 "Antar" Op. 15

HUSA Mosaiques pour orchestre

PROKOFIEV Lieutenant Kije, orchestral Suite Op. 60

DAVID CLATWORTHY, Soloist

66

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 110,000

APR 20 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Rewards Decidedly Nominal

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Symphony program was one of those affairs, thankfully rare, which pass an afternoon and accomplish little else. The rewards from works by Schubert, Rimsky-Korsakov, Cornell composer Karel Husa and Prokofiev were, in the main, decidedly nominal.

Such remarks do not apply frequently to Schubert, and in this case the composer himself is undeserving of them. His Incidental Music to "Rosamunde," of which Erich Leinsdorf conducted the ballet music and the entr'acte following Act I, consists of inspired lyricism, gently tripping motion for the most part and enlivening contrasts of dynamics and register.

It is doubtful, however, that Schubert ever imagined his work in the hands of a Tchaikovsky-size orchestra like the one Leinsdorf provided. The excess weight was almost ruinous. The music, after all, is harmonically simple and largely transparent, even in its more forceful moments, but the Symphony's entire string complement gave it the grace of a moderate-sized elephant, with predictable blurring of the crystalline rhythmic - metric work. The "Rosamunde" music lives on delicacy and charm, and these qualities do not thrive on overstatement.

SO MUCH, UNFORTUNATELY, for Schubert. The following work was Rimsky-Korsakov's Second Symphony, "Antar," and a more beautifully-orchestrated bore, a more elegantly-decorated emptiness I have never known. The four movements are based on a semi-legendary figure, Antar, a desert-dwelling recluse, and the three wishes granted him by a fairy goddess. More than 30 years later the composer renounced the symphonic designation he had originally bestowed upon the work, referring to it as a suite, fairy tale, story, or anything but a symphony.

It would not help to know what to call "Antar," for its content is not of the sort which clings to the memory. Rimsky-Korsakov's short, characteristic themes of Oriental reminiscence are used in abundance and repeat themselves endlessly. Richly harmonized and expertly orchestrated though they are, there is nothing so distinguished about them as to provide true identity or climactic interest in the work. They wail on aimlessly into the night. The march of the third movement plods; the expiring romantic notes of the finale do little more than prepare a convenient veil of forgetfulness.

There was a measure of technical attraction, at least, to Karel Husa's Mosaiques pour orchestre, which received its first local performance. Husa's five Mosaiques are fairly well explained by their title, as they build structure and substance from elemental motives of rhythm and note-succession. Each Mosaique is given to a different instrumental combination—the first to percussion and harp, the second adding strings, the third to woodwinds, brass and indefinite-pitch percussion, and so on, as each section becomes more inclusive.

Husa's serial structure can be recognized and appreciated through the transparency of the writing and orchestration, and the modified arch-form brought about by a fairly-cataclysmic fourth Mosaique followed by the concluding hush is satisfying. Yet there is not much new about his instrumental treatment, especially after one's having heard Ginastera's Estudios sinfonicos last week. It strikes me as admirable in its construction, less remarkable for its invention.

Mr. Husa was present to receive applause.

PROKOFIEV'S LIEUTENANT Kije Suite finished the program with baritone David Clatworthy providing vocal solos (in Russian) where saxophone solos are usually played. It is an effective alternative, and Clatworthy's robust contributions enhanced the Romance considerably; yet when lustful sounds were most demanded, in the tavern-song Troika, he seemed unable to sustain the tempo and compete at once with the orchestra. For all that it was pleasant enough, but having heard Lieutenant Kije and Prokofiev's "Romeo" suite with rather odd frequency recently. I could have done without it.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the final of the 87th season: Stravinsky's Ode (1943), Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 29,000

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO PENULTIMATE

The novelty was the first local performance of Karel Husa's Mosaiques por orchestre at Symphony last week, Mr. Leinsdorf conducting. The rest of the ~~next-to-the-last~~ concert of the season consisted of materials that, to put it mildly, have been pretty well buried around here — Schubert's Incidental music to "Rosamunde, most recently conducted in 1886 under Geriecke; Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphony No. 2, "Antar," under Rabaud in 1919; and Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kije Suite, under Koussevitsky in 1942. Improbable though such a melange may appear in print, it nonetheless did make for a reasonably pleasant undertaking.

Husa, who teaches at Cornell and composes, conducts records extensively, is unabashedly in the Western tradition. There it is: the highly concentrated, transparent, pointillistic, rearrangement of scraps of music, with each and every note having its exact function. "Dazzling diamonds" is what Stravinsky once termed this kind of writing, which pushes succinctness to its ultimate.

Earlier this season we heard Webern's Variations and last year his Five Pieces. On both of those occasions it occurred to me that prototype works with enormous subsequent imprint though they be — it was questionable how distinguishable they would be from something in the genre by a skilled disciple. Well, Husa appears to be just such, and to the passing listener, lacking a detailed knowledge of the prototypes or the present score, the difference between Master and Disciple is Aristotelian. Husa's variegated five-movement piece was quite short and sufficiently interesting and perhaps important to justify a repeat performance on the spot. The composer was on hand to take a bow.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Antar" Symphony is not really a symphony at all, as Rimsky himself conceded, but is rather a loose, half-descriptive, half-evocative tone poem based on the Antar legend of heroism, magic love and death. Its "structure," therefore is little more than the embellishment around the hero theme, the whole separated more or less into four "movements." If such an aficionado was Serge Koussevitsky who saw fit to eschew "Antar" during his entire career here, one might reasonably think it pretty desolate stuff. Yet he would be wrong. It is a youthful work and quite one-dimensional, but along with the expectably superb treatment of national folk materials, it has a freshness, individuality of harmony and restraint that is really quite appealing. It is, then, better than ha'penny Scheherezade, although not music that deserves a place as a repertory staple. Still, we would all be the more cheerful for its revival every decade or so.

So much could be said for the Lieutenant Kije suite. On such occasion as it is played, it is almost always to provide the score for the ballet "The Russian Soldier." Thus the use of the baritone voice in the second and fourth parts in the purely concert version is a distinct novelty and enhancement. The vocalist here was David Clatworthy, who seemed thoroughly at home with his brief assignment. Those marvelous Russian words — what but Italian can compare with the Russian language when set to music. Further enhancement was to be found in the tuba playing of Chester Schmitz, who, incidentally, added comparable luster with his playing in the Antar symphony.

But so much cannot be said for the woodwind playing in Schubert's amiable, tender "Rosamunde" incidental music. The inconsistent intonation of that section surely must be to Mr. Leinsdorf as the Old Man of the Sea was to Sinbad. Like the sailor, Mr. Leinsdorf is a sturdy fellow, though, and he conducted here, as elsewhere in the program, with firmness and intelligence, if without any over-abundance of exuberance.

This week sees the season's final concert, which will include Stravinsky's Ode, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1. Mr. Leinsdorf again will conduct.

PRI - SAT I XXIV

67

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-fourth Program
Friday afternoon April 26 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 27 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

STRAVINSKY Ode (1943)
Eulogy: lento
Eclogue: con moto
Epitaph: lento

BARTÓK Concerto for orchestra (1943)
Andante non troppo – allegro vivace
Giuoco delle coppie: allegro scherzando
Elegy: andante non troppo
Intermezzo interrotto: allegretto
Finale: presto

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS Symphony no. 1 in C minor op. 68
Un poco sostenuto – allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio – allegro non troppo, ma con brio

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

M - cat XXIV

1483

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

APR 27 1968 New England Newsclip

B. S. O strains familiar

By DAVID NOBLE
Architecture Critic

Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, the last of the 1967-68 season, presented long-familiar pieces in carefully worked-out performances which told a good deal about what has been going on in Symphony Hall in recent months, — and years.

A refreshing miniature by Stravinsky also found its way into the program somehow: the "Ode" of 1943, which consists of a short pictorial sketch originally intended as film backgroundnd, surrounded by two jewels of neo-classic brevity.

But the balance of the time was taken up by Brahms' First Symphony and the Concerto for orchestra, neither of which represents its composer at his symphonic peak, though both pieces have been circulated a good deal, and possess spectacular finales.

Erich Leinsdorf's control over both performances was noteworthy, though not necessarily salutary — noteworthy both for what was controlled and what was not.

Controlled were tempi and dynamics, controlled in both senses: closely directed and restrained. The question of whether such control brings out the best in these works may be sidesteppd in favor of an examination of the ways in which it was absent.

Uncontrolled were nuances of phrasing and tonal shading. The first of these factors was most crucial in the Brahms work, the second in the Bartok.

Presentable as the orchestral sound was— "professional," if you will— these interior matters which may be lumped under the heading "articulation" were passed over as if by tacit agreement by Leinsdorf and the players. The Bartok piece lost the weak coherence it possesses and the Brahms lay torpid under a blanket of sonorous playing.

The causes of this gingerly circumvention of core matters in the B.S.O.'s playing are no doubt legion, but one can be pointed at here: the deterioration of the relationship between conductor and orchestra under the pressures of one of the heaviest performance schedules in the country.

If the B.S.O.'s deadly schedule did nct create the dissonances which exist among its principals, it cannot but have aggravated them. Under persisting conditions of personal tension, such touchy matters as detail of style or responsiveness of attention become increasingly difficult to mention, much less resolve. In the case of a sensitive man like Leinsdorf, whose musical touch is visibly affected by matters of personal confidence, the situation can become extreme.

The ARTS

Both director and orchestra have stated that they will not keep up the present schedule indefinitely. The players have proposed the hiring of about 50 alternates who would fill in for resting players in rotation, and Leinsdorf has tendered his resignation rather than carry on under present handicaps.

It would be surprising if anyone agreed to succeed Mr. Leinsdorf under the work load he now carries. If anyone does, it will be another nail in the coffin of symphonic music in Boston, an artifact which may be much closer to completion than any of us thinks.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Final Concerts Next Week

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will be on WGBH radio next week, direct from Symphony Hall.

On Tuesday, April 23, 8:30 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf conducts the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" by Wagner, Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" and Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven.

On Friday, April 26, 2 p.m., Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's "Ode", Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok and Symphony No. 1 by Brahms. The same program will be presented Saturday, April 27, 8:30 p.m., broadcast live by WGBH-FM.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

APR 29 1968 New England Newsclip

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Grand finale for season at Symphony

By Clifford Barnes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra asserted its versatility and virtuosity on the final program of the season's Symphony Hall concerts this past weekend. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf programed two repertoire-standards that he has recorded with the BSO, and one work that is seldom heard. The whole evoked a well-deserved applause that was especially warm and enthusiastic.

The strings produced a particularly gorgeous sound—resonant, rich, and refined. The winds and percussion had numerous opportunities to display their expert solo capabilities. The conductor put himself totally into making this a memorable event, even uttering audible emotive sounds to accompany the most dramatic moments.

The Stravinsky "Ode," composed in 1943, is a short memorial triptych that is a fine example of lucid writing for orchestra. The classic simplicity of its opening Eulogy and closing Epitaph is neatly contrasted by the middle movement, Eclogue. Hunting horns and rustic atmosphere are subtly sketched, originally for the film "Jane Eyre," but here suggesting a concert in the country and Tanglewood—as the composer explains it.

Informative notes

Stravinsky wrote this music on commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, first wife of the famed conductor. A similar commission was responsible for the second work on the concert, Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, also dated 1943.

In his readable and informative program notes—superior to all others throughout this season—James Lyons traces the facts of how this symphonic masterpiece came into being, and clears away the mysteries surrounding it in some sources. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were responsible for fostering the creation of a 20th-century masterpiece.

Leinsdorf's concept of it is both expansive and detailed. The second movement, "Game of Pairs," excelled because of the top-quality woodwind and brass players. The interrupting burlesque in the fourth movement was handled almost like a private joke.

Brahms constructed a mighty edifice with his Symphony No. 1 in C minor. It often crumbles under second-rate conductors and orchestras, but the work stood on firm ground with Leinsdorf and his musicians. The conductor carefully placed accents and dynamics in his phrasing. The pace was steady, with little lingering, and occasional hurried places. Most important, a logical scheme was developed as the music proceeded.

The whole concert glowed with the magic of music-making. Any previous misgivings about an individual concert, choice of works, or interpretation could easily be forgotten.

PRI - SAT XXIV

67

EIGHTY-SEVENTH SEASON 1967–1968

Twenty-fourth Program

Friday afternoon April 26 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 27 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

STRAVINSKY Ode (1943)

Eulogy: lento
Eclogue: con moto
Epitaph: lento

BARTÓK Concerto for orchestra (1943)

Andante non troppo – allegro vivace
Giuoco delle coppie: allegro scherzando
Elegy: andante non troppo
Intermezzo interrotto: allegretto
Finale: presto

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS Symphony no. 1 in C minor op. 68

Un poco sostenuto – allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio – allegro non troppo, ma con brio

The concert will end at about 4 o'clock on Friday and at about 10.30 on Saturday

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA VICTOR RECORDS

1483

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
26,000
APR 18 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Final Concerts Next Week

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will be on WGBH radio next week, direct from Symphony Hall.

On Tuesday, April 23, 8:30 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf conducts the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" by Wagner, Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" and Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven.

On Friday, April 26, 2 p.m., Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's "Ode", Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok and Symphony No. 1 by Brahms. The same program will be presented Saturday, April 27, 8:30 p.m., broadcast live by WGBH-FM.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
APR 27 1968
New England Newsclip

B. S. O strains familiar

By DAVID NOBLE
Architecture Critic

Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, the last of the 1967-68 season, presented long-familiar pieces in carefully worked-out performances which told a good deal about what has been going on in Symphony Hall in recent months, — and years.

A refreshing miniature by Stravinsky also found its way into the program somehow: the "Ode" of 1943, which consists of a short pictorial sketch originally intended as film backgrounnd, surrounded by two jewels of neo-classic brevity.

But the balance of the time was taken up by Brahms' First Symphony and the Concerto for orchestra, neither of which represents its composer at his symphonic peak, though both pieces have been circulated a good deal, and possess spectacular finales.

Erich Leinsdorf's control over both performances was noteworthy, though not necessarily salutary — noteworthy both for what was controlled and what was not.

Controlled were tempi and dynamics, controlled in both senses: closely directed and restrained. The question of whether such control brings out the best in these works may be sidesteppd in favor of an examination of the ways in which it was absent.

Uncontrolled were nuances of phrasing and tonal shading. The first of these factors was most crucial in the Brahms work, the second in the Bartok.

Presentable as the orchestral sound was— "professional," if you will— these interior matters which may be lumped under the heading "articulation" were passed over as if by tacit agreement by Leinsdorf and the players. The Bartok piece lost the weak coherence it possesses and the Brahms lay torpid under a blanket of sonorous playing.

The causes of this gingerly circumvention of core matters in the B.S.O.'s playing are no doubt legion, but one can be pointed at here: the deterioration of the relationship between conductor and orchestra under the pressures of one of the heaviest performance schedules in the country.

If the B.S.O.'s deadly schedule did not create the dissonances which exist among its principals, it cannot but have aggravated them. Under persisting conditions of personal tension, such touchy matters as detail of style or responsiveness of attention become increasingly difficult to mention, much less resolve. In the case of a sensitive man like Leinsdorf, whose musical touch is visibly affected by matters of personal confidence, the situation can become extreme.

The ARTS

Both director and orchestra have stated that they will not keep up the present schedule indefinitely. The players have proposed the hiring of about 50 alternates who would fill in for resting players in rotation, and Leinsdorf has tendered his resignation rather than carry on under present handicaps.

It would be surprising if anyone agreed to succeed Mr. Leinsdorf under the work load he now carries. If anyone does, it will be another nail in the coffin of symphonic music in Boston, an artifact which may be much closer to completion than any of us thinks.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
APR 29 1968
New England Newsclip

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Grand finale for season at Symphony

By Clifford Barnes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra asserted its versatility and virtuosity on the final program of the season's Symphony Hall concerts this past weekend. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf programed two repertoire-standards that he has recorded with the BSO, and one work that is seldom heard. The whole evoked a well-deserved applause that was especially warm and enthusiastic.

The strings produced a particularly gorgeous sound—resonant, rich, and refined. The winds and percussion had numerous opportunities to display their expert solo capabilities. The conductor put himself totally into making this a memorable event, even uttering audible emotive sounds to accompany the most dramatic moments.

The Stravinsky "Ode," composed in 1943, is a short memorial triptych that is a fine example of lucid writing for orchestra. The classic simplicity of its opening Eulogy and closing Epitaph is neatly contrasted by the middle movement, Eclogue. Hunting horns and rustic atmosphere are subtly sketched, originally for the film "Jane Eyre," but here suggesting a concert in the country and Tanglewood—as the composer explains it.

Informative notes

Stravinsky wrote this music on commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, first wife of the famed conductor. A similar commission was responsible for the second work on the concert, Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, also dated 1943.

In his readable and informative program notes—superior to all others throughout this season—James Lyons traces the facts of how this symphonic masterpiece came into being, and clears away the mysteries surrounding it in some sources. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were responsible for fostering the creation of a 20th-century masterpiece.

Leinsdorf's concept of it is both expansive and detailed. The second movement, "Game of Pairs," excelled because of the top-quality woodwind and brass players. The interrupting burlesque in the fourth movement was handled almost like a private joke.

Brahms constructed a mighty edifice with his Symphony No. 1 in C minor. It often crumbles under second-rate conductors and orchestras, but the work stood on firm ground with Leinsdorf and his musicians. The conductor carefully placed accents and dynamics in his phrasing. The pace was steady, with little lingering, and occasional hurried places. Most important, a logical scheme was developed as the music proceeded.

The whole concert glowed with the magic of music-making. Any previous misgivings about an individual concert, choice of works, or interpretation could easily be forgotten.

68 OUT OF TOWN CONCERTS

OCTOBER

NEWARK N.J. OCT 21st.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 78,641

OCT 13 1967

Boston Symphony Booked

Second Program In Moe Septee Series Oct. 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-68 concert series at Symphony Hall, Newark, Saturday, Oct. 21. at 8:30 p.m.

The Vienna-born conductor has made several visits to Newark with the Boston Symphony since becoming its music director in 1962. Under his leadership the symphony has played a revitalized tour and Berkshire Festival schedule.

Mr. Leinsdorf made his conductor's debut in America at the Metropolitan Opera in 1937 after serving as an assistant to Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the Salzburg Festival.

As music director of the Rochester Philharmonic from 1947-56 he brought the orchestra to national attention through its recordings and public concerts.

New success came during a five-year stint at the Metropolitan Opera, where he conducted three memorable performances of the entire Wagner "Ring" cycle.

Mr. Leinsdorf is the 11th maestro to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in it's 86-year history and only the third over the past 38 years. The late Serge Koussevitsky directed the orchestra from 1924 to 1949, to be succeeded by Charles Munch, who retired in 1962.

The orchestra made its first recording in 1917 and since then more than 31 million records of the symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestra have been sold.

Among his other activities, Mr. Leinsdorf continues the orchestra's open rehearsals previewing weekend concerts in Boston, and has given numerous world and American premieres of contemporary works, among them Barber's Piano Concerto and Britten's War Requiem.

The Sunday Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN 390,627

OCT 8 1967

AT SYMPHONY HALL — Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in Newark, Saturday, Oct. 21, at 8:30 p.m.

BUTLER, N. J.
ARGUS
W. 4,000

OCT 19 1967

Boston Symphony In Newark, Oct. 21

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-68 Concert Series at Symphony Hall, Newark, on Saturday, October 21, at 8:30 p.m.

The Vienna-born conductor has made several visits to Newark with the Boston Symphony since becoming its music director in 1962. During this period Leinsdorf has continued to maintain the orchestra's reputation.

POMPTON LAKES, N. J.
BULLETIN
W. 8,000

OCT 19 1967

Boston Symphony In Newark, Oct. 21

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-68 Concert Series at Symphony Hall, Newark, on Saturday, October 21, at 8:30 p.m.

The Vienna-born conductor has made several visits to Newark with the Boston Symphony since becoming its music director in 1962. During this period Leinsdorf has continued to maintain the orchestra's reputation.

KINNELON, N. J.
TIMES
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 19 1967

Boston Symphony In Newark, Oct. 21

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-68 Concert Series at Symphony Hall, Newark, on Saturday, October 21, at 8:30 p.m.

The Vienna-born conductor has made several visits to Newark with the Boston Symphony since becoming its music director in 1962. During this period Leinsdorf has continued to maintain the orchestra's reputation.

PEQUANNOCK, N. J.
ARGUS
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 19 1967

Boston Symphony In Newark, Oct. 21

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-68 Concert Series at Symphony Hall, Newark, on Saturday, October 21, at 8:30 p.m.

The Vienna-born conductor has made several visits to Newark with the Boston Symphony since becoming its music director in 1962. During this period Leinsdorf has continued to maintain the orchestra's reputation.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN 427,240

OCT 15 1967

Leinsdorf Leads Symphony Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-68 Concert Series at Symphony Hall Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The Vienna - born conductor has made several visits to Newark with the Boston since becoming its music director in 1962.

Under his leadership the Boston Symphony has played a tour and Berkshire Festival schedule, and the orchestra has won new critical praise.

Leinsdorf made his conductor's debut in America at the Metropolitan Opera in 1937 after serving as an assistant to Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the Salzburg Festival.

New success came during a five-year stint at the Metropolitan Opera, where he conducted three memorable performances of the entire Wagner "Ring" cycle.

Leinsdorf is the 11th maestro to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 86-year history and only the third over the past 38 years. The late Serge Koussevitsky directed the orchestra from 1924 to 1949, to be succeeded by Charles Munch, who retired in 1962.

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 228,471 SUN. 390,677

OCT 12 1967

Boston Symphony due in Newark

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-68 Concert Series at Symphony Hall, Newark, Saturday, Oct 21, at 8:30 p.m.

The Vienna-born conductor has made several visits to Newark with the Boston Symphony since becoming its music director in 1962.

Under his leadership the Boston Symphony has played a revitalized tour and Berkshire Festival schedule, and the orchestra has won new critical praise for the gem-like precision of its performances.

NEWARK, N. J.
JEWISH NEWS
W. 15,500

OCT 20 1967

Symphony Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will perform the second program in the Moe Septee 1967-'68 Concert Series at Symphony Hall, Newark, tomorrow at 8:30 P.M.

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474 SUN. 390,677

OCT 19 1967

Symphony Hall concert Saturday

Works by Beethoven, Wagner and Tchaikovsky will highlight the Symphony Hall Concert Series' second program Saturday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will perform.

The 8:30 concert will open with a suite from Beethoven's rarely - performed ballet music for "Prometheus." The music marks the German composer's first use of a theme he was to treat in 34 different ways during his career—most notably in the fourth movement of "Eroica" Symphony.

Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser" follows a complete work in itself that embodies the opera's finest music.

NEW YORK / BROOKLYN OCT 18 + 19

69

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 231,100

OCT 23 1967 New England Newsclip

The ARTS

Wilson's Conducting Helps Save 'Figaro'

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

NEW YORK—Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contributed some of the best music-making to a performance of "The Marriage of Figaro" Saturday at the New York State Theatre.

There does not seem to be time for the niceties of Mozart interpretation in the New York City Opera's schedule, but Wilson's work with baton and harpsichord lay behind much of the value in the performance.

His concept of the music was rapid with sharp accents, as was Toscanini's. This approach projects less subtlety than Mozart's music possesses, and can wear thin after three hours, but it provided a tautness the stage direction generally lacked, and some effective music.

The recitatives really crackled at the pace Wilson set, really embodied spitfire comic dialogue. The conductor, who was his own harpsichordist, interpolated an amusing keyboard fanfare at Charubino's second-act entrance.

Vocal shortcomings and a lack of awareness of the kind of brittle comedy the whole thing is about slackened much of the afternoon, however. One exception, and a great one, was the second act, which is the tightest dramatically: the musical joinings went by almost unnoticed, so absorptive was the droll baiting of the count.

The Figaro, Spiro Malas, and the Almaviva, David Clapworthy, were among the singers whose diction was discernible. They also sang with resonance. Joan Summers, the Susanna, sang sweetly and lightly — too lightly. Frances Bible was an overbrisk but likeable Charubino, and placed her ringing voice well. Malcolm Smith (Bartolo) and Nico Castel (Basilio) possessed a comic quality, and brightened the scenes they appeared in.

Christopher West devised many amusing bits of stage business, even though he neglected to teach his players the manners of comedy. Ed Wittstein's sets and costumes were clean and conventional. Wilson's "Figaro" will be heard once more on Sunday afternoon, October 29.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

OCT 15 1967 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. on Tour In New York

The Boston Symphony will play Tuesday night in Symphony Hall and then make its first New York tour of the season.

Tuesday's program at 8:30 will begin with the Beethoven ballet music for "Prometheus." in the Schoenberg Piano Concerto, which follows, Rita Bouboulidi will be soloist. The concert will close with Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Tuesday and tour programs.

The orchestra returns to Symphony Hall Tuesday night, Oct. 24, when the assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, will lead a program of Brahms, Henze and Rimsky-Korsakov.

This week's tour takes the orchestra to New York's philharmonic Hall Wednesday and Friday, to Brooklyn Thursday and Newark Saturday.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLET NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BKLYN CANARSIE COURIER
Thursday, October 19, 1967

Boston Symphony In Boro Concert

The 80th Anniversary Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will be performed at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, 30 Lafayette Ave., on Oct. 19 at 8:30 p.m. The program will include works by Beethoven, Wagner and Tschaikowsky.

POST (E.)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 330,764

OCT 16 1967 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The orchestra gave its first concert in the Acdemy April 1, 1889, conducted by Wilhelm Gericke.

NEW YORK / BROOKLYN OCT 18 + 19

69

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.

OCT 23 1967 New England Newsclip

The ARTS

Wilson's Conducting Helps Save 'Figaro'

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

NEW YORK—Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, contributed some of the best music-making to a performance of "The Marriage of Figaro" Saturday at the New York State Theatre.

There does not seem to be time for the niceties of Mozart interpretation in the New York City Opera's schedule, but Wilson's work with baton and harpsichord lay behind much of the value in the performance.

His concept of the music was rapid with sharp accents, as was Toscanini's. This approach projects less subtlety than Mozart's music possesses, and can wear thin after three hours, but it provided a tautness the stage direction generally lacked, and some effective music.

The recitatives really crackled at the pace Wilson set, really embodied spitfire comic dialogue. The conductor, who was his own harpsichordist, interpolated an amusing keyboard fanfare at Charubino's second-act entrance.

Vocal shortcomings and a lack of awareness of the kind of brittle comedy the whole thing is about slackened much of the afternoon, however. One exception, and a great one, was the second act, which is the tightest dramatically: the musical joinings went by almost unnoticed, so absorptive was the droll baiting of the count.

The Figaro, Spiro Malas, and the Almaviva, David Clapworthy, were among the singers whose diction was discernible. They also sang with resonance. Joan Summers, the Susanna, sang sweetly and lightly — too lightly. Frances Bible was an overbrisk but likeable Charubino, and placed her ringing voice well. Malcolm Smith (Bartolo) and Nico Castel (Basilio) possessed a comic quality, and brightened the scenes they appeared in.

Christopher West devised many amusing bits of stage business, even though he neglected to teach his players the manners of comedy. Ed Wittstein's sets and costumes were clean and conventional. Wilson's "Figaro" will be heard once more on Sunday afternoon, October 29.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.

OCT 15 1967 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. on Tour In New York

The Boston Symphony will play Tuesday night in Symphony Hall and then make its first New York tour of the season.

Tuesday's program at 8:30 will begin with the Beethoven ballet music for "Prometheus." in the Schoenberg Piano Concerto, which follows, Rita Bouboulidi will be soloist. The concert will close with Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Tuesday and tour programs.

The orchestra returns to Symphony Hall Tuesday night, Oct. 24, when the assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, will lead a program of Brahms, Henze and Rimsky-Korsakov.

This week's tour takes the orchestra to New York's philharmonic Hall Wednesday and Friday, to Brooklyn Thursday and Newark Saturday.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLET NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN CANARSIE COURIER
Thursday, October 19, 1967

Boston Symphony In Boro Concert

The 80th Anniversary Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will be performed at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, 30 Lafayette Ave., on Oct. 19 at 8:30 p.m. The program will include works by Beethoven, Wagner and Tschaikowsky.

POST (E.)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 330,764

OCT 16 1967 New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The orchestra gave its first concert in the Acdemy April 1, 1889, conducted by Wilhelm Gericke.

70

NEW BRUNSWICK N.J. NOV 30th

NOVEMBER

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 49,539 SUN. 50,173

NOV 22 1967

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony

Boston Symphony Plays at Rutgers

One of New Brunswick's favorite musical groups, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the Rutgers University campus Nov. 30 for a performance at the university's gymnasium.

Erich Leinsdorf, holder of an honorary doctorate from Rutgers, will conduct a program consisting of Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, Wagner's Tannhauser Overture, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Kraft concerto, written in 1964, was entitled "Concerto for Four Percussion Soloists and Orchestra." It was first performed by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra last March. Kraft has made a special adaptation of the score to accomodate the five percussion players in the Boston Symphony.

The concert will be the second in the Rutgers Gymnasium Series, now in its 51st year. A limited number of tickets is still available at the Rutgers Concert Office, 542 George St.

Scheduled for the remainder of the Gymnasium Series are Regina Resnik, mezzo soprano, Feb. 14; Isaac Stern, violinist, March 5, and the Orchestra San Pietro, April 16.

MUTUAL PRESS
CLIPPING SERVICE
20 S. 15th St.
Phila. 2, Pa.

Pub - The South
Amboy Citizen
S. Amboy, N. J.

NOV 23 1967

Boston Symphony to Appear at Rutgers

One of New Brunswick's favorite musical groups - the Boston Symphony Orchestra -- will return to the Rutgers University campus November 30 for a performance at the State University's gymnasium.

Erich Leinsdorf, holder of an honorary doctorate from Rutgers, will conduct a program consisting of Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, Wagner's Tannhauser Overture, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Kraft Concerto, written in 1964, was entitled "Concerto for Four Percussion Soloists and Orchestra." It was first performed by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra last March. Kraft has made a special adaptation of the score to accommodate the five percussion players in the Boston Symphony.

The concert will be the second in the Rutgers Gymnasium Series, now in its 51st year. A limited number of tickets is still available at the Rutgers Concert Office, 542 George St., New Brunswick.

Scheduled for the remainder of the Gymnasium Series are Regina Resnik, mezzo soprano, February 14; Isaac Stern, violinist, March 5, and the Orchestra San Pietro, April 16.

THE COURIER-NEWS
PLAINFIELD, N. J.
D. 49,909

NOV 23 1967

Orchestra to Play

NEW BRUNSWICK — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, holder of an honorary doctorate from Rutgers will present a program consisting of Kraft's Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, Wagner's Tannhauser Overture and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Nov. 30 in Rutgers gymnasium.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,097,578 SUN. 3,070,836

NOV 30 1967

Bostonians Bow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf, opens the second season of its special series at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night.

NEW BRUNSWICK CONT.

CARNEGIE HALL DEC 2nd

71

DECEMBER

THE DAILY HOME NEWS 19
NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J., FRIDAY, DEC. 1, 1967

The Concert

Thousands Hail Boston Symphony

By ISABEL BRYLAWSKI

Snow, hazardous driving conditions, traffic congestion and difficult parking facilities couldn't keep thousands of area music lovers from welcoming a perennial favorite, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night in the second concert of the Gymnasium Series.

Even the late arrival of its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, due to the inconvenience of traveling, could not dim the delight of the audience. For Leinsdorf, it was a homecoming since his affiliation with the Rutgers University choir dates back to the time he was the conductor of the Rochester Symphony. As always, he gave a superlative performance.

Under his adept direction, the orchestra has regained the place it held as one of the foremost orchestras in the country if not in the world. The strings again maintain their sheen, the brass, woodwind and percussion are once more in complete balance and judgment of tone.

There were two standard works and novelty on the program, the Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra by William Kraft, the Tannhauser Overture of Wagner and The Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 by Ludwig van Beethoven.

In the first number, the Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, the soloists were Everett Firth, Harold Thompson, Thomas Gauger, Charles Smith and Arthur Press, comprising the percussion section of the orchestra. Each of the soloists were responsible for the presentation of the many variations of instruments.

It was a fascinating combination, requiring separate alterations of the orchestral form and the hugely diverting sounds of the bells, chimes, cymbals and many other forms of the percussive denomination.

Wagner's Overture to the Opera Tannheuser, beginning with the somber notes of the Pilgrim's Chorus, includes many of the main themes of the opera. It speaks of faith, salvation and repentance as well as the more seductive melody of the unholy love of Venus. The orchestra was fulsome in its reproduction, with the swelling lines of the melodic structure.

What can one say of the Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven? Not only is it the most famous of his nine symphonies. The opening four notes have been interpreted as the voice of Fate.

It is an imposing beginning to a work of intense variety. The interpretation was never jaded, it was as fresh as if it were being played for the first time.

The audience would not be satisfied until there was an encore and after the Overture to Die Meistersinger by Wagner was magnificently played, the conductor and the orchestra were given a standing ovation.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

DEC 4 1967

Malcolm Frager Heard With Boston Symphony

Malcolm Frager joined Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony for a gentle if not altogether successful performance of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night.

Since this friendly concerto is one of Beethoven's most delicate conceptions, Mr. Frager's intimate approach did have definite virtues. The pianist's thoughtful detail hunting yielded many lovely moments and while his ideas on phrase distention did not always accord with Mr. Leinsdorf's, the two musicians basically seemed to agree that the work should be treated as a piece of highly sophisticated chamber music.

Occasionally, however, the pianist's restraint led him to misjudge dynamic balances and far too much of his sensitive passage work simply disappeared into the orchestral tutti —even though Mr. Leinsdorf's accompaniments could hardly have been more discreet.

Earlier Mr. Leinsdorf led what was apparently the first New York performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 79. The Haydn scholar H. C. Robbins Landon has proclaimed this symphony one of the composer's least interesting efforts, and after hearing the Bostonians play it, one is inclined to agree with him. The music has a snappy comic opera flavor, but precious little in the way of memorable invention. Both this work and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 were given sober readings with a surprising amount of ragged ensemble from the orchestra.

PETER G. DAVIS.

NEWARK, N. J.
JEWISH NEWS
W. 19,500

NOV 24 1967

Concert Series Features Pianist

American pianist Misha Dichter will perform at Newark's Symphony Hall Saturday, Dec. 9, at 8:30 P.M. under the auspices of the Moe Septee Concert Series. Dichter will also appear this season with the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra.

A second prize winner at last year's Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow, the young pianist studied at the Juilliard School of Music, where he won the Beethoven concerto contest and received the Joseph Lhevinne scholarship.

Dichter, who won first prize in a national music educators' competition at 15, appeared over national television with the Boston Symphony at the 1966 Tanglewood Festival.

Soprano Leontyne Price will appear Saturday, Jan. 13, 1968, in the next concert of the series.

NEW BRUNSWICK CONT.

CARNEGIE HALL DEC 2nd

71

DECEMBER

THE DAILY HOME NEWS 19
NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J., FRIDAY, DEC. 1, 1967

The Concert

Thousands Hail Boston Symphony

By ISABEL BRYLAWSKI

Snow, hazardous driving conditions, traffic congestion and difficult parking facilities couldn't keep thousands of area music lovers from welcoming a perennial favorite, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night in the second concert of the Gymnasium Series.

Even the late arrival of its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, due to the inconvenience of traveling, could not dim the delight of the audience. For Leinsdorf, it was a homecoming since his affiliation with the Rutgers University choir dates back to the time he was the conductor of the Rochester Symphony. As always, he gave a superlative performance.

Under his adept direction, the orchestra has regained the place it held as one of the foremost orchestras in the country if not in the world. The strings again maintain their sheen, the brass, woodwind and percussion are once more in complete balance and judgment of tone.

There were two standard works and novelty on the program, the Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra by William Kraft, the Tannhauser Overture of Wagner and The Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67 by Ludwig van Beethoven.

In the first number, the Concerto for Percussion and Orchestra, the soloists were Everett Firth, Harold Thompson, Thomas Gauger, Charles Smith and Arthur Press, comprising the percussion section of the orchestra. Each of the soloists were responsible for the presentation of the many variations of instruments.

It was a fascinating combination, requiring separate alterations of the orchestral form and the hugely diverting sounds of the bells, chimes, cymbals and many other forms of the percussive denomination.

Wagner's Overture to the Opera Tannheuser, beginning with the somber notes of the Pilgrim's Chorus, includes many of the main themes of the opera. It speaks of faith, salvation and repentance as well as the more seductive melody of the unholy love of Venus. The orchestra was fulsome in its reproduction, with the swelling lines of the melodic structure.

What can one say of the Symphony No. 5 by Beethoven? Not only is it the most famous of his nine symphonies. The opening four notes have been interpreted as the voice of Fate.

It is an imposing beginning to a work of intense variety. The interpretation was never jaded, it was as fresh as if it were being played for the first time.

The audience would not be satisfied until there was an encore and after the Overture to Die Meistersinger by Wagner was magnificently played, the conductor and the orchestra were given a standing ovation.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

DEC 4 1967

Malcolm Frager Heard With Boston Symphony

Malcolm Frager joined Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony for a gentle if not altogether successful performance of Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night.

Since this friendly concerto is one of Beethoven's most delicate conceptions, Mr. Frager's intimate approach did have definite virtues. The pianist's thoughtful detail hunting yielded many lovely moments and while his ideas on phrase distention did not always accord with Mr. Leinsdorf's, the two musicians basically seemed to agree that the work should be treated as a piece of highly sophisticated chamber music.

Occasionally, however, the pianist's restraint led him to misjudge dynamic balances and far too much of his sensitive passage work simply disappeared into the orchestral tutti —even though Mr. Leinsdorf's accompaniments could hardly have been more discreet.

Earlier Mr. Leinsdorf led what was apparently the first New York performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 79. The Haydn scholar H. C. Robbins Landon has proclaimed this symphony one of the composer's least interesting efforts, and after hearing the Bostonians play it, one is inclined to agree with him. The music has a snappy comic opera flavor, but precious little in the way of memorable invention. Both this work and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 were given sober readings with a surprising amount of ragged ensemble from the orchestra.

PETER G. DAVIS.

NEWARK, N. J.
JEWISH NEWS
W. 19,500

NOV 24 1967

Concert Series Features Pianist

American pianist Misha Dichter will perform at Newark's Symphony Hall Saturday, Dec. 9, at 8:30 P.M. under the auspices of the Moe Septee Concert Series. Dichter will also appear this season with the Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra.

A second prize winner at last year's Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow, the young pianist studied at the Juilliard School of Music, where he won the Beethoven concerto contest and received the Joseph Lhevinne scholarship.

Dichter, who won first prize in a national music educators' competition at 15, appeared over national television with the Boston Symphony at the 1966 Tanglewood Festival.

Soprano Leontyne Price will appear Saturday, Jan. 13, 1968, in the next concert of the series.

—o—

72 JANUARY PROVIDENCE JAN 11th

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conducted by Stokowski

By EDWIN SAFFORD

It is a bit presumptuous to remark on a Leopold Stokowski program at this late, octogenarian date. The dean of the music world's wunderkinder isn't about to give a hoot what you say anyhow. But he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium and duty compels reporting on it.

No difficulty. All you have to say is — terrific. For a switch, this was an out-of-town opening prefacing Boston performances today, tomorrow and next week. It was a fairly standard program, Mozart, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Moussorgsky, if you call anything the perennially dynamic conductor has a hand in standard. Don't worry, there was nothing commonplace and much that was revealing about the music played as well as about the orchestra.

Take the fantasy overture Tchaikovsky manufactured for "Hamlet" as example. The old boy—I mean this as description, not at all out of disrespect—made it seem the genuine article. And, for that matter, taken on its own terms and what it is supposed to be about, maybe it is the genuine article. But only a Stokowski gives it conviction, all that sawing and bombast, because he trusts it to its proper limits, gives it a good shove yet keeps it tight and muscular. No matter how you listen to the piece, what a refreshment in exchange for "Romeo and Juliet."

The first part of the concert was string-dominated. Were these the Boston strings? They most certainly were, and now luminously they did sing. An exceptionally clear giving of the "Don Giovanni" overture, with a slightly reduced personnel, set the pre-intermission tone. A certain unevenness in the violins apart, it was a reading to make you want the entire opera, if only because the maestro is a marvelous conductor of opera and you would love to hear just what he'd do. It was all at once detailed and dramatic.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony followed and with it theories about his odd-numbered symphonies being portentous were thrown right out the window. As indicated, strings were given priority, so there was not the bumptious bouncing drive we've heard elsewhere, and from this identical orchestra under Munch and Leinsdorf. All the same what was played was a logical bridge between the "Pastoral" sixth and the jolly eighth. In a word it was ruminant.

No reason why not, under such circumstances. How those cellos breathed in the second movement under Stokowski's motivating right hand and arm, as if he were playing them all and with the greatest subtlety. In the scherzo the huge band had the delicacy of a chamber orchestra, even if you might carp over romantic ritards in the trio. And what a glorious flourish at the ending. The thing about the whole work was that it was of a piece, a conception sticking to its point of view.

One of those operatic symphonic syntheses for which Stokowski is so noted completed the evening. It was woven from "Boris Godunov." Well, here affairs depend on your taste for such adaptations. Whatever your feelings, however, you cannot deny the effectiveness.

For one thing, the conductor-orchestrator includes among the pageant music what is the most pungent moment in this opera in which the protagonist is the collective Russian people, the Idiot's aria. It is souped up a bit, but nevertheless gives more sense of the work in combination with the coronation scene and the death of Boris than say, the juicier and laterally added Polish section. Consequently a feeling of the whole opera is evoked.

In finishing this report you might advise the BSO, now in the market for a new conductor, they have this week a logical candidate. Silly as this may sound, he appears to have the vigor for a long continuation. That is my hope, at least.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Music In Review

Orchestra, Stokowski Given Standing Ovation

Leopold Stokowski, guest conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given a standing ovation by a cheering audience Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium. And the years of conducting the great orchestras of the nation since 1908, and the associations with the world's leading conductors, including associate conductor with Arturo Toscanini, combined to prove Stokowski is one of the peerless directors of this century.

He conducts without a baton. Uses a score which he rarely refers to except to turn pages, and he has a winning grace and graciousness to both musicians and audiences. His hands are hypnotic in casting the spell of his enthusiasm and understanding to the orchestra, and he calls every entry and furnishes or darkens every phrase.

The only noticeable drag in the program came in the opening work, Mozart's "Don Giovanni Overture," in which the cellos seemed to lack a singing quality, and, for a while, the usual verve and lilt was absent. But we must attribute this to old instruments and unlimbered fingers, and the "curtain raiser" is always a warm-up number.

It was in the following Beethoven "Symphony No. 7 in A Major" that orchestra and conductor reached the peak of majestic interpretation with its recurring rhythm — one long two short-one-long beats — repeated in all movements, passionate in the slow tempos, frenzied in the quick ones, building strength and tension from the allegretto, second movement, through presto — quasi presto — presto third movement, to a blazing allegro con brio finale.

After intermission, the program changed to Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet Overture," which in the hands of any other conductor has always been a description, morbid and tragic, of the Melancholy Dane. But Stokowski gave it a beautification that belied the macabre theme.

And the final work continued the spell of enchantment with Mr. Stokowski's own orchestration of excerpts from Mussorgsky' "Boris Godunov" that included the people's praise of Boris, his coronation as czar, the prayers of the monks, the siege of Kazan and the death of Boris.

The work was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony at this concert, and the standard they set for this magnificent opus, will be difficult to attain by any other orchestra unless Stokowski himself directs it. And that is applicable to the entire program—a superb performance.

C.H.L.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

JAN 12 1968 New

In Their Music, 'Joie de Vivre'

Stokowski at 80 Salutes Youth

By C. FRASER SMITH

Picture on Page 1

Leopold Stokowski, who at 80 is still very much a working conductor of symphony orchestras, said last night he sees a new spirit in young people.

The man whose democratic approach has brought musical culture to millions of Americans said he believes all the conditions of life today are different from those he knew as a young man.

He indicated that communications, sophisticated weaponry and prosperity are elements in a vastly altered existence.

Folk music, he said, is a part of the new spirit; as a part of the world of music, it stands at an opposite pole from those occupations which continually, it seems, lead to conflict.

"They (the young) are developing new ''values'' through their experiments with music and dance. That part of modern society which affords youngsters money to buy millions of guitars a year, affords them, at the same time, a new way to learn about other peoples, he said.

Asked to comment on the surging popularity of the folk form, he said, "Very important. It's an expression of people, of their lives, their nature.

"It is an expression of their joie de vivre, as the French say."

Without sketching in the details he made the jump to Vietnam. "Killing and killing and killing. Everybody loses. The First World War — everybody lost. The Second World War — everybody lost. This war everybody is losing," he said.

As he talked in the spare dressing cubicle backstage at Veterans Auditorium where he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, he looked in the makeup mirror, smoothed his hair, and calmly waited for the questions.

But he seemed to be listening to his musicians tuning their instruments. He asked his manager to bring the pianist. The musician, not half the maestro's age, arrived shortly.

"This is very important," Stokowski said, "Could you play it like this? One finger? Like this?" He pointed both forefingers down at the score, pecking at it like an unschooled typist.

When the two men had agreed upon the technique to be used, the maestro summoned another musician.

In two weeks, Stokowski will conduct in Chicago. From there he goes to Philadelphia and, then, back to New York, where he conducts the American Symphony Orchestra. He also travels in Europe and Japan.

When it was suggested to him that he was talking to one whose response to music is almost entirely emotional, he politely demanded, "What's wrong with that? Too many people's response is purely intellectual. The ideal is to be both intellectual and emotional."

Perhaps, it is the delicate balance of these postures in musicians and traveling conductors which makes them capable of communicating in what Stokowski calls the "pure poetry" of music.

But it is also helpful, no doubt, when the conductor is a consummatte musician himself. Stokowski began his professional career as an organist, but knew the violin and piano at the age of 7.

During his later studies at the Royal College in England and afterward in Paris, Munich and Berlin, he learned to play all the instruments in the orchestra in order to understand them from the player's point of view.

It is this kind of knowledge and understanding that makes his life as a musician important to him as a man. "Music is the poetry, the beauty, the happiness of life. I am fortunate to be a musician. Too many people are not doing what they like to do."

He spoke matter-of-factly and seemed anxious not to waste time. Earlier, he and sent for the tam-tam or gong player. "Tell him to bring his beaters. He's using the wrong beaters," he said, pronouncing the word with the vestiges of his British accent.

As the interview was coming to an end, he sent another message to the tam-tam player, who arrived shortly thereafter, dragging his instrument down the corridor behind the orchestra area and into the maestro's room.

PROVIDENCE CONT

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conducted by Stokowski

By EDWIN SAFFORD

It is a bit presumptuous to remark on a Leopold Stokowski program at this late, octogenarian date. The dean of the music world's wunderkinder isn't about to give a hoot what you say anyhow. But he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium and duty compels reporting on it.

No difficulty. All you have to say is — terrific. For a switch, this was an out-of-town opening prefacing Boston performances today, tomorrow and next week. It was a fairly standard program, Mozart, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Moussorgsky, if you call anything the perennially dynamic conductor has a hand in standard. Don't worry, there was nothing commonplace and much that was revealing about the music played as well as about the orchestra.

Take the fantasy overture Tchaikovsky manufactured for "Hamlet" as example. The old boy—I mean this as description, not at all out of disrespect—made it seem the genuine article. And, for that matter, taken on its own terms and what it is supposed to be about, maybe it is the genuine article. But only a Stokowski gives it conviction, all that sawing and bombast, because he trusts it to its proper limits, gives it a good shove yet keeps it tight and muscular. No matter how you listen to the piece, what a refreshment in exchange for "Romeo and Juliet."

The first part of the concert was string-dominated. Were these the Boston strings? They most certainly were, and now luminously they did sing. An exceptionally clear giving of the "Don Giovanni" overture, with a slightly reduced personnel, set the pre-intermission tone. A certain unevenness in the vio- ''n apart, it was a reading to make you want the entire opera, if only because the maestro is a marvelous conductor of opera and you would love to hear just what he'd do. It was all at once detailed and dramatic.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony followed and with it theories about his odd-numbered symphonies being portentous were thrown right out the window. As indicated, strings were given priority, so there was not the bumptious bouncing drive we've heard elsewhere, and from this identical orchestra under Munch and Leinsdorf. All the same what was played was logical bridge between the "Pastoral" sixth and the jolly eighth. In a word it was ruminant.

No reason why not, under such circumstances. How those cellos breathed in the second movement under Stokowski's motivating right hand and arm as if he were playing them all and with the greatest subtlety. In the scherzo the huge band had the delicacy of a chamber orchestra, even if you might carp over romantic ritards in the trio. And what a glorious flourish at the ending. The thing about the whole work was that it was of a piece, a conception sticking to its point of view.

One of those operatic symphonic syntheses for which Stokowski is so noted completed the evening. It was woven from "Boris Godunov." Well, here affairs depend on your taste for such adaptations. Whatever your feelings, however, you cannot deny the effectiveness.

For one thing, the conductor-orchestrator includes among the pageant music what is the most pungent moment in this opera in which the protagonist is the collective Russian people, the Idiot's aria. It is souped up a bit, but nevertheless gives more sense of the work in combination with the coronation scene and the death of Boris than, say, the juicier and laterally added Polish section. Consequently a feeling of the whole opera is evoked.

In finishing this report you might advise the BSO, now in the market for a new conductor, they have this week a logical candidate. Silly as this may sound, he appears to have the vigor for a long continuation. That is my hope, at least.

HARTFORD CONN. JAN 29

73

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 143,350

JAN 30 1968 New England Newsclip

Ozawa And The Boston At Bushnell

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, was presented in the Bushnell Concert Series at the Memorial auditorium Monday night. Yuji Takahashi, pianist, was guest artist. The program:

Iphigenie in Aulide Overture	Gluck
Age of Anxiety	Bernstein
Contrastes	Joachim
Daphnis and Chloe, Suit 2	Ravel

"There's no doubt about it," said a friend as I went up the aisle at the end of the Boston Symphony concert last night, "Hair does make a conductor more interesting."

And it was a hirsute evening, all right. When Conductor Seija Ozawa took the stage, eyes popped to see him with a thick mop of jet-black hair from eyebrow to coat-collar. And when Pianist Yuji Takahashi came on for "The Age of Anxiety," the audience did a double-take. There he was, haired again from brow to collar like Mr. Ozawa. Mike-San and Ike-San, as we would put it here in the states.

But longhaired or no, Mr. Ozawa and Mr. Takahashi proved to be masters of their musical trades. Mr. Ozawa handled the music and the orchestra with absolute authority and artistry all across the evening. On the podium his sweeping manner of conducting very much recalled the animated style of Leonard Bernstein. So did the vivid temper of the music he made. Mr. Takahashi crouched over the keyboard, ready to spring at the score. And spring he did indeed in the fast and furious jazzed-up pages of "The Age of Anxiety." His work was a marvelous compound of rhythmic pyrotechnics and control. Yet in such quiet passages as Mr. Bernstein afforded him, he could drift the notes out like cherry petals. I think I feel a haiku coming on.

Laurels for All

At any rate, Mr. Ozawa and Mr. Takahashi were great successes with the music and the audience. Matronly women sitting near me were all for going up and giving them both a big hug. Mr. Takahashi acted far too shy to accept such demonstrativeness. Mr. Ozawa, a joyous-type person, would probably have hugged them right back.

Some people thought some of the music was a little hairy, too. On the program was Otto Joachim's "Contrastes." It threw a number of the customers not familiar with what happens when Ebern is remodeled by Stockhausen, and the whole thing run through a computer. As a matter of fact it was relatively simple going — textures, densities and sonorities of sounds as the building material for contrasted, mood-like episodes. You can take it or leave, it, naturally, but no need to bail out.

As a matter of fact, I found "Constrastes" easier to put up with than Mr. Bernstein's "Age of Anxiety" which actually is not a great deal different in means and aims. There are many well-made sequences in Mr. Bernstein's score, quite moving on the ear and spirit. But unfortunately the work does not add up all across for me.

Rousing up Ravel

As I have said, Mr. Takahashi filled the Bernstein work with bold piano magic and Mr. Ozawa lavished great tenderness on it. So he did again in "Contrastes." When he came to the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe," I thought Mr. Ozawa dawdled with the detailing here and there. But he swept the score to a fine, frenzied close and everyon loved him for it. The people in Toronto, which is Mr. Ozawa's home base, must be having the time of their lives this season, hair, music, Mr. Ozawa and all.

The Boston orchestra was at its masterful best — or dutiful best — all evening. I saw some grins on-stage in "Contrastes," but the players put their backs into it just the same. The evening shone with virtuosity from end to end, and there was much handclasping between conductor and players all night. Domo arigato!

As for those puzzled by "aleatoric" in the program notes: "Aleatoric — Pertaining to good or back luck, especially the risk of bad luck." Wasn't so far off at that, was it?

—T.H.P

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony On Eastern Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be out of town next week giving six concerts in as many days beginning tomorrow night in Hartford.

Thre conductors will direct the orchestra's performances during the tour. Seiji Ozawa will conduct in Hartford and at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center on Wednesday and Friday evenings. Tuesday's program in Philadelphia will be conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Erich Leinsdorf will return from his mid-winter holiday for the final concert of the tour at Carnegie Hall on Saturday.

74

PHILADELPHIA JAN 30th

The Evening Bulletin Jan 31st Philadelphia

At the Academy of Music

Stokowski Leads Boston Symphony

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE
Bulletin Music Critic

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI has appeared here under many and varied circumstances, but last night, for the first time in Philadelphia, he conducted the Boston Symphony.

Presented by the All Star-Forum series and as a benefit for the Philadelphia Scholarship Fund for Wellesley College, the famed New England orchestra and its octogenarian guest drew an almost capacity crowd to the Academy of Music.

Though he will be 86 in a couple of months, Mr. Stokowski continues to give the lie to this fact. His music has a freshness that seems inextinguishable. The effect he has on Philadelphia music lovers is still, at this late date, that engendered by a timeless necromancer.

• • •

THE PROGRAM was well judged, opening with the Overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and continuing with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. How well we know these things in the hands of Mr. Stokowski! He still informs the Mozart overture with heady and yet dignified drama, and his Beethoven is ever dignified and spacious with much of the old drive.

More rarely heard was Tchaikovsky's Fantasy Overture: "Hamlet." In fact, this surging and dramatic music is almost never played, and one wonders why? Certainly, the Slavic Tchaikovsky is closer to the Danish fogs of Elsinore than he is to Mediterranean Italy in "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesca da Rimini."

• • •

IN THE OLD DAYS, I always thought that there was more than an artistic semblance between Stokowski and John Barrymore. Last night's Hamlet brought this once more to mind. The conductor brought out all the drama and turgid passion of this neglected piece with its strange yet magical ending.

To conclude the program on an ebullient note, Stokowski conducted his own transcription of excerpts from "Boris Godunov." This is souped-up Moussorgsky, all right, with its pealing bells and brass effects, but it also constitutes a legitimate and potent dramatic thrill. The death of Boris, as told by Stokowski, is overwhelming drama.

Leopold Stokowski conducted and commented here last night. Story on page 30.
—Journal-Bulletin Photo by EDWARD LINCOLN

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 717,559

JAN 28 1968 R. Mn.

But That Was 1912

When Stokowski Began, Boston Led the League

By JAMES FELTON
Of The Bulletin Staff

WHEN Leopold Stokowski returns to the Academy of Music on Tuesday night, to conduct the Boston Symphony, he will bury a rivalry that began in 1912, the year he became leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

At that time the young Stokowski had a middling orchestra to start with. Boston was the biggest and most respected orchestra in the United States.

Boston visited here and at Carnegie Hall in New York, where the group was lionized by sold-out audiences. Orchestras were then as much a matter of civic pride as baseball teams.

Boston led the league. Philadelphia had to come up from behind. Stokowski took his men up to Boston in 1914. The critics were polite, as proper Bostonians are, and it was very kindly suggested that promising though he was, Stokowski was learning how to conduct on the job. Some day he might make it.

• • •

THE DAY came sooner than Boston thought. Two years later Stokowski put together the famous "Symphony of a Thousand" by Gustav Mahler, produced the enormous work here and then in New York.

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI
. . . at the Academy of Music Tuesday.

New York was then, as it still is, the arena where every city brought its orchestra to struggle for the favor of audiences, the press, and fame that would be more than provincial. With the huge Mahler work Stokowski put Philadelphia before the New York public as a force that challenged even the mighty Boston Orchestra.

Boston itself was stunned by Stokowski's coup. The Boston Transcript ran a long story on Stokowski by Gilbert Seldes, who had attended the rehearsals of the Mahler in Philadelphia and followed its stormy triumph. Seldes assured Bostonians that despite the audacity of such a young conductor he had very great talent indeed. Boston had better keep a weather-eye on Philadelphia.

Stokowski invaded Carnegie Hall, gathering a following that other orchestras envied. Philadelphia began playing to sold-out houses. Each season Philadelphia increased its visits to New York until they numbered ten, the same that mighty Boston played there yearly.

By 1920 Stokowski and Philadelphia had won the huge following that Boston once enjoyed. Troubles with the men and conductors in Boston put that orchestra into a temporary decline, to be reversed only with the arrival of Serge Koussevitsky as conductor.

The only other time after his debut that Stokowski took the Philadelphia Orchestra back to Boston was during the orchestra's first transcontinental tour in 1936.

• • •

SO MUCH for rivalry. Boston and Philadelphia have long been league leaders together.

As we know, Stokowski went on from Philadelphia to form his All-American Youth Orchestra, and now leads his own American Symphony Orchestra in New York City.

After many decades, Boston has welcomed Stokowski to lead its own orchestra. He was at the helm for a week in Boston several years ago, and led that orchestra at Tanglewood in 1965 and 1966.

This will be Stokowski's first appearance in Philadelphia as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. It comes during a week-long tour of the orchestra away from its home city.

The program includes Mozart's "Don Giovanni" Overture, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" Overture, and excerpts from Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov."

(The board of directors last week decided to invite Leopold Stokowski to conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra next season in a Pension Fund concert. It is not known yet whether Mr. Stokowski will accept the invitation, according to Boris Sokoloff, the orchestra's manager).

BLACKWOOD, N.J.
OBSERVER
W. 5,000

JAN 25 1968 R. Miller

Stokowski To Conduct Boston Symphony In Philadelphia

Leopold Stokowski will return to the city with which he was long associated Tuesday, Jan. 30, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia.

The program will comprise Mozart's Don Giovanni Overture, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, Tchaikovsky's Hamlet Overture and excerpts from Moussorgsky's Boris Godunov.

Stokowski's long association with Philadelphia and the Academy of Music came as music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra from 1912 to 1938. The London-born conductor had served earlier, from 1909, as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony. His debut as a conductor was in 1908, in Paris.

Since his long stint in Philadelphia, Stokowski has conducted the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, the City Center Orchestra of New York, the All American Youth Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the NBC Symphony Orchestra and the Houston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1953 Stokowski created the Contemporary Music Society of New York, and in 1962, he formed the American Symphony Orchestra, which he continues to lead in an expanding schedule of programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, no stranger either to Philadelphia, is now in its 87th season. Its intensive concert schedule runs throughout the year with a seven-month winter season on tour and in Boston, two months of Pops under Arthur Fiedler's eight-week Berkshire Festival during the summer.

The Boston Symphony - Stokowski concert will be followed by another Forum special event, An Evening with Marcel Marceau.

FEBRUARY

FRAMINGHAM / WASHINGTON

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

FEB 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Concert March 10 At Framingham

FRAMINGHAM — The recently incorporated Framingham Symphony Orchestra Association will present a concert at 3 p.m. March 10 in Village Hall, Framingham Centre.

Sherman Walt of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be bassoon soloist. The program will include music by Sibelius, Gluck and Delibes.

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016

FEB 22 1968

2 Special Symphony Programs

Two special events will be presented by the St. Louis Symphony Society next month, in addition to regular subscription and Sunday concerts.

A benefit concert for the St. Louis Symphony Pension Fund will be held March 20, with Rudolf Serkin as piano soloist and Gunther Schuller as conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will be the first visiting orchestra to appear in new Powell Symphony Hall at a concert on March 27. Tickets for both special concerts go on public sale March 4.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 410,2

FEB 24 1968 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. ON TOUR NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away from Symphony Hall next week giving two concerts in Washington and four in New York. Making its first of two visits to Washington this season, the Orchestra will be heard in Constitution Hall on Monday and Thursday evenings. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will conduct these concerts as he will the four in New York.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

FEB 25 1968 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. tours

The Boston Symphony will be on tour this week, giving two concerts in Washington and four in New York. The orchestra returns to Symphony Hall for the Mar. 8-9 program, which will be under the direction of guest conductor Sixten Ehrling, music director of the Detroit Symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

FEB 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Away This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away from Symphony Hall this week giving two concerts in Washington and four in New York. Making its first of two visits to Washington this season, the orchestra will be heard in Constitution Hall on Monday and Tuesday evenings. Music director Erich Leinsdorf will conduct these concerts as he will the four in New York.

Following the tour the Orchestra returns to Symphony Hall, Boston for concerts on March 8 and 9 under the direction of guest conductor Sixten Ehrling.

PROVIDENCE MARCH 14

MARCH

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

MAR 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony in Last Visit

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the last concert of its 87th Providence season last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Erich Leinsdorf conducted and the evening was a rewarding one.

We heard one of the finest interpretations of Beethoven's "Fifth" it has been my pleasure to hear. It really was a magnificent performance and if there is any shade of tone color indicated in the Beethoven score which we did not hear, it would be hard to find. The audience cheered and applauded and showed plainly that the splendor of the performance was appreciated.

Equally fine were the Suite from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" and Mozart's Symphony No. 38, "The Prague."

It was interesting to hear the massed tone of this full orchestra with the new acoustic shell. Tonally, the shell leaves nothing to be desired. Something about the lighting however was different from the concert we heard when the shell was first used. Last evening, the glare of the overhead lights against the back panels was hard to take. For the audience, a little relief from the glare would be welcome. A few soft auditorium lights left on might possibly offset the brightness from the stage.

The Mozart was a model of good musical manners, both in the writing and in the playing. The smaller orchestra, used last evening, was indeed a virtuoso group which made every section of the symphony a cheerful, sane and lovely thing to hear.

The Strauss Suite was a revelation of glorious tone color. Toward the final section of this captivating sequence of episodes from the opera, there was an unusually intriguing sound, as if the celesta had been amplified. It will be interesting to check this point. The irresistible rhythm of the waltzes and the warmth and appeal of the orchestral tone made this portion of the evening a pleasant recollection of the days when this opera was found in the repertoire more frequently.

It was the finale of the concert, however, which reached the peak of perfection. When a conductor can bring cheers from his audience for the brilliance of his interpretation, the season has been a success. No one section of the orchestra can be singled out for praise over another. The strings were magnificent and the solo voices from the various reeds left nothing to be desired. This is a great orchestra, one which makes great music an enduring joy.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
D. 38,500

MAR 15 1968

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Pleases, Last In Concert Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Erich Leinsdorf, who didn't seem his usual self, climaxed the program, and the season's concerts in Providence, Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium with a magnificent performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

From a slow beginning with Mozart's Symphony No. 38-"The Prague," in which Leinsdorf lacked his usual verve and dynamism, the orchestra climbed slowly upward through two movements that made me wish the work was more happy and less serious. There was a depressing graveness in the adagio-allegro, and the andante was boring. The promise of happiness in the finale: presto movement was lacking, and despite the prolonged applause, Leinsdorf was a long time returning for the curtain call.

However, the second work, Strauss' "Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier' " showed the Boston Symphony at its best, and with such eloquent interpretation by Leinsdorf that the waltzes, adagios and corps de ballet of the opera became sharp images when those numbers were played.

It was after intermission that the orchestra climaxed in the Beethoven Fifth with each choir of the group singing out its own special tones in that familiar three-short-one long rhythm that makes the Fifth immortal. Single instruments took the melody to celestial heights, and the full ensemble glorified the massive chords, to make it a marvel of musical composition and expression.

C.H.L.

76

ST. LOUIS MARCH 27

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

MAR 24 1968

New England Newsclip

Symphony Opens Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens a two week tour in St. Louis's new Powell Symphony Hall on Wednesday.

The trip includes the orchestra's final concerts outside of Symphony Hall this winter and on its return three weeks will remain of the 87th season.

Following the St. Louis concert, the orchestra's first visit there in over 50 years, the Boston Symphony travels to Chicago, Cincinnati, and Washington prior to giving a closed concert in Symphony Hall next Monday.

On Tuesday, April 2, the orchestra plays in New Haven and then will be in New York for the remainder of the week giving concerts in Philharmonic Hall, Brooklyn's Academy of Music, and Carnegie Hall.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,508 SUN. 566,562

MAR 24 1968

Boston Symphony to Play Three Concerts at Powell

The first visiting orchestra to perform in Powell Symphony Hall will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. The American premiere of Sergei Prokofiev's "Ivan the Terrible" will be presented on subsequent appearances, Friday at 1:30 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The Boston orchestra is coming here under the auspices of the St. Louis Symphony Society. Its Wednesday program will be Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

The subscription concerts Friday and Saturday will include Prokofiev's Classical Symphony in addition to "Ivan the Terrible." The latter is a dramatic oratorio arranged for concert from Prokofiev's original score, which was written for a motion picture in 1944.

The oratorio consists of 20 numbers played in five movements. A narrator is used for cohesion. The original work was based on the struggles of Czar Ivan in his reign from 1547 to 1584. The narrator will be Herbert Marshall, director of the Center for Soviet and East European Studies in the Performing Arts and visiting professor of theater at Southern Illinois University at Carbondale.

Soloists will be Miss Edna Mae George, contralto, a member of the music faculty of American University at Washington, and Dale Moore, baritone, professor of voice at SIU, Edwardsville. The Community Choral Society and Concert Chorale of SIU, directed by Leonard Van Camp, will sing.

Tickets for the concerts may be obtained at Powell Hall, 718 North Grand boulevard; Aeolian Ticket office, 1004 Olive street; Famous - Barr stores at Northland, Northwest Plaza and Clayton, and Stix Baer & Fuller stores at Westroads and Crestwood.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,508 SUN. 566,562

MAR 24 1968

Abram Stasyevich (left) and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct unusual concerts in Powell Hall this week. Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony will make its first visit to St. Louis in 53 years for a concert at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday. Stasyevich, who has never conducted before in the United States, will lead the St. Louis symphony and a large chorus in the oratorio he has assembled from Prokofiev's sound track for the 1943 Russian movie, "Ivan the Terrible." Performances will be at 1:30 p.m. Friday and 8:30 p.m. Saturday.

Powell Hall Debut For Prokofiev Work

THE ST. LOUIS SYMPHONY concerts next weekend are attracting a good deal of attention because Prokofiev's "Ivan the Terrible," an oratorio based on sound track music that Prokofiev composed for Sergei Eisenstein in World War II, has not been performed before in the United States.

The conductor will be Abram Stasyevich, making his first appearance in America. He conducted the sound track music in the original "Ivan the Terrible," and was associated with Prokofiev in an earlier movie, "Alexander Nevsky," from which a well-known cantata was drawn. Stasyevich assembled the "Ivan the Terrible" oratorio six years ago and it got enthusiastic reviews in Moscow. He recorded it for the Russian label, Melodiya, and the album was released in this country several months ago on the Angel-Melodiya label.

Stasyevich says he put together the oratorio from 100 pages of manuscript sketches that Prokofiev made after seeing and timing Eisenstein's film clips. These sketches are piano scores, with numerous marginal notes about orchestration. The selection and arrangement for the "Ivan" movie was made by another arranger, so the Stasyevich version differs from the sound track in many details, and incorporates some of the Prokofiev sketches that were never used in the sound track.

THE SCORE is highly melodic and explicit; it is not "difficult" in the way Prokofiev's operas are. Leonard Van Camp's Southern Illinois University (Edwardsville) choruses will take the prominent choral part. Most of the vocal solos are declaimed rather than sung. Dale Moore, baritone, will take the part of Ivan, and Herbert Marshall, who translated the text for the Angel album's libretto, will declaim the introductory speeches of the Narrator. Edna Mae George will have the sung contralto part. Marshall's new English text will be used.

The oratorio, like the movie, celebrates Ivan as the sixteenth-century ruler who defeated the aristocratic boyar regents of Moscow, championed the cause of the people, and extended and unified the Russian dominion. Stasyevich dislikes the word "Terrible" with which the Russian "Groznyi" is always translated in connection with Ivan's name, because although Ivan was a neurotic and violent czar his reign was beneficial to Russia and his name is revered in the Soviet Union.

The conductor's name is pronounced Stas-YEH-vich. —F.P.

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016

MAR 27 1968

Boston Symphony Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will become the first orchestra to visit Powell Symphony Hall at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday when conductor Erich Leinsdorf will direct a program that includes Wagner's Overture to "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

This will be the Boston Symphony's first visit to St. Louis in [illegible] years. The last appearance here was in 1915 at the old Odeon Theatre, under the baton of Karl Muck.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here are on sale at Powell Symphony Hall, 718 N. Grand bl., JEfferson 5-1700; the Aeolian ticket office, 1004 Olive st., GEneva 6-[illegible]; Famous-Barr, Clayton, Northwest Plaza, Northlands; Stix, Baer & Fuller, Westroads & Crestwood, and the Home Creator's Shoppe, 413 S. Main st., St. Charles.

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016

MAR 2 1968

Serkin To Be Guest Soloist At Symphony Benefit, March 20

Pianist Rudolf Serkin will be guest soloist with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra in a pension fund concert March 20 (8:30 p.m.) in Powell Symphony Hall. Gunther Schuller will be guest conductor.

One week later the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, will become the first visiting orchestra to play in the new symphony hall when it gives a concert, March 27 at 8:30 p.m. The orchestra has not appeared in St. Louis for 53 years.

This will be Serkin's only appearance in St. Louis during the current season. Last year more than 10,000 people heard him in three sold-out Beethoven concerts with the orchestra. The world-renowned pianist, who has always devoted much of his time to education, recently accepted the post of director of the Curtis Music Institute in Philadelphia, where he was formerly head of the piano department. He is also director of the Marlboro Music School and Festival near his Vermont farm.

Schuller was in St. Louis at the recent opening of Powell Symphony Hall where he conducted his own composition, "Fanfare for St. Louis," which was commissioned for the occasion.

Serkin and Schuller are contributing their services for the benefit of the new pension plan for members of the orchestra which went into effect in January of 1967. Under this expanded pension plan, musicians may receive up to 50 per cent of their salaries upon retirement, and provisions are made for payments to musicians' widows. This is the first pension fund concert since Arthur Rubinstein appeared with the orchestra during the 1964-65 season.

Serkin will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1. Also on the program will be "Overture to Oberon" (Von Weber) and Symphony in D Minor (Franck).

The Boston Symphony will play: overture to "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner); Symphony No. 8 in F Minor, Opus 93 (Beethoven) and Symphony No. 1 in D Major (Mahler).

76

ST. LOUIS MARCH 27

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

MAR 24 1968

New England Newsclip

Symphony Opens Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens a two week tour in St. Louis's new Powell Symphony Hall on Wednesday.

The trip includes the orchestra's final concerts outside of Symphony Hall this winter and on its return three weeks will remain of the 87th season.

Following the St. Louis concert, the orchestra's first visit there in over 50 years, the Boston Symphony travels to Chicago, Cincinnati, and Washington prior to giving a closed concert in Symphony Hall next Monday.

On Tuesday, April 2, the orchestra plays in New Haven and then will be in New York for the remainder of the week giving concerts in Philharmonic Hall, Brooklyn's Academy of Music, and Carnegie Hall.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,108 SUN. 566,562

MAR 24 1968

Boston Symphony to Play Three Concerts at Powell

The first visiting orchestra to perform in Powell Symphony Hall will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will play Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. The American premiere of Sergei Prokofiev's "Ivan the Terrible" will be presented on subsequent appearances, Friday at 1:30 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

The Boston orchestra is coming here under the auspices of the St. Louis Symphony Society. Its Wednesday program will be Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

The subscription concerts Friday and Saturday will include Prokofiev's Classical Symphony in addition to "Ivan the Terrible." The latter is a dramatic oratorio arranged for concert from Prokofiev's original score, which was written for a motion picture in 1944.

The oratorio consists of 20 numbers played in five movements. A narrator is used for cohesion. The original work was based on the struggles of Czar Ivan in his reign from 1547 to 1584. The narrator will be Herbert Marshall, director of the Center for Soviet and East European Studies in the Performing Arts and visiting professor of theater at Southern Illinois University at Carbondale.

Soloists will be Miss Edna Mae George, contralto, a member of the music faculty of American University at Washington, and Dale Moore, baritone, professor of voice at SIU, Edwardsville. The Community Choral Society and Concert Chorale of SIU, directed by Leonard Van Camp, will sing.

Tickets for the concerts may be obtained at Powell Hall, 718 North Grand boulevard; Aeolian Ticket office, 1004 Olive street, Famous - Barr stores at Northland, Northwest Plaza and Clayton, and Stix Baer & Fuller stores at Westroads and Crestwood.

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016

MAR 27 1968

Boston Symphony Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will become the first orchestra to visit Powell Symphony Hall at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday when conductor Erich Leinsdorf will direct a program that includes Wagner's Overture to "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 and Mahler's Symphony No. 1.

This will be the Boston Symphony's first visit to St. Louis in 53 years. The last appearance here was in 1915 at the old Odeon Theatre, under the baton of Karl Muck.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here are on sale at Powell Symphony Hall, 718 N. Grand bl., JEfferson 1-1700; the Aeolian ticket office, 1004 Olive st., GEneva 6-0700; Famous-Barr, Clayton, Northwest Plaza, Northlands; Stix, Baer & Fuller, Westroads & Crestwood, and the Home Creator's Shoppe, 413 S. Main st., St. Charles.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,108 SUN. 566,562

MAR 24 1968

Abram Stasyevich (left) and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct unusual concerts in Powell Hall this week. Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony will make its first visit to St. Louis in 53 years for a concert at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday. Stasyevich, who has never conducted before in the United States, will lead the St. Louis symphony and a large chorus in the oratorio he has assembled from Prokofiev's sound track for the 1943 Russian movie, "Ivan the Terrible." Performances will be at 1:30 p.m. Friday and 8:30 p.m. Saturday.

Powell Hall Debut For Prokofiev Work

THE ST. LOUIS SYMPHONY concerts next weekend are attracting a good deal of attention because Prokofiev's "Ivan the Terrible," an oratorio based on sound track music that Prokofiev composed for Sergei Eisenstein in World War II, has not been performed before in the United States.

The conductor will be Abram Stasyevich, making his first appearance in America. He conducted the sound track music in the original "Ivan the Terrible," and was associated with Prokofiev in an earlier movie, "Alexander Nevsky," from which a well-known cantata was drawn. Stasyevich assembled the "Ivan the Terrible" oratorio six years ago and it got enthusiastic reviews in Moscow. He recorded it for the Russian label, Melodiya, and the album was released in this country several months ago on the Angel-Melodiya label.

Stasyevich says he put together the oratorio from 100 pages of manuscript sketches that Prokofiev made after seeing and timing Eisenstein's film clips. These sketches are piano scores, with numerous marginal notes about orchestration. The selection and arrangement for the "Ivan" movie was made by another arranger, so the Stasyevich version differs from the sound track in many details, and incorporates some of the Prokofiev sketches that were never used in the sound track.

THE SCORE is highly melodic and explicit; it is not "difficult" in the way Prokofiev's operas are. Leonard Van Camp's Southern Illinois University (Edwardsville) choruses will take the prominent choral part. Most of the vocal solos are declaimed rather than sung. Dale Moore, baritone, will take the part of Ivan, and Herbert Marshall, who translated the text for the Angel album's libretto, will declaim the introductory speeches of the Narrator. Edna Mae George will have the sung contralto part. Marshall's new English text will be used.

The oratorio, like the movie, celebrates Ivan as the sixteenth-century ruler who defeated the aristocratic boyar regents of Moscow, championed the cause of the people, and extended and unified the Russian dominion. Stasyevich dislikes the word "Terrible" with which the Russian "Groznyi" is always translated in connection with Ivan's name, because although Ivan was a neurotic and violent czar his reign was beneficial to Russia and his name is revered in the Soviet Union.

The conductor's name is pronounced Stas-YEH-vich. —F.P.

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 305,904 SUN. 343,016

MAR 2 1968

Serkin To Be Guest Soloist At Symphony Benefit, March 20

Pianist Rudolf Serkin will be guest soloist with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra in a pension fund concert March 20 (8:30 p.m.) in Powell Symphony Hall. Gunther Schuller will be guest conductor.

One week later the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, will become the first visiting orchestra to play in the new symphony hall when it gives a concert, March 27 at 8:30 p.m. The orchestra has not appeared in St. Louis for 53 years.

This will be Serkin's only appearance in St. Louis during the current season. Last year more than 10,000 people heard him in three sold-out Beethoven concerts with the orchestra. The world-renowned pianist, who has always devoted much of his time to education, recently accepted the post of director of the Curtis Music Institute in Philadelphia, where he was formerly head of the piano department. He is also director of the Marlboro Music School and Festival near his Vermont farm.

Schuller was in St. Louis at the recent opening of Powell Symphony Hall where he conducted his own composition, "Fanfare for St. Louis," which was commissioned for the occasion.

Serkin and Schuller are contributing their services for the benefit of the new pension plan for members of the orchestra which went into effect in January of 1967. Under this expanded pension plan, musicians may receive up to 50 per cent of their salaries upon retirement, and provisions are made for payments to musicians' widows. This is the first pension fund concert since Arthur Rubinstein appeared with the orchestra during the 1964-65 season.

Serkin will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1. Also on the program will be "Overture to Oberon" (Von Weber) and Symphony in D Minor (Franck).

The Boston Symphony will play: overture to "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner); Symphony No. 8 in F Minor, Opus 93 (Beethoven) and Symphony No. 1 in D Major (Mahler).

CHICAGO MARCH 28th

77

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 538,393 SUN. 693,178

MAR 24 1968

Distinguished musical visitors to Chicago in the next seven days include Artur Rubinstein (above), whose piano recital next Sunday is sold out, and conductor Erich Leinsdorf (below), who directs the Boston Symphony Thursday night at Orchestra Hall.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-746 SUN. 1,178,515

MAR 29 1968

...and Boston Plays Here

Erich Leinsdorf

BY PHYLLIS DREAZEN

LAST year at about this time, the Boston Symphony Orchestra took the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's place in Orchestra hall, subscriptionally, while the latter was on tour. Last night the Boston orchestra again filled the Thursday night gap while the Chicago orchestra is on tour. But it was not a subscription concert.

Erich Leinsdorf, his group, and his program were warmly applauded. Both Leinsdorf and his soloist, Joseph Silverstein, acknowledged applause after the first movement of the Beethoven concerto. Respectfully, it was hard to see why. The evening seemed less a fizz than an Alka-Seltzer blah.

There were two extraneous problems and a number of others. First, the orchestra tunes to a higher than normally pitched A, so to some ears it never sounds exactly in tune. Then, Mr. Leinsdorf makes enthusiastic gestures, which is all right, but has taken to singing and making whooshing sounds, and that's a bit distracting.

From the "Fidelio" thru to the "Rosenkavalier" there were problems in both ensemble and balance. Some of both may have been due to the stage acoustics, some to the rigors of touring by night and holding auditions for Tanglewood during the day. Or it may just have been an off night.

In some places, as at the end of the first "Rosenkavalier" waltz when some violins ended almost as an echo, unsemble was very obvious. Most of the rest of the time, things were always almost, but never exactly, together. As for balance, the bassoon, for instance, in the middle movement of the concerto, was lovely but out of context dynamically.

The Boston orchestra has a different sound from ours; curiously it's characteristic brightness was not in evidence last night. More interesting, however, is what seemed to be a pattern in Mr. Leinsdorf's presentations whether, as in the Beethoven, the tempi were on the slow side; or whether, as in the Wagner and Strauss, the tempi were faster.

There is an awareness of bar line and an almost metronomic feeling — whether the tempo is exact or not. And one can always anticipate exactly how the approaching phrase will play. [Endings are always a little speeded.] Yet, there is a kind of tension.

At times the feeling is that the music has been dissected, the pieces worked over and the whole finally reconstituted, tho somehow without architectural or spontaneous punch.

Mr. Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, played the Beethoven like a concertmaster. Also carefully and earnestly. Occasionally he seemed less than comfortable with the ensemble, but he couldn't pull things his way. There were moments of great beauty and sensitivity in his playing, generally in slower places.

The concert was recorded for broadcast over WFMT, Sunday at 1.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erick Leinsdorf, conductor; Joseph Silverstein, violinist. Presented in Orchestra hall, Thursday evening, March 28. The program:

"Fidelio" Overture ..... Beethoven
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 61, in D Major .....Beethoven
Prelude from "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" ..... Strauss

Daily Defender
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
CIRC. 37,[illegible] AVAIL.

MAR 28 1968

Major Symphony Date Tonight

Following the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in St. Louis's new Powell Symphony Hall, the second stop on its two week tour will be at Chicago's Orchestra Hall, Thursday, March 28 at 8:15 p.m.

The trip includes the Orchestra's final concerts outside of Symphony Hall this winter and on its return to Boston will complete the three remaining weeks of the 87th season.

Musical Director Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the first concert of the Boston Symphony after a 50 year absence from St. Louis. Chicago audiences will hear Leinsdorf conduct, Beethoven's "Fidelio Overture," "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D Major Opus 61" with Joseph Silverstein, violinist as soloist; Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde Prelude" and Strauss' "Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

Many citizens of Chicago saw the Negro tenor, George Shirley perform with the symphony on television and have heard its recent recording of the Mahler "3d Symphony" with Shirley Verrett on RCA Victor label, now they can hear the orchestra in person.

Following its appearance here, the Boston Symphony will perform in Cincinnati, Washington, a closed concert in Symphony Hall in Boston on Monday. On Tuesday the Orchestra plays in New Haven and then in New York for the remainder of the first week in April giving concerts in Philharmonic Hall, Brooklyn's Academy of Music, and Carnegie Hall.

The next subscription concert in Symphony Hall will be on April 9, the sixth program of the "Cambridge" series with Lillian Kallier as piano soloist. Julius Rudel will be the guest conductor, April 12 and 13.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 401,[illegible] SAT. 471,928

MAR 29 1968

Boston concert a bomb

By Bernard Jacobson

Maybe by the time this review appears in print I shall have awakened and realized that Thursday night in Orchestra Hall was only a bad dream. But I'm afraid the mental and physical discomfort produced in me by Erich Leinsdorf's concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was too acute for for that.

I was already aware, from several concert-hall experiences in the last few years, that the Boston Symphony is no longer the superb instrument it was a decade or two ago. I could hardly have imagined how far the decay has gone.

At this concert, be it noted, the orchestra itself — the Boston Symphony, the soi-disant "Aristocrat of Orchestras"— actually joined in the applause for the soloist after the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto—at a point where any self-respecting soloist and conductor, far from taking a bow, would politely but firmly raise a hand to ask the audience for silence.

THAT, IT may be said, is the objection of a purist, and hardly a substantial complaint. Alas, there is no lack of the latter, even if one determines to ignore the sort of amorphous programming that follows Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and Violin Concerto with the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and a suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" by Richard Strauss.

The overture was played with a puny insubstantiality that reminded me, more vividly than any professional performance I have heard in years, of what Bernard Shaw used to condemn in the playing of London's Philharmonic Society orchestra in the 1890s: a crippling inability, especially on the part of the strings, to sustain tone.

In vain did Leinsdorf—often with vocal encouragement audible as far back as the 13th row—turn to his violins and urge them on. They never succeeded in doing more than peck the notes, investing this athletic and heroic piece with all the stirring dignity of a polka played on a park bandstand.

ONE THING the first movement of the Violin Concerto must have if it is to make sense is a rocklike steadiness of rhythm in the repeated drum-taps with which it opens. On this occasion, no kind of steadiness was forthcoming at any point in the work. Every time that fundamental rhythm returned, its first two notes were rushed with fatal nervousness.

Treated thus, with no phrase ever seeming to lead to any other phrase, the entire concerto degenerated into a wearisome succession of protrusive ribs, without a backbone to link them together.

As soloist, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein produced a soapy tone hardly conducive to the establishment of lyrical authority. Several important bassoon solos were particularly offensive in their sleazy, saxophonish vibrato. The only players to lift themselves above the general level of mediocrity were principal horn and oboe James Stagliano and Ralph Gomberg.

The technicolored self-indulgence of Leinsdorf's Wagner, and the blatant vulgarity of his Strauss, provided an apt conclusion to the most nauseating orchestral evening I can remember undergoing.

Boston Symphony In Rare Performance

By Robert C. Marsh

One of the ironies of the influence of musicology on criticism is that even minor sins against 18th Century texts can produce an indignant outcry but major offenses against 19th Century music often pass without a word of protest.

Thursday, in Orchestra Hall, the visiting Boston Symphony showed its audience what can be gained when a major work of romantic music—the "Tristan" prelude—is given one of its rare concert performances from the proper text.

Actually, I was supposed to be in London Thursday night. The balance of payments crisis changed my plans, but with a program of this interest to be heard in Chicago, I can't even claim a feeling of patriotic self-denial.

IN 1859 Wagner was in Paris, at work on "Tristan and Isolde." When an opportunity arrived to present music from this unfinished opera in concerts early in 1860, he prepared a conclusion for the prelude that made it a formally and harmonically well-developed work that began in A Minor and closed in A Major.

This is the text conductor Erich Leinsdorf played Thursday.

For concert purposes, it is vastly superior to the familiar version that uses the operatic ending for the prelude and then tacks on the closing moments of Act III.

LEINSDORF'S performance was an admirable one, warm and impassioned in its emotional content, and achieved with the polish long associated with the Boston orchestra.

There is no question that the Boston Symphony of today is a different ensemble from that of 25 years ago. A detailed account of its changes would be interesting, but on the basis of recent encounters it is clear that the orchestra today is better equipped than it was in the past to deal with Central European music. In the "Fidelio" overture and Violin Concerto of Beethoven and a suite from Strauss's "Rosenkavalier," it spoke with a good German accent, unmarked by French or Slavic overtones.

THE CONCERTO provided an opportunity to hear concertmaster Joseph Silverstein in an extended solo role, and it was highly rewarding. This was an introspective view of the score, subordinating virtuosity to lyricism, and exploring the quiet end of the dynamic scale rather than the big sounds.

Interpretatively it was fresh —and convincing evidence that Silverstein is one of the most distinguished American violinists of the younger generation.

One may plausibly argue that all "Rosenkavalier" suites are dreadful, but some are more dreadful than others. The new one, arranged for the Bostonians by their assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, was probably best regarded as what Sir Thomas Beecham used to call a lollipop . . . a sure-fire program closer with bright sounds and good tunes.

78

CINCINNATI MARCH 29

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,587
MAR 30 1968

German Programs Interchanged in Key of 'A'

By Eleanor Bell

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra program announced here some weeks ago, some of sighed and said "Another German-Romantic program which we already have plenty of."

After the Boston musicians piled onto Music Hall stage last night and tuned to their "A," which is somewhat sharper than our "A," Lloyd Haldeman, manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra which sponsored the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert (are you following all this?) announced some program changes.

It seems that here in the sticks our "A," which is the standard 440 vibrations per second as determined by the United States Department of Weights and Measures and to which Music Hall's organ is tuned, is incompatible with the Boston Orchestra's "A," hence the organ could not be used, since it is tuned to the 440 "A."

Well, sir or madam as the case may be, this meant that Richard Strauss' tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has an organ part, could not be played as scheduled. Hence, Mr. Haldeman announced, Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and "Thus Spake Z" were canceled, giving place to Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and Mr. Leinsdorf's own suite from "Der Rosenkavalier," respectively.

FOR GOOD MEASURE, we received Wagner's Prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde." The only number that remained unchanged on the program was Mendelssohn's sturdy "Scotch" Symphony, No. 3 in A Major.

It is difficult to believe but heartening, that when the changes were announced there were people around me who hissed audibly, slapped their programs on their knees and muttered their disgruntlement.

However, we still had a German-Romantic program didn't we?, eminently respectable, eminently predictable, with nary a sound to unsettle or otherwise disturb traditional-minded listeners. It was hardly an eventful concert.

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra is more heavily populated than ours, particularly in the strings. This is a very telling difference, for not only are the Boston Orchestra's strings more numerous, they are smoother, more disciplined, more silky.

As anyone can see, Mr. Leinsdorf's program put no severe strain on the musical intellect. I rather hoped it would. But no one can say it wasn't beautifully played and interpreted. Mr. Leinsdorf is an executive conductor. He brings things to pass. He and his musicians are alert. There is a keen rapport between the baton and the attack and release, the ritard and the give and take within the beat.

It was good to hear an orchestra of this caliber, so business-like, so good at their job, and no funny-business. They made Mendelssohn endearingly pretty. "Tristan" was molded and smoothed into one long graceful line, and Mr. Leinsdorf's own "Rosenkavalier" Suite was a gem of distillation, of wit and style.

(Continued on Page 7)

Boston Symphony

(Continued from Page 6)

Glenn Robinson, chief percussionist of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, had the fun of playing cymbals in "Rosenkavalier" because of a shortage in the Boston roster last night.

About that concert "A." All orchestras on the east coast tune higher than our 440. We in the middle west take the standard "A." On the west sosst, "A" is lower than it is here. Nobody knows why. Maybe Freud could tell us.

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,587
MAR 26 1968

Boston Symphony Plays Here Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, will perform a special concert in Music Hall at 8:30 p. m. Friday, March 29. The event is sponsored by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The Prelude to Act I of "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A Major, and Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" will be performed under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

Mr. Leinsdorf's last appearance here was as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in 1951. He had been associated with Arturo Toscanini in Salzburg and with Bruno Walter in Florence before becoming a conductor of the Vienna Opera and the Metropolitan Opera in New York.

MR. LEINSDORF became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962 after the retirement of Charles Munch and is the 11th conductor to hold this conducting position.

Before his tenure with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was noted chiefly as an opera conductor. However, in 1943, he became music director of The Cleveland Orchestra. After serving in World War II, he took over the Rochester Philharmonic and brought it to national prominence.

IN 1956, Mr. Leinsdorf returned to opera conducting, first at the New York City Opera and then at the Metropolitan Opera where he continued until 1962.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are now available at the Symphony Box Office, Baldwin's, 29 W. Fourth street.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 191,679 SUN. 289,017
MAR 26 1968

Famed Maestro

Erich Leinsdorf will be on the podium Friday evening, at 8:30 p. m., at Music Hall, to conduct the world-famed 105-member Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of works by Mendelssohn, Wagner and Richard Strauss. Tickets for this special CSO-sponsored concert are available at the Symphony Box Office or Shillito's.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

THE CHRONICLE
CINCINNATI, O.
W (LABOR) CIRC. 22,818
MAR-21-68 N X

CSO To Present Boston Sym'ony

Announcement has been made by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra of the music to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its special appearance March 29. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the concert in Music Hall at 8:30 p.m.

The program will begin with the popular Prelude to Act One of Die Meistersinger Von Nurnberg by Richard Wagner. This will be followed by The Symphony No. 3 in A, Op. 56 ("Scotch") by Felix Mendelssohn. After intermission, the concert concludes with the symphonic poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra, for organ and orchestra by Richard Strauss.

Great Conductor

Erich Leinsdorf is just one in a long line of great conductors who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra since it was founded in 1881. Since 1920, there have been just four Music Directors, beginning with Pierre Monteux, who held the post until 1924. From then until his retirement in 1949, the BSO was headed by Serge Koussevitzky. He was succeeded by Charles Munch, who resigned to guest conduct in 1962. Since then, the Orchestra has been guided by Maestro Leinsdorf, whose reputation had already been established through his years in Rochester, Cleveland, and at the Metropolitan Opera.

German Specialist

Mr. Leinsdorf has always held the German composers as his specialty, and in fact conducted most Germanic operas while at the MET. He has won three Best Performance Awards from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences and was named Musician of the Year in 1963 by Musical America.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Special Concert are now available from the Symphony Box Office, located in Baldwin's, 29 West 4th Street; or they may be charged at Shillito's Ticket Center in downtown and suburban stores.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

THE OHIO PIKER
CINCINNATI, O.
W - CIRC. 2,170
MAR-21-68 N X

All-German Program To Be Presented

Announcement has been made by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra of the music to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its special appearance March 29. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the concert in Music Hall at 8:30 p.m.

The program will begin with the popular Prelude to Act One of Die Meistersinger Von Nurnberg by Richard Wagner. This will be followed by The Symphony No. 3 in A, Op. 56 ("Scotch") by Felix Mendelssohn. After intermission, the concert concludes with the symphonic poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra, for organ and orchestra by Richard Strauss.

Erich Leinsdorf is just one in a long line of great conductors who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra since it was founded in 1881. Since 1920, there have been just four Music Directors, beginning with Pierre Monteux, who held the post until 1924. From then until his retirement in 1949, the BSO was headed by Serge Koussevitzky. He was succeeded by Charles Munch, who resigned to guest conduct in 1962. Since then, the Orchestra has been guided by Maestro Leinsdorf, whose reputation had already been established through his years in Rochester, Cleveland, and at the Metropolitan Opera.

Mr. Leinsdorf has always held the German composers as his specialty, and in fact conducted most Germanic operas while at the MET. He has won three Best Performance Awards from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences and was named Musicial of the Year in 1963 by Musical America.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Special Concert are now available from the Symphony Box Office, located in Baldwin's 29 West 4th Street; or they may be charged at Shillito's Ticket Center in downtown and suburban stores.

78

CINCINNATI MARCH 29

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,587
MAR 30 1968

German Programs Interchanged in Key of 'A'

By Eleanor Bell

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra program announced here some weeks ago, some of sighed and said "Another German-Romantic program which we already have plenty of."

After the Boston musicians piled onto Music Hall stage last night and tuned to their "A," which is somewhat sharper than our "A," Lloyd Haldeman, manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra which sponsored the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert (are you following all this?) announced some program changes.

It seems that here in the sticks our "A," which is the standard 440 vibrations per second as determined by the United States Department of Weights and Measures and to which Music Hall's organ is tuned, is incompatible with the Boston Orchestra's "A," hence the organ could not be used, since it is tuned to the 440 "A."

Well, sir or madam as the case may be, this meant that Richard Strauss' tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has an organ part, could not be played as scheduled. Hence, Mr. Haldeman announced, Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and "Thus Spake Z" were canceled, giving place to Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and Mr. Leinsdorf's own suite from "Der Rosenkavalier," respectively.

FOR GOOD MEASURE, we received Wagner's Prelude to Act I of "Tristan and Isolde." The only number that remained unchanged on the program was Mendelssohn's sturdy "Scotch" Symphony, No. 3 in A Major.

It is difficult to believe but heartening, that when the changes were announced there were people around me who hissed audibly, slapped their programs on their knees and muttered their disgruntlement.

However, we still had a German-Romantic program didn't we?, eminently respectable, eminently predictable, with nary a sound to unsettle or otherwise disturb traditional-minded listeners. It was hardly an eventful concert.

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra is more heavily populated than ours, particularly in the strings. This is a very telling difference, for not only are the Boston Orchestra's strings more numerous, they are smoother, more disciplined, more silky.

As anyone can see, Mr. Leinsdorf's program put no severe strain on the musical intellect. I rather hoped it would. But no one can say it wasn't beautifully played and interpreted. Mr. Leinsdorf is an executive conductor. He brings things to pass. He and his musicians are alert. There is a keen rapport between the baton and the attack and release, the ritard and the give and take within the beat.

It was good to hear an orchestra of this caliber, so business-like, so good at their job, and no funny-

(Continued on Page 7)

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

Boston Symphony

(Continued from Page 6)

business. They made Mendelssohn endearingly pretty. "Tristan" was molded and smoothed into one long graceful line, and Mr. Leinsdorf's own "Rosenkavalier" Suite was a gem of distillation, of wit and style.

Glenn Robinson, chief percussionist of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, had the fun of playing cymbals in "Rosenkavalier" because of a shortage in the Boston roster last night.

About that concert "A." All orchestras on the east coast tune higher than our 440. We in the middle west take the standard "A." On the west soast, "A" is lower than it is here. Nobody knows why. Maybe Freud could tell us.

The Cincinnati Post
AND TIMES STAR
D. 243,587
MAR 26 1968

Boston Symphony Plays Here Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, will perform a special concert in Music Hall at 8:30 p. m. Friday, March 29. The event is sponsored by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The Prelude to Act I of "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A Major, and Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" will be performed under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

Mr. Leinsdorf's last appearance here was as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in 1951. He had been associated with Arturo Toscanini in Salzburg and with Bruno Walter in Florence before becoming a conductor of the Vienna Opera and the Metropolitan Opera in New York.

MR. LEINSDORF became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962 after the retirement of Charles Munch and is the 11th conductor to hold this conducting position.

Before his tenure with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was noted chiefly as an opera conductor. However, in 1943, he became music director of The Cleveland Orchestra. After serving in World War II, he took over the Rochester Philharmonic and brought it to national prominence.

IN 1956, Mr. Leinsdorf returned to opera conducting, first at the New York City Opera and then at the Metropolitan Opera where he continued until 1962.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are now available at the Symphony Box Office, Baldwin's, 29 W. Fourth street.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 191,679 SUN. 289,017
MAR 26 1968

Famed Maestro

Erich Leinsdorf will be on the podium Friday evening, at 8:30 p. m., at Music Hall, to conduct the world-famed 105-member Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of works by Mendelssohn, Wagner and Richard Strauss. Tickets for this special CSO-sponsored concert are available at the Symphony Box Office or Shillito's.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

THE CHRONICLE
CINCINNATI, O.
W (LABOR) CIRC. 22,813
MAR-21-68 N X

CSO To Present Boston Sym'ony

Announcement has been made by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra of the music to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its special appearance March 29. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the concert in Music Hall at 8:30 p.m.

The program will begin with the popular Prelude to Act One of Die Meistersinger Von Nurnberg by Richard Wagner. This will be followed by The Symphony No. 3 in A, Op. 56 ("Scotch") by Felix Mendelssohn. After intermission, the concert concludes with the symphonic poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra, for organ and orchestra by Richard Strauss.

Great Conductor

Erich Leinsdorf is just one in a long line of great conductors who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra since it was founded in 1881. Since 1920, there have been just four Music Directors, beginning with Pierre Monteux, who held the post until 1924. From then until his retirement in 1949, the BSO was headed by Serge Koussevitzky. He was succeeded by Charles Munch, who resigned to guest conduct in 1962. Since then, the Orchestra has been guided by Maestro Leinsdorf, whose reputation had already been established through his years in Rochester, Cleveland, and at the Metropolitan Opera.

German Specialist

Mr. Leinsdorf has always held the German composers as his specialty, and in fact conducted most Germanic operas while at the MET. He has won three Best Performance Awards from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences and was named Musician of the Year in 1963 by Musical America.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Special Concert are now available from the Symphony Box Office, located in Baldwin's, 29 West 4th Street; or they may be charged at Shillito's Ticket Center in downtown and suburban stores.

THE OHIO PAPER
CINCINNATI, O.
W - CIRC. 2,170
MAR-21-68 N X

All-German Program To Be Presented

Announcement has been made by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra of the music to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its special appearance March 29. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the concert in Music Hall at 8:30 p.m.

The program will begin with the popular Prelude to Act One of Die Meistersinger Von Nurnberg by Richard Wagner. This will be followed by The Symphony No. 3 in A, Op. 56 ("Scotch") by Felix Mendelssohn. After intermission, the concert concludes with the symphonic poem, Also Sprach Zarathustra, for organ and orchestra by Richard Strauss.

Erich Leinsdorf is just one in a long line of great conductors who have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra since it was founded in 1881. Since 1920, there have been just four Music Directors, beginning with Pierre Monteux, who held the post until 1924. From then until his retirement in 1949, the BSO was headed by Serge Koussevitzky. He was succeeded by Charles Munch, who resigned to guest conduct in 1962. Since then, the Orchestra has been guided by Maestro Leinsdorf, whose reputation had already been established through his years in Rochester, Cleveland, and at the Metropolitan Opera.

Mr. Leinsdorf has always held the German composers as his specialty, and in fact conducted most Germanic operas while at the MET. He has won three Best Performance Awards from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences and was named Musicial of the Year in 1963 by Musical America.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Special Concert are now available from the Symphony Box Office, located in Baldwin's 29 West 4th Street; or they may be charged at Shillito's Ticket Center in downtown and suburban stores.

YOUTH CONCERTS

79

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

SEP 30 1967 New England Newsclip

HENRY CABOT TESTS WOTAN'S SWORD (LeRoy Ryan Photo)

Danny Kaye Misses BSO Party

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

It almost happened.

Danny Kaye was on his day to Boston for Friday's B.S.O. Valhalla party. Can you see him with all those yellow-braided Valkyries?

It seems he was so grateful to the Boston Symphony ("I love the place anyhow. It's the last great outpost") for lending him Harry Ellis Dickson for two weeks of his Israeli youth concert tour that he offered to fly on for the fund-raising fun at the Prudential party. "He was at the airport when they changed the Israel concert schedule," Harry told Pres. Henry Cabot, who said wistfully, "Danny would have loved this party."

Neither Wagner's warrior maidens nor Boston's symphonygoers pay any attention to a little rain. Which is just as well, since both had top billing at the opening of the 87th season of Henry Lee Higginson's "great experiment in music."

It was Die Walkure at the New England Conservatory for the seminar meeting of the Friends, who heard famous recordings and talked Wagnerians' preferences and prejudices with the conservatory's able Mrs. Morgan before the opening concert.

Mrs. John Carter, Mrs. Herbert Motley, Mrs. Charles Mason, Mrs. Anthony Kutten and other knowledgeable music-mindeds shared sherry and Conservatory box lunches in an especially friendly and informative session. There are seven Friends seminar choices this year and a symphon course each concert week.

Over at the Prudential, about the same time, things were slightly frantic. The truck which had all the Walkure props that Mr. Leinsdorf couldn't, in all conscience, trundle into freshly painted Symphony Hall, had disappeared. Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, who hasn't missed a symphony opening for more than 70 of the more than 90 gracious years, sent beautiful flowers for the much-advertised Valhalla party, and there was a beautiful swan in ice, but where on where, were Wotan's sword, the proverbial ash tree and all those rocky crags?

It was 2 o'clock before the Symphony's No. 1 idea gal, Fran Fahnestock, and designer Carl Crossman and two Symphony Hall engineers finally found the scenery. The first guests from Symphony were due at 4:05. The costumes from the Metropolitan Opera were made for Germany in Winter, not Boston in 70 degree temeratures.

Symphony Friends, old and new, flailing up in express elevators to the Pru's 49th floor from 4 on, found all serene and as promised. There was the ash tree, from which Mr. Cabot duly pulled the sword which had a latter-day lucky number tag on entitling winners Nick and Nancy Danforth to a week-end at Tanglewood next Summer.

There were short, good speeches,—by Leinsdorf, who thinks the B.S.O. offers a "pretty good world series batting average with the highest concert count in the league"; Cabot, who believes, along with founder Higginson, in holding the price line so that "those to whom music is a breath of life may still come to Symphony Hall," and Philip Allen, fund chairman, who reminded everyone of the Ford "matching fund" obligations and toyed with the idea of pledging his captive 49th floor gathering.

There were trustees, and longtime Friends, and brand-new ones, too, like debutante Robin Blake, who had lots of questions to ask B.S.O. author and raconteur Dickson about his best friend, Danny. Harry, who founded Boston's Symphony Youth Concert, will join Danny next week and come home by way of Paris and a new score or two.

Debbie Fiedler brought word from Daddy, who's in Japan this week with The Pops Orchestra. Her sister Yummy has a new and exciting job with the National Symphony.

Special hoy-a-ta-hoy credits belong to Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. Francis Hatch Jr., Mrs. Harvey Bundy Jr., Mrs. Edward Sherman, Mrs. Peter Smith and other Boston beauties who wore their braids and capes with an air Mrs. Hans Estin, Mrs. Thomas Gannett and Mrs. Richard Thompson were Mrs. Fahnestock's able crew, and trustees lending a hand were Henry Laughlin and Sidney Rabb, Rt. Rev. Edward Murray, Harold Hodgkinson, Abram Berkowitz and others.

Friends by the score came on from Symphony's familiar vows — Mrs. Sewall Fessenden, Mrs. Robert Daley, Mrs. John Coolidge, Mrs. Byron Elliott, Mrs. Stephen Harris, Mrs. Paul Schmid, Mrs. Bayard Tuckerman Jr., Mrs. George Whitney, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. Robert Lawrence, Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mrs. Louis Cabot (the invincible Women's Council chairmen for Symphony) German Consul General and Mrs. Edgar von Schmidt-Pauli, William Hunnewell, Mrs. Frank Allen and scores more.

An amazing party.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

NOV 10 1967 New England Newsclip

Youth Concert For 2500 Due

Some 2500 schoolboys and girls Saturday will attend the second of this season's Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, played by Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson.

All the music was written by famous composers, past and prfesent, ranging from Beethoven and his "Heroic" Symphony to Bernstein and his "West Side Story" and Sousa and his world-famous march, "Stars and Stripes Forever."

A selection created specially for this program will be "The Incredible Musicians," by Emil Kornsand, violinist and composer. It is an orchestral version of the story of the donkey, dog, cat and rooster who turned themselves into the Town Musicians of Bremen. The various episodes will be narrated by Sonya Hamlin, of WGBH-TV.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

NOV 16 1967 New England Newsclip

Happiness Is . . .

Danny Kaye and the "Gadna"

By THELMA WINKLER ORENSTEIN
(Special to the Advocate)

At this writing, I am enroute to Winnepeg, Canada, to join "Gadna," an Israeli youth organization comprised of one hundred talented musicians whose ages are from fifteen to twenty-two. (Ali Eban, son of Abba Eban, Foreign Minister of Israel, is, at age seventeen, first clarinetist with this orchestra.)

Conducted by Danny Kaye, this group has played ten concerts in Israel and Europe and plans to give more performances in Canada, Mexico, South America and the United States. The purpose of this endeavor is to introduce people all over the world to this enthusiastic, dedicated symphonic group—to create good will among our own Jewish people and in other nations—and to raise badly needed funds for Israel. Harry Ellis Dickson, eminent assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flew to Israel with his good friend, Danny Kaye, to prepare the orchestra for the tour.

While in Israel last summer, I found it very exciting to chat with Danny Kaye. I learned that this unusual man, who many feel is the most versatile entertainer of our time, in addition to raising a large amount selling Israel Bonds in Hollywood, rejected a starring role in a London play to perform for the young Israeli soldiers. He was severely critized by the London press, which did not apprise the general public that Mr. Kaye repaid in full all concerned for my expenses incurred by his not appearing in that venture.

It is five months since Danny Kaye has left his own career in abeyance in order to work for Israel. May we all salute this great entertainer, humanitarian and dispenser of plain happiness!

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150

NOV 26 1967 New England Newsclip

Students Hear Boston Symphony

By MARIE BERNIER
JA Special Correspondent

Two busloads of Normandin students, under the supervision of Edward Peters, the music teacher, were entertained recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston.

This concert was one of three one-hour programs, in a series of Youth Concerts.

The first program, entitled "What's in a Name?" consisted of music by Brahms, Stravinsky, Beethoven, Vivaldi, Korns and Sousa. There was also a number composed especially for the Youth Concert.

The second program, which is to be held on Jan. 13 and 20, is entitled "Can Jazz Be Classical?"

"Festival Program" is the name of the last concert, to be held on March 9 and 16. This program will consist of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra.

The music lovers of Normandin, who attended the first concert, are anticipating the next two programs.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

NOV 5 1967 New England Newsclip

Symphony Series Opens

2500 at Youth Concert

Twenty-five hundred boys and girls yesterday spent their Saturday morning off from school by enthusiastically taking up some studies in music, art, and history at Symphony Hall.

This was the occasion of the opening program of the ninth season of the Youth Concerts played by Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson. By a new plan, many of the youngsters had the opportunity, before "curtain time" at eleven o'clock, to view a collection of paintings by American artists, and hear comments on them by an expert, Mrs. Latrelle Adelson. That was at the front of the Hall.

MEANWHILE, groups totaling about two hundred, in the Ancient Instruments Room at the back of the Hall, were enabled to examine and hear a discussion of, the rare specimens of the ancestors of modern instruments, belonging to the Casadesus Collection.

The concert program was made up of music written for special occasions by composers of the past and present. Comments were made by Sonya Hamlin, known for her part in The 21-Inch Classroom of WGBH-TV. In connection with Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony, she projected color slides — a well-received innovation. The youngsters also gave hearty applause to the work of a living composer, Emil Kornsand, who was introduced. His music was based on the story of the donkey, cat, dog, and rooster who turned themselves into the Town Musicians of Bremen. The narration was by Miss Hamlin.

ANOTHER WOMAN on the program, who met with high approval, was Lois Schaefer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's flute section. She was the dazzling soloist in the Concerto for Piccolo and Orchestra, by the old Italian master, Vivaldi.

The concert was topped off by Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." Its rousing performance sent the youngsters pouring out of Symphony Hall with faces and voices registering sentiments of a Saturday morning well spent.

YOUTH CONCERTS

79

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
SEP 30 1967
New England Newsclip

HENRY CABOT TESTS WOTAN'S SWORD (LeRoy Ryan Photo)

Danny Kaye Misses BSO Party

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

It almost happened.

Danny Kaye was on his day to Boston for Friday's B.S.O. Valhalla party. Can you see him with all those yellow-braided Valkyries?

It seems he was so grateful to the Boston Symphony ("I love the place anyhow. It's the last great outpost") for lending him Harry Ellis Dickson for two weeks of his Israeli youth concert tour that he offered to fly on for the fund-raising fun at the Prudential party. "He was at the airport when they changed the Israel concert schedule," Harry told Pres. Henry Cabot, who said wistfully, "Danny would have loved this party."

Neither Wagner's warrior maidens nor Boston's symphonygoers pay any attention to a little rain. Which is just as well, since both had top billing at the opening of the 87th season of Henry Lee Higginson's "great experiment in music."

It was Die Walkure at the New England Conservatory for the seminar meeting of the Friends, who heard famous recordings and talked Wagnerians' preferences and prejudices with the conservatory's able Mrs. Morgan before the opening concert.

Mrs. John Carter, Mrs. Herbert Motley, Mrs. Charles Mason, Mrs. Anthony Kutten and other knowledgeable music-mindeds shared sherry and Conservatory box lunches in an especially friendly and informative session. There are seven Friends seminar choices this year and a symphon course each concert week.

Over at the Prudential, about the same time, things were slightly frantic. The truck which had all the Walkure props that Mr. Leinsdorf couldn't, in all conscience, trundle into freshly painted Symphony Hall, had disappeared. Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, who hasn't missed a symphony opening for more than 70 of the more than 90 gracious years, sent beautiful flowers for the much-advertised Valhalla party, and there was a beautiful swan in ice, but where on where, were Wotan's sword, the proverbial ash tree and all those rocky crags?

It was 2 o'clock before the Symphony's No. 1 idea gal, Fran Fahnestock, and designer Carl Crossman and two Symphony Hall engineers finally found the scenery. The first guests from Symphony were due at 4:05. The costumes from the Metropolitan Opera were made for Germany in Winter, not Boston in 70 degree temeratures.

Symphony Friends, old and new, flailing up in express elevators to the Pru's 49th floor from 4 on, found all serene and as promised. There was the ash tree, from which Mr. Cabot duly pulled the sword which had a latter-day lucky number tag on entitling winners Nick and Nancy Danforth to a week-end at Tanglewood next Summer.

There were short, good speeches,—by Leinsdorf, who thinks the B.S.O. offers a "pretty good world series batting average with the highest concert count in the league"; Cabot, who believes, along with founder Higginson, in holding the price line so that "those to whom music is a breath of life may still come to Symphony Hall," and Philip Allen, fund chairman, who reminded everyone of the Ford "matching fund" obligations and toyed with the idea of pledging his captive 49th floor gathering.

There were trustees, and longtime Friends, and brand-new ones, too, like debutante Robin Blake, who had lots of questions to ask B.S.O. author and raconteur Dickson about his best friend, Danny. Harry, who founded Boston's Symphony Youth Concert, will join Danny next week and come home by way of Paris and a new score or two.

Debbie Fiedler brought word from Daddy, who's in Japan this week with The Pops Orchestra. Her sister Yummy has a new and exciting job with the National Symphony.

Special hoy-a-ta-hoy credits belong to Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. Francis Hatch Jr., Mrs. Harvey Bundy Jr., Mrs. Edward Sherman, Mrs. Peter Smith and other Boston beauties who wore their braids and capes with an air Mrs. Hans Estin, Mrs. Thomas Gannett and Mrs. Richard Thompson were Mrs. Fahnestock's able crew, and trustees lending a hand were Henry Laughlin and Sidney Rabb, Rt. Rev. Edward Murray, Harold Hodgkinson, Abram Berkowitz and others.

Friends by the score came on from Symphony's familiar vows — Mrs. Sewall Fessenden, Mrs. Robert Daley, Mrs. John Coolidge, Mrs. Byron Elliott, Mrs. Stephen Harris, Mrs. Paul Schmid, Mrs. Bayard Tuckerman Jr., Mrs. George Whitney, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. Robert Lawrence, Mrs. Norman Cahners, Mrs. Louis Cabot (the invincible Women's Council chairmen for Symphony) German Consul General and Mrs. Edgar von Schmidt-Pauli, William Hunnewell, Mrs. Frank Allen and scores more.

An amazing party.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250
NOV 10 1967
New England Newsclip

Youth Concert For 2500 Due

Some 2500 schoolboys and girls Saturday will attend the second of this season's Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, played by Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson.

All the music was written by famous composers, past and prfesent, ranging from Beethoven and his "Heroic" Symphony to Bernstein and his "West Side Story" and Sousa and his world-famous march, "Stars and Stripes Forever."

A selection created specially for this program will be "The Incredible Musicians," by Emil Kornsand, violinist and composer. It is an orchestral version of the story of the donkey, dog, cat and rooster who turned themselves into the Town Musicians of Bremen. The various episodes will be narrated by Sonya Hamlin, of WGBH-TV.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 16 1967
New England Newsclip

Happiness Is . . .

Danny Kaye and the "Gadna"

By THELMA WINKLER ORENSTEIN
(Special to the Advocate)

At this writing, I am enroute to Winnepeg, Canada, to join "Gadna," an Israeli youth organization comprised of one hundred talented musicians whose ages are from fifteen to twenty-two. (Ali Eban, son of Abba Eban, Foreign Minister of Israel, is, at age seventeen, first clarinetist with this orchestra.)

Conducted by Danny Kaye, this group has played ten concerts in Israel and Europe and plans to give more performances in Canada, Mexico, South America and the United States. The purpose of this endeavor is to introduce people all over the world to this enthusiastic, dedicated symphonic group—to create good will among our own Jewish people and in other nations—and to raise badly needed funds for Israel. Harry Ellis Dickson, eminent assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flew to Israel with his good friend, Danny Kaye, to prepare the orchestra for the tour.

While in Israel last summer, I found it very exciting to chat with Danny Kaye. I learned that this unusual man, who many feel is the most versatile entertainer of our time, in addition to raising a large amount selling Israel Bonds in Hollywood, rejected a starring role in a London play to perform for the young Israeli soldiers. He was severely critized by the London press, which did not apprise the general public that Mr. Kaye reaid in full all concerned for ny expenses incurred by his ot appearing in that venture.

It is five months since Danny Kaye has left his own career in abeyance in order to work for Israel. May we all salute this great entertainer, humanitarian and dispenser of plain happiness!

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
NOV 26 1967
New England Newsclip

Students Hear Boston Symphony

By MARIE BERNIER
JA Special Correspondent

Two busloads of Normandin students, under the supervision of Edward Peters, the music teacher, were entertained recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston.

This concert was one of three one-hour programs, in a series of Youth Concerts.

The first program, entitled "What's in a Name?" consisted of music by Brahms, Stravinsky, Beethoven, Vivaldi, Korns and Sousa. There was also a number composed especially for the Youth Concert.

The second program, which is to be held on Jan. 13 and 20, is entitled "Can Jazz Be Classical?"

"Festival Program" is the name of the last concert, to be held on March 9 and 16. This program will consist of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra.

The music lovers of Normandin, who attended the first concert, are anticipating the next two programs.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
NOV 5 1967

Symphony Series Opens

2500 at Youth Concert

Twenty-five hundred boys and girls yesterday spent their Saturday morning off from school by enthusiastically taking up some studies in music, art, and history at Symphony Hall.

This was the occasion of the opening program of the ninth season of the Youth Concerts played by Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson. By a new plan, many of the youngsters had the opportunity, before "curtain time" at eleven o'clock, to view a collection of paintings by American artists, and hear comments on them by an expert, Mrs. Latrelle Adelson. That was at the front of the Hall.

MEANWHILE, groups totaling about two hundred, in the Ancient Instruments Room at the back of the Hall, were enabled to examine and hear a discussion of, the rare specimens of the ancestors of modern instruments, belonging to the Casadesus Collection.

The concert program was made up of music written for special occasions by composers of the past and present. Comments were made by Sonya Hamlin, known for her part in The 21-Inch Classroom of WGBH-TV. In connection with Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony, she projected color slides — a well-received innovation. The youngsters also gave hearty applause to the work of a living composer, Emil Kornsand, who was introduced. His music was based on the story of the donkey, cat, dog, and rooster who turned themselves into the Town Musicians of Bremen. The narration was by Miss Hamlin.

ANOTHER WOMAN on the program, who met with high approval, was Lois Schaefer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's flute section. She was the dazzling soloist in the Concerto for Piccolo and Orchestra, by the old Italian master, Vivaldi.

The concert was topped off by Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." Its rousing performance sent the youngsters pouring out of Symphony Hall with faces and voices registering sentiments of a Saturday morning well spent.

80

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Thursday, December 21, 1967

Notes on Music

Children's Concert Tickets

Tickets are still available for the special children's concert to be presented by the Albany Symphony Orchestra and the Pick-Pickwick Puppets in the Albany High School Auditorium at 3:00 p.m. Friday afternoon, Dec. 29.

The program will run an hour and a half and is restricted to children between the ages of eight and twelve.

Tickets are on sale at the Van Curler Music Store, Macy's and the Symphony office in the DH Building, Albany.

The Maria College Christmas Canticle which was performed by the college Glee Club and the Our Lady of Angels Seminary Choir last Sunday at the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception will be heard over the Christmas weekend on two local radio stations.

A half-hour excerpt will be played on WROW-AM and FM at 6:15 Sunday night, Christmas Eve. A full hour will be broadcast on WHRL at 4:00 p.m. Monday, Christmas Day.

The program was directed by J. Robert Sheehan, organist at the Cathedral.

The original version of Beethoven's "Fidelio" which was performed by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last summer will be broadcast at 2:00 p.m. on Friday afternoon on WAMC-FM. Soloists for the performance include tenor George Shirley, bass Ara Berberian, soprano Ellen Pract and soprano Hanne-Lore Kuhse.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

DEC 3 1967

New England Newspaper

Maestro Danny

Kaye on World Tour With Young Israelis

By MARGO MILLER

Danny Kaye's problem at the first rehearsal was reminding his young Israeli orchestra that he was the comic, not they. Maestro Kaye, whose conducting debut was in April 1957 with the Boston Symphony, is presently on a world tour with Gadna, an orchestra of 104 teen-agers, sponsored by the Israel Army.

Word of Kaye and his troupe comes from Harry Ellis Dickson of the Boston Symphony.

Ever since Kaye took the roof off Symphony Hall by calling Charles Munch "Chuck," imitating other conductors and "conducting" the audience (who usually see only the flying tails of a music director), the comic has had Dickson as friend and mentor.

So when Kaye felt that after the June War Israel youth should add to the gaiety of nations (and raise funds for Israel), Dickson flew over to help with the Gadna rehearsals.

"Danny doesn't read music. We listen to records and he memorizes," says Dickson, a member of the B.S.O. first violins who conducts at the Youth, Concerts, Pops and Esplanade.

"But that doesn't mean he isn't a musician. He's instinctive. Things like telling the kids 'soft doesn't mean slower,' which is a common mistake."

Musicians in Gadna include clarinetist Ali Eban, son of the Foreign Minister Abba Eban. But no attention is paid to rank, Dickson says.

Instead, the kids worried whether one of their cellis's would recover from his June War burns in time to rejoin the orchestra tour.

Gadna itself is a kind of youth corps for ages 14-18. Gadna's orchestra, formed in 1954, is not necessarily for teen-agers who intend a professional musical career. Nevertheless, the orchestra has toured widely to good reviews and three times has won first prize at Holland's International Competition for Amateur Orchestras. Gadna's permanent conductor is Chalom Ronly-Riklis.

Ronly-Riklis leads off the tour program, usually with a Berlioz or Verdi overture. Then Danny comes on. According to Dickson, his act is much as it was in Boston. There is that bit about choosing a baton and a chord to match. The biggest stick gets the biggest bang and so on down to that stub one supposes merits dead silence. The first half finale ends as Danny, having conducted the audience, asks them to rise to receive the applause of the orchestra, says, well, while you're all up, why not take an intermission break.

Danny Kaye's road to the podium began one April when he wandered into the Symphony Hall backstage. He was currently in town appearing at the Colonial in his International Show — chimpanzees, Spanish dancers and the like. Dickson said something to the visitor like "You're Danny Kaye, aren't you?"

And when Danny countered by asking how a guy got into the conducting business, Dickson led him straight to Munch.

When it turned out that the orchestra had no open dates, Kaye agreed to tryout at an open rehearsal one evening. The concert produced $9953 for the orchestra's pension fund and there were additional reasons to laugh all the way to the bank: Danny's imitations of the "profile" conducter, the coffee-grinder conductor, the meat-chopper and the emotional maestro who gets so involved in the music that he finally tumbles off the stand. Chuck Munch thought Danny "tres drole."

Now a veteran conductor, Danny likes to do a piece straight once in a while. Dickson thought the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin" suitable to display orchestra and conductor. But Israel stills bans Wagner.

In what must be the political-musical in-joke of the year, Danny subtituted the Triumphal March from "Aida." The Verdi opera was written for the opening of the Suez Canal.

As official guest conductor of Gadna, Kaye is not allowed to speak to the audiences—in Italy, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Canada and South America —about Middle East politics. But he does invite them to visit Israel.

One Boston touch goes wherever Danny Kaye conducts. It is a statement, devised 10 years ago by the B.S.O.'s Mary Smith, which appears under Kaye's name.

"The management," it reads, "takes no responsibility for this part of the program."

With Danny away, the Boston Symphony is talking of getting some 39-year-old fiddler fellow to fill in.

'Hel-lo, won-der-ful-est' from a little angel

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Hundreds of New England families who are concerned with the world outside their own small community made at least one trip to Symphony Hall this week-end. And some, like members of the Japan Society of Boston whose president is Russell Codman, were there both on Friday to hear the brilliant young Japanese orchestra Arthur Fiedler persuaded into making a U.S. visit and on Sunday for the Little Angels of Korea—one of the most rewarding performances to be found anywhere.

Saturday morning scores of towns were represented in the sold-out audience that opened this season's Youth Concerts, which the Boston Symphony's Harry Ellis Dickson flew home from Israel and a youth concert program with Danny Kaye, to conduct. The BSO's best acconteur and the founder of the youth concerts here, was "loaned" by Symphony to help his lifetime friend Danny establish the concerts in Israel in addition to UNICEF programming.

The remarkable series, which celebrates its 10th anniversary this season, owes much to the people who have spent weeks out of every year working on the overwhelming coordination involved in getting busloads of boys and girls from more than 60 towns in and out of Symphony Hall on schedule six Saturdays a winter.

Heroines of this worthwhile cause include founder-member of the board Felicia (Mrs. Anthony) Kutten who has worked with Henry Cabot and other Symphony Board members, Mrs. Manuel Kurland, Mrs. William Morton, Mrs. Hollis Hunnewell, Mrs. Ralph Katz, Miss Ellen Stillman Mrs. Albert Titcomb, Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. Barton Loomis, Mrs. Stephen Paine and so many more.

★

"Hel-lo, won-der-ful-est" was the greeting the first of the "Little Angels" carefully as the Korean children came out of the bus at Capt and Mrs. Thomas Morris's Wellesley Hills home Saturday, and then, their "speech", delivered, raced up the path to hug their best-known American friends. It was at the Morris's last year that the 6-to-14 year olds shared their first American home and they've been waiting a year to come back.

Navy League Capt Tom Morris and his attractive, capable wife had a house—and a tent—full Saturday to welcome the talented young Koreans back.

Adm Roy Benson and his friendly, pretty wife, Adm William Childress and his nice wife, Lt. Gov. and Mrs. Francis Sargent, Capt Larry Kelly with a special welcome from Gov. Volpe, Consul General of France and Mme. Jacques Massenet, Consul General of Spain and Senora Vistoc Sanchez-Mesas, Capt and Mrs. John Doherty, Gerald Hayes, and scores more—and young Bryce and Mark Morris as super hosts for their young friends. The distinguished Director of the Korean Cultural Institute which sponsors the U.S. tour, Col Pak, has only one rival in the children's affections and his name is Ray Dillegendary past. The audiBoard. Ray was the bus driver for the tour last year and the children wanted him again, and Ray has turned into a backstage mascot, too.

The applause at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon was almost constant. These children combine the beauty and grace of the best ballet (they're trained by a renowned ballerina) the strength of Russian bears, and the enchantment of a legendary past. The audience, en masse, stayed on and filled the halls just to catch a glimpse of them "in person."

The Navy League's young Sea Cadets saluted them with a special number opening the show, and the children saluted right back, with a brandnew Navy-Marine "drill."

They've been asked to New York's Lincoln Center for Christmas week.

A BELL RINGER—Yung Hai and Yung and Yung Wha Kim teach a new American friend, Catherine Lizotte of Wellesley, how to play the traditional drums of Korea at Saturday's party before the "Little Angels" performed at Symphony Hall. (Herbert Capwell Photo)

Middle years lecture

"The Middle Years—The Fearful Forties"—the second of the seminar series for women, "Coping with Today's Dilemmas of Living"—will be held Tuesday at 7:30 at the Framingham Lodge of Elks, Framingham Union st. 450 Framingham. The series, sponsored by the Framingham Business and Professional Women's Clubs, will be continued on the first Tuesdays of the next three months: Dec. 5, "Dilemmas of the Single Woman—the Woman Alone"; Jan. 2, "Adults and Teen-agers — who leads whom?; Feb. 6, "Cocktails and Conflicts"—the Problem Drinker."

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

NOV 13 1967 New England Newsclip

ELLIOT NORTON WRITES:

New Youth Concert Idea Not Entirely Pleasant

SOMETHING has been added to the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall. In the ninth season, Harry Ellis Dickson is still conducting the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as he always has, but the series has acquired a young lady commentator, too, and a screen for projecting slides and a new schoolroom atmosphere which is not necessarily attractive.

The pattern of the concerts, which provide great music greatly played for thousands of fortunate children of Greater Boston, has been fully professional. Mr. Dickson and his men have played for the young people just as they do at the regular evening concerts of the week for their elders, with the conductor identifying the music and some of the composers briefly and cogently.

Elliot Norton

Under the new system, which was used Saturday morning in the second concert of the first series (there will be three) of the '67-'68 season, Miss Sonya Hamlin sat on the stage with the musicians and spent a rather considerable time explaining or describing the music or the circumstances in which it was composed to the young audience.

All the pieces the orchestra played had been written "for special occasions." Miss Hamlin identified and discussed these occasions.

Commentary Too Simple for Youth

In one instance, explaining Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, she used "slides" to show Napoleon, in whose honor Beethoven composed the work, at various stages of his career and pointed out why, as Napoleon became greedy for power, the composer changed his original intention to name the work for Bonaparte.

All this was interesting and perhaps valuable for the listeners, but it and a good deal of the rest of the exposition and explanation by Miss Hamlin seemed pedagogical, and intended not for "youth" but for very small kiddies.

That very small children attend these concerts, against the wishes of the people who organized them, is a fact. That some are altogether too young to appreciate what is presented to them also—regrettably—true. But in the past, Harry Dickson has aimed at the high schoolers and without patronizing them has, in effect, welcomed them into an adult world of music. This has been a good aspect of the concerts.

If these are to be "kiddie concerts," rather than "youth concerts," then Miss Hamlin's attitude is perhaps the right one. On Saturday, she was definitely treating her hearers as though they were very young indeed, requiring them to identify a piccolo by size and commending them for guessing aloud that it was just about the size of the instrument which Lois Schaefer brought on stage for Vivaldi's "Concerto in C Major."

Extension of Schoolroom

Miss Hamlin definitely made the concert an extension of the schoolroom in which the young patrons get their first elementary instruction in music. Is that what is wanted now?

Harry Dickson was always friendly with his hearers, but he treated them as guests in a concert hall, not as pupils in a classroom. As a matter of opinion, this was one of the most impressive aspects of the Youth Concerts; that they introduced students to concert-going in one of the great concert halls of the world with music by one of the world's greatest orchestras.

There was something rather wonderful about that for the boys and girls: they were being given a taste of a great and rare adult opportunity. They were helped, yes, but just a little. They were lifted up onto a new level of aesthetic appreciation, welcomed into a new world and with a handshake, so to speak, not with a pat on their little heads.

Perhaps the sponsors of the concerts, who have done heroic work for the last nine seasons, have come to the conclusion that the schoolroom approach will be more effective. Perhaps they are reconciled to the incursion of children too young to understand the other system. In that case, Miss Hamlin's commentary will work. But something very good and important will have been lost.

In any case, the orchestra will be, as it was Saturday and always is, superb in its performance.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

DEC 23 1967 New England Newsclip

Maestro Danny

Kaye Tours With Symphony Of 104 Teen-Age Israelis

By MARGO MILLER

BOSTON.

Danny Kaye's problem at the first rehearsal was reminding his young Israeli orchestra that he was the comic, not they. Maestro Kaye, whose conducting debut was in April 1957, with the Boston Symphony, is on a world tour with Gadna, an orchestra of 104 teen-agers, sponsored by the Israel army.

Word of Kaye and his troupe comes from Harry Ellis Dickson of the Boston Symphony.

Chuck Munch

Ever since Kaye took the roof off Symphony Hall by calling Charles Munch "Chuck," imitating other conductors and "conducting" the audience (who usually see only the flying tails of a music director), the comic has had Dickson as friend and mentor.

So when Kaye felt that after the June war, Israeli youth should add to the gaiety of nations (and raise funds for Israel), Dickson flew over to help with the Gadna rehearsals.

"Danny doesn't read music. We listen to records and he memorizes," says Dickson, a member of the BSO first violins who conducts at the Youth Concerts, Pops and Esplanade.

"But that doesn't mean he isn't a musician. He's instinctive. Things like telling the kids 'soft' doesn't mean slower,' which is a common mistake."

Musicians in Gadna include clarinetist Ali Eban, son of the Foreign Minister Abba Eban. But no attention is paid to rank, Dickson says.

War Burns

Instead, the kids worried whether one of their cellists would recover from his June war burns in time to rejoin the orchestra tour.

Gadna itself is a kind of youth corps for ages 14-18. Gadna's orchestra, formed in 1954, is not necessarily for teen-agers who intend a professional musical career. Nevertheless, the orchestra has toured widely to good reviews and three times has won first prize at Holland's International Competition for Amateur Orchestras. Gadna's permanent conductor is Chalom Ronly-Riklis.

Ronly-Riklis leads off the tour program usually with a Berlioz or Verdi overture. Then Danny comes on. According to Dickson, his act is much as it was in Boston. There is that bit about choosing a baton and a chord to match. The biggest stick gets the biggest bang and so on down to that stub one supposes merits dead silence. The first-half finale ends as Danny, having conducted the audience, asks them to rise to receive the applause of the orchestra, says, well, while you're all up, why not take an intermission break.

Danny Kaye's road to the podium began one April when he wandered into the Symphony Hall backstage. He was currently in town appearing at the Colonial in his International Show—chimpanzees, Spanish dancers and the like. Dickson said something to the visitor like, "You're Danny Kaye, aren't you?"

And when Danny countered by asking how a guy got into the conducting business, Dickson led him straight to Munch.

When it turned out that the orchestra had no open dates, Kaye agreed to try out at an open rehearsal one evening. The concert produced $9,953 for the orchestra's pension fund and there were additonal reasons to laugh all the way to the bank: Danny's imitations of the "profile" conductor, the coffee-grinder conductor, the meat-chopper and the emotional maestro who gets so involved in the music that he finally tumbles off the stand. Chuck Munch thought Danny "tres drole."

Now a veteran conductor, Danny likes to do a piece straight once in a while. Dickson thought the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin" suitable to display orchestra and conductor. But Israel still bans Wagner.

Old Veteran

In what must be the political-musical in-joke of the year, Danny substituted the Triumphal March from "Aida." The Verdi opera was written for the opening of the Suez Canal.

As official guest conductor of Gadna, Kaye is not allowed to speak to the audiences—in Italy, Switzerland, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Canada and South America—about Middle East politics. But he does invite them to visit Israel.

One Boston touch goes wherever Danny Kaye conducts. It is a statement, devised 10 years ago by the BSO's Mary Smith, which appears under Kaye's name.

"The management," it reads, "takes no responsibility for this part of the program."

With Danny away, the Boston Symphony is talking of getting some 39-year-old fiddler fellow to fill in.

(Boston Globe)

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

DEC 20 1967 New England Newsclip

First co-operative orchestra in Hub

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Philharmonic Society has announced formation of a philharmonic orchestra for Boston.

The society's Board of Trustees said Monday the orchestra, named the Boston Philharmonia, is the first co-operative orchestra in the United States.

The orchestra's 40 members are permanent corporate members of the Philharmonic Society and will have say in the hiring and firing of musicians, the society said.

The society said the new orchestra will "complement— not compete with"—existing musical groups in New England including the prestigious Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Philharmonia, which will make its debut in a series of concerts in March and April in Boston's Jordan Hall, will be directed by guest conductors until a permanent conductor is chosen.

The Philharmonic Society, founded last March 31, expressed confidence New England particularly Boston, could support two symphonic-type orchestras.

The society said the current winter series presented by the Boston Symphony can be subscribed to by no more than 21,048 persons, or less than 1 per cent of greater Boston's nearly three million residents.

Robert Brink, a concert violinist, is president of the society's Board of Trustees. The treasurer is concert string bass player William H. Curti.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 9 1968 New England Newsc

BSO Youth Concerts On Saturday Mornings

The second program of the Symphony Hall Youth Concerts will be presented on Saturday mornings, Jan. 13 and 20, from 11 to 12 o'clock by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Harry Ellis Dickson. The program is titled "Can Jazz Be Classical?" and will feature Newton Wayland as commentator. Composers to be represented include Bernstein, Milhaud, Ravel, Wayland, Schuller and Gershwin.

ITEM (e)
WAKEFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 6,600

JAN 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Youth Concert at Symphony Hall On Saturday

Saturday, Jan. 13, is the date of the second Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston. Sixty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Harry Ellis Dickson will present a program, "What is Jazz?"

Newton Wayland, Music Director of the Charles Street Playhouse, will be the soloist for the finale of Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra.

A bus with chaperones will leave Lynnfield Junior High School at 9:45 a.m. and the Huckleberry Hill School at 10 a.m., returning to the same schools at approximately 1 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Hall Youth Concert Theme Jazz

"Can Jazz Be Classical?" is the theme of the Symphony which conductor Harry Ellis Dickson will repeat on Saturday at 11 a.m.

Under Dickson, musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play illustrative works by Milhaud, Ravel, Bernstein, Gershwin, Schuller and Newton Wayland. The latter will participate as commentator, and will also present his jazz quartet in his "Pinocchio" Suite, joined by Spring Fairbank, soprano, and Larry Marshall, tenor. Vocalists and quartet will join with the orchestra in selections from "Porgy and Bess."

82

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 40,200

FEB 8 1968

New England Newsclip

Youth Symphony To Present Concert

The Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra will present a concert at the Elizabeth I. Hastings Junior High School, School St., Fairhaven, on Sunday, Feb. 18 at 3 p.m.

The 112-member musical group, under the baton of Walter Eisenberg, is composed primarily of high school students from scores of Massachusetts communities. Eisenberg is associate professor of music at Boston University.

The orchestra has performed at the White House, Carnegie Hall, Symphony Hall, and at the Music Educators National Conference at the Prudential Center.

The Fairhaven concert, one of four scheduled for this season, will offer Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Von Weber," Borodin's "Polovetzian Dances," the overture to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Anderson's "Bugler's Holiday," and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Following the Fairhaven concert, the senior division of the orchestra will hold two rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston. They will give a concert in Salem, and conclude their season with a 10th anniversary concert on April 21 at 8 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, February 10, 1968

TO CONDUCT—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the young members of the New England Conservatory of Music's senior orchestra Wednesday at 9 on Channel 17 in "Leinsdorf Creates."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

LATHAM TOWNSMAN
Thursday, February 8, 1968

"Leinsdorf Recreates" On Channel 17

The young members of the New England Conservatory of Music's senior orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will rehearse a portion of Mahler's Third Symphony for Channel 17's "Leinsdorf Recreates" on Wednesday, Feb. 14 at 9 p.m.

Leinsdorf chose Mahler's Symphony No. 3 for this special NET FESTIVAL broadcast, feeling it would give the orchestra a full workout in ensemble, as well as an opportunity to demonstrate individual instrument excellence.

The first portion of the program will be devoted to rehearsal, after which Maestro Leinsdorf will take time to answer questions from his young players. His own approach to conducting, an interpretation of Mahler's music and the acoustical problems that orchestras must face will be included in the discussion.

A complete performance of the symphony conclude this NET FESTIVAL, which was produced for National Educational Television by Jordan Whitelaw.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 44,600

MAR 23 1968

New England Newsclip

Music

Lowell High Junior Youth Singers Member

LOWELL — Miss Susan Blackstock of the junior class at Lowell high school is a member of the New England Conservatory of Music Youth Singers directed by Lisa Frederick Parker.

Miss Blackstock is a pupil of the noted voice teacher at the Conservatory, Miss Dorothy Richards. The Youth Singers are associated with the Youth Orchestra at the school.

A recent concert which was presented in Jordan Hall was taped for TV and will be shown on Channel 5 Friday morning April 12, at 9:30. In the concert the Lowell soprano performed both with the ensemble and with a selected quartet in which she shared the first soprano solo part. The quartet offered Gloria Et in terra pax hominibus and Laudamus te by Antonio Vivaldi.

Susan Blackstock

Next Monday evening in the Second Congregational church in West Boxford, the Merrimack Valley Chapter of the American Guild of Organists will conduct the March meeting. The program will feature "A night with a Harps," and appearing as guest will be Miss Colette Rushford, harpist, of the New England Conservatory of Music, and appearing as co-artist will be Mrs. Russell Myers, soprano. Mr. Walter V. Hawkes, organist-choir director at the church will assist as accompanist.

The program is the first in a planned series of programs concerned with various instruments. For this program Miss Rushford plans to explain the history and mechanical aspects of the Harp, and will offer pieces selected from the literature of this intrument. She will demonstrate how it may be used in association with an organ and also with a solo voice.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens a two week tour in St. Louis's new Powell Symphony hall next Wednesday evening. The trip includes the Orchestra's final concerts outside of Symphony hall this winter and on its return three week will remain of the 87th season. This will be the Boston Symphony's first visit to St. Louis in over 50 years.

Once again opera goers will have the opportunity of hearing Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" as this will be the feature vehicle at the Wednesday evening performance on April 24, during the Metropolitan Opera company's spring visit to Boston which opens on Monday evening, April 22, with a performance of Verdi's "Luisa Miller" and closes on Saturday evening, with Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."

Butterfly will feature in the leading role the New York sensation, Martina Arroyo. Although new to Boston, Miss Arroyo is widely known in the leading centers of the Continent where she has also scored brilliantly in such varied roles as Aida, Lenora in "Il Travatore," and, as Elsa in "Lohengrin."

CRITICS FIND IT difficult to find a so called category for the talented artist. However, a situation such as this has existed in other operatic eras. Possibly the best known was in the case of Rosa Ponselle who completely overwhelmed her listeners in such a wide variety of endavors as "Norma," "La Traviata" and amazing as it may seem — "Carmen."

However, the subject is Butterfly, and this score has been the sought for goal of countless singers over the years.

Naturally, the tenor role of Lt. Pinkerton is one of opera's favorite characters. But the baritone, the American Consul, Sharpless, demands a great deal of finish both vocally, and especially so in stage business. In past years many of the great baritones were associated with the role and among those names who come to mind were Guiseppe Di Luca, Carlo Morelli and Antonio Scotti. Possibly the greatest of this fabulous trio was Di Luca whose every piece of work, both as a singer and actor, has possibly never been equalled on the operatic stage.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

COLUMBUS SUNDAY DISPATCH
COLUMBUS, O.
SUN. - CIRC. 312,690

MAR-3 -68

LEINSDORF LEADS STUDENT GROUP

Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony leads the young players of the New England Conservatory orchestra in an hour of music on "NET Festival" at 9:30 p.m. Wednesday on Ch. 34.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WEST HEMPSTEAD BEACON
Wednesday, March 20, 1968

On Channel 13

On TV, Channel 13, Cedric Coleman, a graduate of Hempstead High School of the Class of 1963, now a senior at the New England Conservatory of Music, was seen playing the bassoon in the Conservatory's symphony orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. Mr. Coleman played several solo portions in the program, taking place on Feb. 26. He is also bassoonist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

MAR 17 1968

New England Newsclip

Concerts

BROOKLINE YOUTH CONCERT, Roberts Auditorium, Brookline High School, featuring members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in "Peter and the Wolf," admission $1.00, narrator, Newton Wayland, 2 p.m.

GARDNER MUSEUM CONCERT, 280 The Fenway, Boston; presenting William Conable, cello; 3 p.m.; free.

82

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 40,200

FEB 8 1968

New England Newsclip

Youth Symphony To Present Concert

The Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra will present a concert at the Elizabeth I. Hastings Junior High School, School St., Fairhaven, on Sunday, Feb. 18 at 3 p.m.

The 112-member musical group, under the baton of Walter Eisenberg, is composed primarily of high school students from scores of Massachusetts communities. Eisenberg is associate professor of music at Boston University.

The orchestra has performed at the White House, Carnegie Hall, Symphony Hall, and at the Music Educators National Conference at the Prudential Center.

The Fairhaven concert, one of four scheduled for this season, will offer Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Von Weber," Borodin's "Polovetzian Dances," the overture to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Anderson's "Bugler's Holiday," and Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Following the Fairhaven concert, the senior division of the orchestra will hold two rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston. They will give a concert in Salem, and conclude their season with a 10th anniversary concert on April 21 at 8 p.m. in Symphony Hall, Boston.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, February 10, 1968

TO CONDUCT—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the young members of the New England Conservatory of Music's senior orchestra Wednesday at 9 on Channel 17 in "Leinsdorf Creates."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

LATHAM TOWNSMAN
Thursday, February 8, 1968

'Leinsdorf Recreates" On Channel 17

The young members of the New England Conservatory of Music's senior orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will rehearse a portion of Mahler's Third Symphony for Channel 17's "Leinsdorf Recreates" on Wednesday, Feb. 14 at 9 p.m.

Leinsdorf chose Mahler's Symphony No. 3 for this special NET FESTIVAL broadcast, feeling it would give the orchestra a full workout in ensemble, as well as an opportunity to demonstrate individual instrument excellence.

The first portion of the program will be devoted to rehearsal, after which Maestro Leinsdorf will take time to answer questions from his young players. His own approach to conducting, an interpretation of Mahler's music and the acoustical problems that orchestras must face will be included in the discussion.

A complete performance of the symphony conclude this NET FESTIVAL, which was produced for National Educational Television by Jordan Whitelaw.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 44,600

MAR 23 1968

New England Newsclip

Music

Lowell High Junior Youth Singers Member

LOWELL — Miss Susan Blackstock of the junior class at Lowell high school is a member of the New England Conservatory of Music Youth Singers directed by Lisa Frederick Parker.

Miss Blackstock is a pupil of the noted voice teacher at the Conservatory, Miss Dorothy Richards. The Youth Singers are associated with the Youth Orchestra at the school.

A recent concert which was presented in Jordan Hall was taped for TV and will be shown on Channel 5 Friday morning April 12, at 9:30. In the concert the Lowell soprano performed both with the ensemble and with a selected quartet in which she shared the first soprano solo part. The quartet offered Gloria Et in terra pax hominibus and Laudamus te by Antonio Vivaldi.

Susan Blackstock

Next Monday evening in the Second Congregational church in West Boxford, the Merrimack Valley Chapter of the American Guild of Organists will conduct the March meeting. The program will feature "A night with a Harps," and appearing as guest will be Miss Colette Rushford, harpist, of the New England Conservatory of Music, and appearing as co-artist will be Mrs. Russell Myers, soprano. Mr. Walter V. Hawkes, organist-choir director at the church will assist as accompanist.

The program is the first in a planned series of programs concerned with various instruments. For this program Miss Rushford plans to explain the history and mechanical aspects of the Harp, and will offer pieces selected from the literature of this intrument. She will demonstrate how it may be used in association with an organ and also with a solo voice.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens a two week tour in St. Louis's new Powell Symphony hall next Wednesday evening. The trip includes the Orchestra's final concerts outside of Symphony hall this winter and on its return three week will remain of the 87th season. This will be the Boston Symphony's first visit to St. Louis in over 50 years.

Once again opera goers will have the opportunity of hearing Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" as this will be the feature vehicle at the Wednesday evening performance on April 24, during the Metropolitan Opera company's spring visit to Boston which opens on Monday evening, April 22, with a performance of Verdi's "Luisa Miller" and closes on Saturday evening, with Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."

Butterfly will feature in the leading role the New York sensation, Martina Arroyo. Although new to Boston, Miss Arroyo is widely known in the leading centers of the Continent where she has also scored brilliantly in such varied roles as Aida, Lenora in "Il Travatore," and, as Elsa in "Lohengrin."

CRITICS FIND IT difficult to find a so called category for the talented artist. However, a situation such as this has existed in other operatic eras. Possibly the best known was in the case of Rosa Ponselle who completely overwhelmed her listeners in such a wide variety of endavors as "Norma," "La Traviata" and amazing as it may seem — "Carmen."

However, the subject is Butterfly, and this score has been the sought for goal of countless singers over the years.

Naturally, the tenor role of Lt. Pinkerton is one of opera's favorite characters. But the baritone, the American Consul, Sharpless, demands a great deal of finish both vocally, and especially so in stage business. In past years many of the great baritones were associated with the role and among those names who come to mind were Guiseppe Di Luca, Carlo Morelli and Antonio Scotti. Possibly the greatest of this fabulous trio was Di Luca whose every piece of work, both as a singer and actor, has possibly never been equalled on the operatic stage.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

COLUMBUS SUNDAY DISPATCH
COLUMBUS, O.
SUN. - CIRC. 312,690

MAR-3 -68

LEINSDORF LEADS STUDENT GROUP

Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony leads the young players of the New England Conservatory orchestra in an hour of music on "NET Festival" at 9:30 p.m. Wednesday on Ch. 34.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WEST HEMPSTEAD BEACON
Wednesday, March 20, 1968

On Channel 13

On TV, Channel 13, Cedric Coleman, a graduate of Hempstead High School of the Class of 1963, now a senior at the New England Conservatory of Music, was seen playing the bassoon in the Conservatory's symphony orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf. Mr. Coleman played several solo portions in the program, taking place on Feb. 26. He is also bassoonist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

MAR 17 1968

New England Newsclip

Concerts

BROOKLINE YOUTH CONCERT, Roberts Auditorium, Brookline High School, featuring members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in "Peter and the Wolf," admission $1.00, narrator, Newton Wayland, 3 p.m.

GARDNER MUSEUM CONCERT, 280 The Fenway, Boston; presenting William Conable, cello; 3 p.m., free.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

APR 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Tin cans on youth orchestra's 10th anniversary

By Clifford Barnes

Boston

"One after the other, violins 2 thru 14 drop their tin cans onto the floor. Everyone else waits in silence, with eyes closed. After the 13 cans have been dropped, the conductor raps on his stand. Open your eyes and continue on."

These directions are for the second string-bass player to follow in the "Mystery" section of the fourth movement, "Prince Liu An of Huai-nan." The first violinist drops his tin can in the middle of the fifth movement ("Autobody") in the contemporary composition by Humphrey Evans III entitled "Vedic Pronouncements."

The work was composed for and is dedicated to the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Walter Eisenberg, on the occasion of the orchestra's 10th anniversary. The fact that a 10th wedding anniversary is celebrated with tin or aluminum is purely coincidental.

In honor of its anniversary, the GBYSO is presenting a program of 20th-century music on Sunday, April 21, at 8:30 p.m., in Boston's Symphony Hall. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in the Prokofiev Violin Concerto No. 2. The rest of the program will be the "Symphonic Metamorphosis" by Hindemith, "Pines of Rome" by Respighi, and the "Russlan and Ludmilla" Overture by Glinka.

* * *

The orchestra of 120 talented high-school musicians from over 60 communities in the Greater Boston area is sponsored by Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts, in cooperation with a board of directors from the communities involved. Demonstrating what a group of dedicated, young instrumentalists can do, they rehearse for three hours every Saturday morning, September through April, under the capable baton of Walter Eisenberg.

In an adjoining hall, working on a repertoire only slightly less demanding, is the junior section of the orchestra, directed by Robert Corley. Filling over 200 hard-won places in the two orchestras are students from more than 70 communities in Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island, Vermont, and New Hampshire. All were chosen from the hundreds recommended to audition by their school music directors.

Since its inception 10 years ago, the GBYSO, working with school music educators and community representatives, has graduated over 700 high-school musicians from its ranks. Many have pursued careers in music; all have gained a greater appreciation of symphonic literature. Alumni day each year is a chance to play in an informally organized "youth" orchestra once again.

* * *

It is appropriate to have these young people play a concert of 20th-century music—music of their time. Interestingly enough, the piece of aleatoric (chance) music by the 19-year-old composer, Humphrey Evans III, took the longest time to catch the young musicians' interest. They are still too tied to music of the preceding century to get an immediate favorable reaction. Since each performance or rehearsal must be a spontaneous and creative event, there is danger of establishing set patterns that could be repeated by playing the music too frequently.

Special festivities should surround a 10th-anniversary celebration. By that time the good fruit that comes from well-grounded roots is abundant and polished.

By S. Gerson Lincoln

The string section of the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra enjoys an anecdote by Walter Eisenberg, conductor. Standing next to the conductor is Humphrey Evans III, composer of "Vedic Pronouncements," written for and dedicated to the youth orchestra on its 10th anniversary.

GBYSO

NORFOLK COUNTY
FREE PRESS
NORWOOD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,000

MAR 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Wednesday, March 6, 1968

Albert Sprague To Play With Bost. Symphony

Albert Sprague, son of Mr. and Mrs. Albert W. Sprague of 1687 Washington street, Walpole, will be on stage at Symphony Hall, March 9 and 16, with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Harry Ellis Dickson, as part of the series of Saturday morning Youth Concerts.

Since the Symphony Hall stage cannot accommodate two full Symphony orchestras at one time, the G.B.Y.S.O. will take part one half at a time on the two mornings. Later in the season, concertmaster of the B.S.O. Joseph Silverstein will be guest soloist with the GBYSO at their 10th anniversary concert to be given Apr. 21, at 8 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,400

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Local Students To Play At Symphony

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured guest soloist with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra at their gala Tenth Anniversary Concert at 8 p.m., Sunday, April 21, in Symphony Hall.

Local students playing with the orchestra are: Cheryl Clark, Douglas Clark, Harron Appleman and David Appleman.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

5 to Play in GBYSO Concert

LINCOLN and SUDBURY - Mr. Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured guest solist with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra at their gala Tenth Anniversary Concert at 8 p.m., Sunday, April 21 in Symphony Hall. Tickets are available from the Symphony Hall Box Office.

Local students playing with the orchestra include Jean England, Stanton Gerson, Ronald Hagopian and Guilbert Winchell, all of Lincoln; and Ruth Boedeker of Sudbury.

83

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 304,100

APR 23 1968 New England Newsclip

Youth Symphony a delight

By GEORGE GELLES
Globe Critic

It was enormously encouraging Sunday night to see the stage of Symphony Hall filled with the 100 or so musicians of the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra and to hear the fine sound these people make.

They rehearse together throughout the year and it shows. The roughness one might expect from a student group isn't there, by and large. I would suppose that the lack of polish in the string sound is due to the qaulity of the instruments, nothing else.

This is handsomely made up for by intelligent, keen playing. The winds are strong—woodwinds especially so—and, like good professionals, contribute an occasional goof.

The other bit of encouragement was the kids' confrontation with contemporary music. The "Vedic Pronouncements" by Humphrey M. Evans—which received its premiere performance—are seven miniatures grouped around a central one ("the ritual source") and varying in degrees of freedom given the individual performer.

CHEERING

Evans the Third has a good ear for mixing colors and textures, as the third section showed, and is alive to theatrical possibilities. I found very effective the bit of baton tapping that called the slouching fagged-out players to attention after the general chaos of the middle movement.

The piece, though squirmishly received by the mostly parent audience, got much more ardent cheering than vociferous booing at its end. Uncomfortable as it may be, this is one of the places modern music is at.

After the curtain raiser, the "Russian and Ludmilla" Overture, everything was 20th century. This is not to say modern though, for in the pieces by Hindemith, Prokofiev, and Respighi there's little more adventurous than an off-beat.

The works are thought out in a conservative 19th century way, and make conservative demands on the instrumentalists.

Even the most advanced among them, Prokofiev's Second Violin Concerto, which had fine solo playing from BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, taught the young players very little about new methods of looking at music.

GREATER BOSTON YOUTH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Walter Eisenberg, conductor. Joseph Silverstein, violin soloist, performing Glinka's "Russian and Ludmilla" Overture; Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes of Weber"; Prokofiev's Second Violin Concerto; Evans' "Vedic Pronouncements"; and Respighi's "Pines of Rome", Sunday night at Symphony Hall.

84

POPS

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 400,124

OCT 20 1967

Nippon Concert on LI Set

Westbury—The Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra from Japan will present a concert at the Westbury Music Fair at 8:30 PM Monday. Arthur Fiedler of the Boston Pops Orchestra will conduct.

The 90-piece orchestra, which played under Fiedler's direction in Tokyo, is currently on a 48-city tour of the U.S. exchange program. It is the and Canada as part of a cultural orchestra's first tour outside Japan. Japanese-American pianist Hiro Imamura will be the solo artist Monday night. Trombonist Yasuhiko Ikyoshi will be the assistant conductor. Tickets can be purchased at the Westbury box office or reserved by calling 333-0533.

Arthur Fiedler

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,306 SUN. 553,012

OCT 22 1967

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo in Constitution Hall at 8:30 on Saturday evening. Fiedler and the orchestra are on a tour of the United States.

TOWN CRIER
WEST HAVEN, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,350

OCT 26 1967 New England Newsclip

TO SPONSOR POPS

The Alumni Advisory Council of New Haven College will hold a dinner meeting on Tuesday, Oct. 31, at 6:30 o'clock in the Student Center on campus. Eighteen members are expected to attend.

This will be the last meeting of the group before the Pops Concert, with Arthur Fiedler conducting the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, to be sponsored by NHC on Dec. 1 in Woolsey Hall, for the benefit of the College library.

Officers of the Alumni Council include John C. Ireland of West Haven.

New York Post
D. 324,250 SUN. 243,637

OCT 25 1967

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Debut

East came West—came East last night to Carnegie Hall and brought a sunburst of cheer. That is, the Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra (85 Japanese, average age 31) landed in San Francisco, played concerts cross country and arrived here for their local debut.

International and local good will and the most laudable musical standards met on-stage and off. Seventy-two-year-old Arthur Fielder, the eminent Boston "Pops" chief, and as lively a conductor as beats, is maestro for the tour. The story goes round that he has a crush on this ensemble—we think with good reason: its precision, its musicality, its training, its vigor.

His enthusiasm after guest-conducting them in Japan in 1965 was responsible for encouraging this tour. The Symphony was formed in 1962.

Goodwill extended so far that Judson, O'Neill, Beall and Steinway, Inc., are presenting the 48-concert tour with Japanese-American pianist, 22-year old Hiro Imamura as soloist, playing a Baldwin. Miss Imamura, who lives in Hawaii, where her father is a Buddhist priest, performed as if a dynamic accent and a poetic turn of phrase were far closer to her than thoughts of Nirvana. She is a remarkably talented young lady who plays without a trace of sentimentality but with plenty of genuine musical feeling. She also gave this lyrical music a strong sense of structure that never faltered whatever the movement. She was recalled to the stage by a large, enthusiastic audience at least six times.

Benefit for Letters Abroad

The concert, which was a benefit for Letters Abroad, Inc., began with the Overture to Rossini's "Semiramide" and closed with Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne Suite." In between we heard the Concerto, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony in D, Op. 25, and excerpts from Bernstein's "West Side Story."

These young Japanese perform with an astounding ease and brilliance and it's obvious that Fiedler understands and encourages their capacities. The "Molto Vivace" Finale of the Classical Symphony was a tour de force of virtuosity. From the look of their shiny new instruments it wouldn't seem that the group was playing the old Italian variety yet the string tone was notable for its mellowness in the Bernstein music. It could have been a southern night far from 57th St.

Hearing this ensemble is an answer to youthful malcontents who are seeking self-expression. The Yomiuri Nippon Symphony obviously finds it through hard work.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

OCT 26 1967

Music: Japanese Visitors

Yomiuri Nippon Symphony, Conducted by Fiedler, Makes Local Debut

By ALLEN HUGHES

JUST when you think you have heard every symphony orchestra that might possibly perform in New York, another one appears. Tuesday night it was the turn of the Yomiuri Nippon Symphony, a five-year-old organization from Tokyo that is on an eight-week tour of North America. It made its New York debut at Carnegie Hall conducted by Arthur Fiedler.

The Yomiuri Nippon Symphony was founded in 1962 by three sponsors—Yomiuri Shinbun (Japan's largest newspaper with a circulation of 5 million), the Nippon Television Network in Tokyo and the Yomiuri Television in Osaka. The president of the newspaper and of Nippon Television, Matsutaro Shoriki, is also president of the orchestra.

•

The average age of the 100 members of the all-male orchestra is said to be 32. Their playing under Mr. Fiedler's direction was efficient and the general ensemble tone was agreeable. One did not get the impression that that orchestra was one of either dazzling virtuosity or of particularly distinctive sound quality.

The program chosen by Mr. Fiedler was definitely on the light side. It offered Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor, Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, selections from Bernstein's "West Side Story" and the Suite from Offenbach's "Gaité Parisienne."

If the going seemed somewhat routine early in the evening, it definitely turned brighter and more stimulating with the "West Side Story" medley. Here, both conductor and orchestra appeared to dig into the spirit of the music more deeply.

•

The soloist in the piano concerto was Hiro Imamura, an attractive girl who graduated last year with a major in music from the University of California at Berkeley. She is a third-generation American.

Her playing was cool and clear at all times. In the first and third movements she did not always distinguish sufficiently between thematic and decorative elements, but in the second movement her interpretation was built about a lovely lyric line around which everything else moved in shapely, expressive patterns.

PARENTUM, PA.
VALLEY NEWS
D. 23,000

OCT 28 1967

NuKen scene of concert tomorrow

Members of Allegheny Valley Concert Association will have the opportunity to enjoy world famous conductor Arthur Fiedler tomorrow in Vallley High School's New Kensington campus auditorium.

Although the event begins at 3 p.m., doors will open at 2:30. Only those with membership cards will be able to attend.

Fiedler will conduct the 100-piece Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra of Japan which is making its first tour in America. The conductor achieved a world famous reputation conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra.

A feature attraction will be Hiro Imamura, solo pianist of the Japanese orchestra.

The group will play the same program throughout the tour.

The group will play Leonard Bernstein's West Side Story, Chopin's piano concerto No. 2, music of Sossini, Offenbach and Prokenfieff.

Tomorrow's program will be one of four presented to the concert association's members.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 283,100
OCT 20 1967
New England Newsclip

French Center feted

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

He's a man for all nations, that Russell Codman.

Thursday, in perfect French, the former Boston fire commissioner celebrated the 20th birthday of the French Center in New England, welcoming, from Washington, M. Le Ministre Plenipotentiare and Mme. Jacques Leprette of the French Embassy, and M. and Mme. Jacques Rueff of the French Academy in Paris. (He is chancellor of the Institute of France.)

Ambassador Charles Lucet sent a communique, and there were cables from France and a gala occasion all round, ending with a dinner for the visitors with Consul General and Mme. Jacques Massenet as hosts.

Two weeks from tonight Russell Codman will be putting the "welcome to Boston" in Japanese for the young players that Arthur Fiedler is bringing back from Japan, because the conductor thinks they ought to "show what they can do" to America.

With "Mr. Pops" as conductor, they're playing their way ocross the country after rave reviews from San Francisco, and they'll play a typical Boston Pops program at Symphony Hall on Nov. 3, with former Ambassador to Japan Edwin Reischauer and his wife and the B.S.O.'s exchange Japanese players and their families heading a long list of patrons.

A reception, given by the Japan Society, which last Winter feted the Prince and Princess of Japan at the Gardner Museum, will follow in the Art Gallery.

Russell, who's honorary consul for Japan, also speaks Spanish, and un poco Italiana, which puts him right in the middle of next week's marvelous goings-on. The Italian ambassador, Egidio Ortona, and his attractive wife will be here for "Una Serata In Italia" on Wednesday, and Spain's handsome Ambassador and his wife, the Marquesa Merry del Val will be here on Tuesday to open the Ellis Memorial Antiques Show.

The ambassador and his wife are having sent here for exhibition at the show the portrait of Gen. George Washington, presented by Washington in 1796 to the Spanish prime minister, Prince Manuel de Godoy. Painted by Perovani, the full-length painting shows Washington holding the treaty of San Lorenzo recognizing the "boundary claims of the United States under the treaty of 1783, giving to Americans the free navigation of the Mississippi and the right of deposit for their goods at New Orleans for three years."

Mrs. Paul Schmidt and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock have put their time and talent together over the Spanish theme for the show, which will have the red-white-and-blue look of the Seville Fair.

Deborah Fahnestock chose the waitress costumes for Boston's fashionable young-married and post-debs who'll be offering the delectable baskets of buennela de chorizo, gambas al Ajillo, veal pate, ternera flambra, and other goodies.

The dresses were made by Madrid's chic El Cortes Ingles, and flown here by Iberia airlines.

Sangria, the renowned wine and fruit drink of Spain, will be on hand, and there'll be the "salad soup," which is a favorite in the patio of the Ritz in Madrid.

For the strictly "I'm just a plain old American," there'll be sliced filet mignon, hams, and cheses.

Other specialities of the week will be tours, for which Mrs. James F. Hunnewell is chairman, and a gourmet Wine and Dine buffet dinner Saturday the 28th, at the Antiques Show. Reservations for the buffet should be made now with Mrs. Daniel Simonds. (Telephone 523-8696).

Washington and Newport guests are on the list for the preview and tours, among them Mrs. Harold Coolidge, Mrs. John J. Slocum and Kennedys.

★

Also due in Boston next week, on the 25th, is another ambassador, His Excellency Hushang Ansary of Iran, who'll be given a reception by President Ralph Lowell and trustees of the Museum of Fine Arts.

★

On the same day—trust Boston for these double-ups—the English-Speaking Union is offering a unique chance to meet and listen to Lt Gen Sir John Glubb, who commanded the Transjordan Arab Legion and has lived in Arabia for 36 years. He will speak Oct. 25, at 5 at the Museum of Science, on "Arab Nationalism."

★

Small PS—If you're planning a party for any of these events and fascinating people, be warned that the Ritz now permits neither trouser-suits NOR mini-skirts in the dining room. Hurrah for the Ritz.

POST (e)
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 81,900
OCT 14 1967
New England Newsclip

Two Symphonies Are Scheduled To Be Heard

By FRED H. RUSSELL

The Sunday afternoon concerts of the American Symphony Orchestra from Carnegie Hall and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., when it performs in New York's Philharmonic Hall, will be broadcast live and in stereo over WQXR beginning Sunday, Oct. 29, and continuing throughout the 1967-68 season.

There will be 11 Sunday concerts in the American Symphony's broadcast plan.

Since the schedules of the two orchestras compliment each other, WQXR will be alternating the two series on Sunday afternoons from 3 to 5 o'clock.

The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, taped in stereo, will be heard on Sunday afternoons after the first of the year.

Other symphony orchestras heard on WQXR are the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Additionally, WQXR-FM will be presenting broadcasts of the Metropolitan Opera live from Lincoln Center beginning Saturday afternoon Dec. 9, at 2 o'clock.

ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN TALK
D. 25,500
JAN 29 1968

'Pops' to Feature Handel Concerto

Handel's Concerto for Viola and the first movement of Symphony No. 8 (Unfinished) by Schubert share top billing on the Boston Pops concert at 7:00 p.m. tonight on KALB-FM.

Tchaikovsky's Waltz of the Flowers from the Nutcracker Suite, Weber's overture to Oberon, and the Rakoczy march by Berlioz comprise the remaining classical fare.

Arthur Fiedler gives the baton to Professor Daniel C. Abbott to conduct the Schubert number. Robert Karol will be soloist.

The popular program consists of selections from West Side Story, Green Berets, Days of Wine and Roses, Batman, and Look Sharp—Be Sharp.

The News-Sentinel
FORT WAYNE, IND.
D. 78,000
NOV 28 1967

World of the Arts

A GIFT FOR FIEDLER — Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler accepts a baton from Carol Whitaker, 18, Storrs, Conn., who made the presentation in behalf of 4-H Club members recently in Chicago. (AP Wirephoto)

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
NOV 4 1967
New England Newsclip

At Symphony Hall

Japanese Orchestra Has a Rich Sound

By RENA FRUCHTER

The Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conducting, presented a program in Symphony Hall on Friday evening, November 3.

Overture to Semiramide — Rossini
Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor, Op. 21 — Chopin
Hiro Imamura, pianist
Classical Symphony in D, Op. 25 — Prokofeff
Selections from West Side Story — Bernstein
Galete Parisienne Suite — Offenbach

The Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conducting, presented an enjoyable program in Symphony Hall last night. Organized in 1962 by the Japanese mass communications organizations—the Yomiuri Shimbun (Japan's largest newspaper), the Nippon Television Network, and the Yomiuri Television Company, the orchestra is now composed of 100 first-rate young musicians.

The orchestra has an excellent rich sound and is able to play "full force" fortissimo passages without ever becoming harsh. The orchestra, as a whole, has extraordinary accuracy and clarity, especially in fast passages. The tone is generally quite different from what we know as the "Western" orchestra sound.

The Yomiuri Nippon Orchestra's strings produce a tone which appears to be the result of a cleaner, more intense attack.

The Rossini, Prokofieff, Bernstein, and Offenbach works were all performed with a great deal of spirit. Mr. Fiedler had a firm command of the orchestra and succeeded in achieving good dynamic range and rhythmic precision.

The highlight of the program was the Chopin Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor, performed by Hiro Imamura. The weak orchestral score of the Chopin presents a number of interpretative problems, many of which were unresolved in yesterday's performance. Miss Imamura, in contrast, did a superb job. The young pianist has technical brilliance and a fine understanding of phrasing. She has an unusual ability to recognize the importance of harmonic variety a quality so essential to a successful performance of Chopin.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
OCT 20 1967

French Center feted

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

He's a man for all nations, that Russell Codman.

Thursday, in perfect French, the former Boston fire commissioner celebrated the 20th birthday of the French Center in New England, welcoming, from Washington, M. Le Ministre Plenipotentiare and Mme. Jacques Leprette of the French Embassy, and M. and Mme. Jacques Rueff of the French Academy in Paris. (He is chancellor of the Institute of France.)

Ambassador Charles Lucet sent a communique, and there were cables from France and a gala occasion all round, ending with a dinner for the visitors with Consul General and Mme. Jacques Massenet as hosts.

Two weeks from tonight Russell Codman will be putting the "welcome to Boston" in Japanese for the young players that Arthur Fiedler is bringing back from Japan, because the conductor thinks they ought to "show what they can do" to America.

With "Mr. Pops" as conductor, they're playing their way ocross the country after rave reviews from San Francisco, and they'll play a typical Boston Pops program at Symphony Hall on Nov. 3, with former Ambassador to Japan Edwin Reischauer and his wife and the B.S.O.'s exchange Japanese players and their families heading a long list of patrons.

A reception, given by the Japan Society, which last Winter feted the Prince and Princess of Japan at the Gardner Museum, will follow in the Art Gallery.

Russell, who's honorary consul for Japan, also speaks Spanish, and un poco Italiana, which puts him right in the middle of next week's marvelous goings-on. The Italian ambassador, Egidio Ortona, and his attractive wife will be here for "Una Serata In Italia" on Wednesday, and Spain's handsome Ambassador and his wife, the Marquesa Merry del Val will be here on Tuesday to open the Ellis Memorial Antiques Show.

The ambassador and his wife are having sent here for exhibition at the show the portrait of Gen. George Washington, presented by Washington in 1796 to the Spanish prime minister, Prince Manuel de Godoy. Painted by Perovani, the full-length painting shows Washington holding the treaty of San Lorenzo recognizing the "boundary claims of the United States under the treaty of 1783, giving to Americans the free navigation of the Mississippi and the right of deposit for their goods at New Orleans for three years."

Mrs. Paul Schmidt and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock have put their time and talent together over the Spanish theme for the show, which will have the red-white-and-blue look of the Seville Fair.

Deborah Fahnestock chose the waitress costumes for Boston's fashionable young-married and post-debs who'll be offering the delectable baskets of buennela de chorizo, gambas al Ajillo, veal pate, ternera flambra, and other goodies.

The dresses were made by Madrid's chic El Cortes Ingles, and flown here by Iberia airlines.

Sangria, the renowned wine and fruit drink of Spain, will be on hand, and there'll be the "salad soup," which is a favorite in the patio of the Ritz in Madrid.

For the strictly "I'm just a plain old American," there'll be sliced filet mignon, hams, and cheses.

Other specialities of the week will be tours, for which Mrs. James F. Hunnewell is chairman, and a gourmet Wine and Dine buffet dinner Saturday the 28th, at the Antiques Show. Reservations for the buffet should be made now with Mrs. Daniel Simonds. (Telephone 523-8696).

Washington and Newport guests are on the list for the preview and tours, among them Mrs. Harold Coolidge, Mrs. John J. Slocum and Kennedys.

★

Also due in Boston next week, on the 25th, is another ambassador, His Excellency Hushang Ansary of Iran, who'll be given a reception by President Ralph Lowell and trustees of the Museum of Fine Arts.

★

On the same day—trust Boston for these double-ups—the English-Speaking Union is offering a unique chance to meet and listen to Lt Gen Sir John Glubb, who commanded the Transjordan Arab Legion and has lived in Arabia for 36 years. He will speak Oct. 25, at 5 at the Museum of Science, on "Arab Nationalism."

★

Small PS—If you're planning a party for any of these events and fascinating people, be warned that the Ritz now permits neither trouser-suits NOR mini-skirts in the dining room. Hurrah for the Ritz.

POST (e)
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 81,000
OCT 14 1967

Two Symphonies Are Scheduled To Be Heard

By FRED H. RUSSELL

The Sunday afternoon concerts of the American Symphony Orchestra from Carnegie Hall and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., when it performs in New York's Philharmonic Hall, will be broadcast live and in stereo over WQXR beginning Sunday, Oct. 29, and continuing throughout the 1967-68 season.

There will be 11 Sunday concerts in the American Symphony's broadcast plan.

Since the schedules of the two orchestras compliment each other, WQXR will be alternating the two series on Sunday afternoons from 3 to 5 o'clock.

The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, taped in stereo, will be heard on Sunday afternoons after the first of the year.

Other symphony orchestras heard on WQXR are the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Additionally, WQXR-FM will be presenting broadcasts of the Metropolitan Opera live from Lincoln Center beginning Saturday afternoon Dec. 9, at 2 o'clock.

ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN TALK
D. 25,500
JAN 29 1968

'Pops' to Feature Handel Concerto

Handel's Concerto for Viola and the first movement of Symphony No. 8 (Unfinished) by Schubert share top billing on the Boston Pops concert at 7:00 p.m. tonight on KALB-FM.

Tchaikovsky's Waltz of the Flowers from the Nutcracker Suite, Weber's overture to Oberon, and the Rakoczy march by Berlioz comprise the remaining classical fare.

Arthur Fiedler gives the baton to Professor Daniel C. Abbott to conduct the Schubert number. Robert Karol will be soloist.

The popular program consists of selections from West Side Story, Green Berets, Days of Wine and Roses, Batman, and Look Sharp—Be Sharp.

The News-Sentinel
FORT WAYNE, IND.
D. 78,000
NOV 28 1967

World of the Arts

A GIFT FOR FIEDLER — Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler accepts a baton from Carol Whitaker, 18, Storrs, Conn., who made the presentation in behalf of 4-H Club members recently in Chicago. (AP Wirephoto)

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
NOV 4 1967

At Symphony Hall

Japanese Orchestra Has a Rich Sound

By RENA FRUCHTER

The Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, presented an enjoyable program in Symphony Hall last night. Organized in 1962 by the Japanese mass communications organizations—the Yomiuri Shimbun (Japan's largest newspaper), the Nippon Television Network, and the Yomiuri Television Company, the orchestra is now composed of 100 first-rate young musicians.

The orchestra has an excellent rich sound and is able to play "full force" fortissimo passages without ever becoming harsh. The orchestra, as a whole, has extraordinary accuracy and clarity, especially in fast passages. The tone is generally quite different from what we know as the "Western" orchestra sound.

The Yomiuri Nippon Orchestra's strings produce a tone which appears to be the result of a cleaner, more intense attack.

The Rossini, Prokofieff, Bernstein, and Offenbach works were all performed with a great deal of spirit. Mr. Fiedler had a firm command of the orchestra and succeeded in achieving good dynamic range and rhythmic precision.

The highlight of the program was the Chopin Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor, performed by Hiro Imamura. The weak orchestral score of the Chopin presents a number of interpretative problems, many of which were unresolved in yesterday's performance. Miss Imamura, in contrast, did a superb job. The young pianist has technical brilliance and a fine understanding of phrasing. She has an unusual ability to recognize the importance of harmonic variety a quality so essential to a successful performance of Chopin.

The Yomiuri Nippon Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conducting, presented a program in Symphony Hall on Friday evening, November 3.

Overture to Semiramide	Rossini
Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor, Op. 21	Chopin
Hiro Imamura, pianist
Classical Symphony in D, Op. 25	Prokofeff
Selections from West Side Story	Bernstein
Galete Parisienne Suite	Offenbach

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

JAN 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Thoughts About Children's Music

By DAVID NOBLE

Children's concerts are big business with American symphony orchestras. The Boston Symphony is no exception.

Three Saturday morning programs are prepared each season, and each is given twice. By the time you read this, the second program of the series, entitled "Is Jazz Classical?" will have run its course.

An audience of children has a special quality: Not only a restlessness, but a kind of hush caused by the impressiveness of the unfamiliar place, and by the way the huge indoor space swallows up the sound of little voices.

Seen in sympathy with small eyes, the orchestra takes on a surreal cast; the curious quasi-symmetry of the seating, the ease of the musicians among the strange objects.

Last Saturday morning everything settled down and Harry Ellis Dickson, the conductor of the children's series, came out and launched the players into an energetic overture concocted out of themes from "West Side Story." It was a fairly nice waker-upper for all concerned.

turned around and introduced Newton Wayland, a Boston Jazz figure who did most of the commentary for the concert. Their dialogue was classic vaudeville, with Wayland cast as Leonard Bernstein and Dickson as Bones:

Dickson: Now we just heard an overture by a serious American musician, Leonard Bernstein. I'd like to ask a question—was it classical or was it jazz?

Wayland: Well, I can't answer that, Harry. I've thought a lot about it, and I just can't answer. It's got a lot of different things in it. There are some Latin things in it . . . and a lot of Copland and a couple of groovy tunes . .

After a brief excerpt from Milhaud's "Creation of the World":

Dickson: Well, that sounded pretty jazzy to me. How about it, Newton?

Wayland: Well, we'll find out. How many thought it was jazz?

Kids (two or three dozen): Yeeeeeess!

Wayland: How many thought it was classical?

Kids (the same ones): Yeeeeeeesss!

Wayland: It sounds like it was evenly divided.

During the rest of the concert Wayland effectively presented several brief examples of jazz, assisted by a combo which included the remarkable reed man Frank Nizzari, and symphonic music related to it in varying degrees, assisted by Dickson and the orchestra.

The musical examples were played nicely, for the most part; as an offbeat morning musicale, the program was quite nice. The finale from Gunther Schuller's Concertino for Jazz Quartet and Orchestra was particularly interesting.

But apart from the briefest sort of listening exposure, I can't imagine what the young audience took away from the whole thing. There seemed to be a nice rapport between Wayland and the kids who knew the answers (someone spouted up the word "syncopation" when Wayland fished for it) but things were just too frenetic, on the stage and in the hall, for much serious talk.

A little more attention to logical sequence in programming might have reduced the need for lectures; Early jazz examples followed by, say, the Copland Piano Concerto would speak eloquently to young and jaded alike. The pairing of Wayland's "Pinnochio" songs and Schuller's finale was good, but little was made of it in the commentary, and the patchwork of surrounding pieces rather confused the issue.

The B.S.O. is not the only orchestra to have problems with its children's concert concept. A midwestern orchestra manager once told me, "Those concerts don' build audience. But th only way I can get sor businessmen to contribute to mention all those th sands of kids."

Here in the Hub, the patrons may be more enlightened. But the children's concerts are not much better.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

JAN 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Spring Series Firmed

Planning for the spring, the Hartford Symphony has lined up four top - drawer attractions for its ever - popular Saturday Night Pops series.

Now in its third season, the series features four concerts with a special appeal to fans of light classical music.

The concerts are held Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Bushnell Memorial.

* * *

On Apr. 27, pianist - conductor Skitch Henderson comes to the Pops podium to launch the series.

The music director of NBC TV's Tonight Show is not only a composer, conductor, pianist and raconteur, but one of the country's leading concert artists.

Gold and Fizdale, hailed among the best duo piano team in the country join the Symphony Pops Orchestra May 4.

The two pianists, whose concert circuit spans two continents, were the first artists invited to give a recital in the new Philharmonic Hall, New York during Lincoln Center's opening week celebration in 1962.

* * *

Stars of Broadway, television and the concert stage, Earl Wrightson and Lois Hunt who appeared in last season's opening Pops concert, will return May 11 with a new program of operetta, musical comedy and hits from Broadway.

Harry Ellis Dickson, will also be back, conducting the May 4 and 11 concerts.

Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and

SKITCH HENDERSON . . . Here Apr. 27

Esplanade concerts, is in his third season with the Hartford Symphony Pops Orchestra.

* * *

And, finally, the Symphony invites regional residents to be one of the "Gang" May 25 when Mr. Sing - Along himself, Mitch Miller comes to the Bushnell for an evening of musical favorites, old and new.

Tickets for the general public will go on sale after subscribers to last season's series have had priority seating.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 30 1968 New England Newsclip

SHARING a preview of "Night at the Pops" are Jia Page and David Booth of Beverly. (Edison Farrand Photo)

Special Pops preview will benefit hospital

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

"We thought everyone needed a touch of Spring," chic, energetic Mrs. Louis Cabot said as batches of committee guests arrived at her snow-scaped Larch Row home in Wenham.

So this year Boston's traditional harbinger of Spring — the opening of Boston Pops — will come in the form of a preview a full month ahead of its regular schedule. On Mar. 24, the Pops men will give a special concert at the Beverly High School to raise money for a cardiac monitor for the Beverly Hospital.

Harry Dickson, the BSO's composer and Youth Concert founder, will be on the podium this time since Arthur Fiedler will still be in New Zealand on a special concert tour with Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." (Ellen Fiedler is doing the narrator stint that Sen. Edward Kennedy did at Tanglewood.)

Mrs. George Putnam, Mrs. Donald Booth, Mrs. George Spear, Mrs. Henry Glovsky, Mrs. Robert Greenslet, and Mrs. Russell Rowell were among the early comers shedding coats and plunging into stacks of invitation lists at the flower-decked tables in the pleasant pine-panelled sitting room.

Committee members and sponsors are planning Sunday Pops supper parties by the dozen.

There'll be something for everybody on Feb. 24: a champagne discotheque, a film premiere and the only American showing of the paintings chosen for the Brazilian Exhibition at Sao Paulo. That's when the Rose Museum, the Spingold Theatre, and other Brandeis showpieces will be housing the happenings. "The English bus" actually there are two London Transports here now) will tour visitors from one spot to another. Mrs. Louis Klebenov is chairman of the "grand tour."

★

Two Boston gals with fascinating apartments and hospitality to match are planning the Barnard Evening at the Institute of Contemporary Art on Feb. 1. Mrs. Melvin Field, whose beautiful collections of English and French china compete with the triple view of the Charles River at the Fields' Memorial Drive duplex, will share honors with Mrs. Michael Rotenberg whose Beacon Hill place is like a serene bit of Mexico City. Busy with the alumnae who are heading for the ICA from all over New England will be Barnard Club president Patricia McArdle. And the ICA's poet-curator David Antin will tour the "Young Italians" exhibit with the evening's guests.

Skindivers' trophies will be the decorations for "Down in Davy Jones' Locker," the Spring dinner dance of the Officers Wives Club. The South Weymouth Naval Air Station wives are collecting the underseas decor for the black tie party which will be at the Officers Club at the Boston Shipyard on Mar. 1.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

JAN 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Thoughts About Children's Music

By DAVID NOBLE

Children's concerts are big business with American symphony orchestras. The Boston Symphony is no exception.

Three Saturday morning programs are prepared each season, and each is given twice. By the time you read this, the second program of the series, entitled "Is Jazz Classical?" will have run its course.

An audience of children has a special quality: Not only a restlessness, but a kind of hush caused by the impressiveness of the unfamiliar place, and by the way the huge indoor space swallows up the sound of little voices.

Seen in sympathy with small eyes, the orchestra takes on a surreal cast; the curious quasi-symmetry of the seating, the ease of the musicians among the strange objects.

Last Saturday morning everything settled down and Harry Ellis Dickson, the conductor of the children's series, came out and launched the players into an energetic overture concocted out of themes from "West Side Story." It was a fairly nice waker-upper for all concerned.

turned around and introduced Newton Wayland, a Boston Jazz figure who did most of the commentary for the concert. Their dialogue was classic vaudeville, with Wayland cast as Leonard Bernstein and Dickson as Bones:

Dickson: Now we just heard an overture by a serious American musician, Leonard Bernstein. I'd like to ask a question—was it classical or was it jazz?

Wayland: Well, I can't answer that, Harry. I've thought a lot about it, and I just can't answer. It's got a lot of different things in it. There are some Latin things in it . . . and a lot of Copland and a couple of groovy times . .

After a brief excerpt from Milhaud's "Creation of the World":

Dickson: Well, that sounded pretty jazzy to me. How about it, Newton?

Wayland: Well, we'll find out. How many thought it was jazz?

Kids (two or three dozen): Yeeeeeess!

Wayland: How many thought it was classical?

Kids (the same ones): Yeeeeeeesss!

Wayland: It sounds like it was evenly divided.

During the rest of the concert Wayland effectively presented several brief examples of jazz, assisted by a combo which included the remarkable reed man Frank Nizzari, and symphonic music related to it in varying degrees, assisted by Dickson and the orchestra.

The musical examples were played nicely, for the most part; as an offbeat morning musicale, the program was quite nice. The finale from Gunther Schuller's Concertino for Jazz Quartet and Orchestra was particularly interesting.

But apart from the briefest sort of listening exposure, I can't imagine what the young audience took away from the whole thing. There seemed to be a nice rapport between Wayland and the kids who knew the answers (someone spouted up the word "syncopation" when Wayland fished for it) but things were just too frenetic, on the stage and in the hall, for much serious talk.

A little more attention to logical sequence in programming might have reduced the need for lectures; Early jazz examples followed by, say, the Copland Piano Concerto would speak eloquently to young and jaded alike. The pairing of Wayland's "Pinnochio" songs and Schuller's finale was good, but little was made of it in the commentary, and the patchwork of surrounding pieces rather confused the issue.

The B.S.O. is not the only orchestra to have problems with its children's concert concept. A midwestern orchestra manager once told me, "Those concerts don' build audience. But th only way I can get sor businessmen to contribute to mention all those th sands of kids."

Here in the Hub, the patrons may be more enlightened. But the children's concerts are not much better.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,000

JAN 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Spring Series Firmed

Planning for the spring, the Hartford Symphony has lined up four top - drawer attractions for its ever - popular Saturday Night Pops series.

Now in its third season, the series features four concerts with a special appeal to fans of light classical music.

The concerts are held Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Bushnell Memorial.

* * *

On Apr. 27, pianist - conductor Skitch Henderson comes to the Pops platform to launch the series.

The music director of NBC TV's Tonight Show is not only a composer, conductor, pianist and raconteur, but one of the country's leading concert artists.

Gold and Fizdale, hailed among the best duo piano team in the country, join the Symphony Pops Orchestra May 4.

The two pianists, whose concert circuit spans two continents, were the first artists invited to give a recital in the new Philharmonic Hall, New York during Lincoln Center's opening week celebration in 1962.

* * *

Stars of Broadway, television and the concert stage, Earl Wrightson and Lois Hunt who appeared in last season's opening Pops concert, will return May 11 with a new program of operetta, musical comedy and hits from Broadway.

Harry Ellis Dickson, will also be back, conducting the May 4 and 11 concerts.

Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and

SKITCH HENDERSON . . . Here Apr. 27

Esplanade concerts, is in his third season with the Hartford Symphony Pops Orchestra.

* * *

And, finally, the Symphony invites regional residents to be one of the "Gang" May 25 when Mr. Sing - Along himself, Mitch Miller comes to the Bushnell for an evening of musical favorites, old and new.

Tickets for the general public will go on sale after subscribers to last season's series have had priority seating.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 30 1968 New England Newsclip

SHARING a preview of "Night at the Pops" are Jia Page and David Booth of Beverly. (Edison Farrand Photo)

Special Pops preview will benefit hospital

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

"We thought everyone needed a touch of Spring," chic, energetic Mrs. Louis Cabot said as batches of committee guests arrived at her snow-scaped Larch Row home in Wenham.

So this year Boston's traditional harbinger of Spring — the opening of Boston Pops — will come in the form of a preview a full month ahead of its regular schedule. On Mar. 24, the Pops men will give a special concert at the Beverly High School to raise money for a cardiac monitor for the Beverly Hospital.

Harry Dickson, the BSO's composer and Youth Concert founder, will be on the podium this time since Arthur Fiedler will still be in New Zealand on a special concert tour with Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." (Ellen Fiedler is doing the narrator stint that Sen. Edward Kennedy did at Tanglewood.)

Mrs. George Putnam, Mrs. Donald Booth, Mrs. George Spear, Mrs. Henry Glovsky, Mrs. Robert Greenslet, and Mrs. Russell Rowell were among the early comers shedding coats and plunging into stacks of invitation lists at the flower-decked tables in the pleasant pine-panelled sitting room.

Committee members and sponsors are planning Sunday Pops supper parties by the dozen.

There'll be something for everybody on Feb. 24: a champagne discotheque, a film premiere and the only American showing of the paintings chosen for the Brazilian Exhibition at Sao Paulo. That's when the Rose Museum, the Spingold Theatre, and other Brandeis showpieces will be housing the happenings. "The English bus" actually there are two London Transports here now) will tour visitors from one spot to another. Mrs. Louis Klebenov is chairman of the "grand tour."

★

Two Boston gals with fascinating apartments and hospitality to match are planning the Barnard Evening at the Institute of Contemporary Art on Feb. 1. Mrs. Melvin Field, whose beautiful collections of English and French china compete with the triple view of the Charles River at the Fields' Memorial Drive duplex, will share honors with Mrs. Michael Rotenberg whose Beacon Hill place is like a serene bit of Mexico City. Busy with the alumnae who are heading for the ICA from all over New England will be Barnard Club president Patricia McArdle. And the ICA's poet-curator David Antin will tour the "Young Italians" exhibit with the evening's guests.

Skindivers' trophies will be the decorations for "Down in Davy Jones' Locker," the Spring dinner dance of the Officers Wives Club. The South Weymouth Naval Air Station wives are collecting the underseas decor for the black tie party which will be at the Officers Club at the Boston Shipyard on Mar. 1.

87

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Boston Pops Concert in Beverly To Aid Hospital Fund Drive

SPRING WILL BE GREETED three days after its official arrival by a Pops Concert, Sunday evening, March 24, at the Beverly High School. The Boston Pops Orchestra will be conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson, as Arthur Fiedler will not have returned from his travels. Mrs. Donald Booth of Topsfield is chairman of the concert and the proceeds will be used for a cardiac monitoring system for the Beverly Hospital.

The area chairmen are busy planning Sunday night supper parties, and Miss Constance Hanley, director of volunteers at the hospital, will provide a group of junior volunteers to usher at the concert.

Mrs. Sears Winslow of Manchester has designed an attractive poster and invitations, and Mrs. E. Miles Herter is in charge of printing and addressing. Mrs. Louis Cabot and Mrs. William Moody of Wenham and Mrs. George M. Page of Topsfield will distribute the posters.

Among others working for the success of the concert are Mrs. Henry S. Lodge, Mrs. Howard B. Sprague Jr., Mrs. I. Vaughan Woodbury, Mrs. Robert Forbes Perkins, Mrs. Thomas I. Cooke, Mrs. James Richardson, Mrs. A. Warren Parsons, Mrs. Burnham E. Lamkins, Mrs. Robert Seidler and Mrs. Charles Lieberman.

Also, Mrs. Russell J. Rowell, Mrs. George Putnam Jr., Mrs. Roger F. Greenslet, Mrs. Moses Knowlton Jr., Mrs. John M. Bradley, Mrs. David W. Foster, Mrs. Orrin C. Dunn, Mrs. George R. Spear and Mrs. C. Henry Glovsky.

* * *

BSO Pension Fund Concert

CARNATION BOUTONNIERES will be worn by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their conductor and guest soloist, at the annual Pension Fund concert, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 11, in Symphony Hall.

Making this nice gesture toward the orchestra is a group of its Milton subscribers headed by Mrs. Edward Watson. The group will thus honor the Boston Symphony players and conductor for "the splendid work they are doing" on the occasion of one of their important annual events.

Music director Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra have invited Jack Benny to be the guest artist at the Pension Fund Concert. The celebrated radio and television comedian will bring his equally famous violin to Symphony Hall and will "play a few selections with the orchestra."

* * *

Canada Thursday Morning Talks Topic

WOMEN'S INTERESTS extend far beyond their homes these days. Many of them will learn about "Canada, the Problems of Unity," Thursday morning, Feb. 8, in the Parish House Hall of the First Church, Congregational, in Cambridge. This is the last lecture in the 32nd season of Thursday Morning Talks to benefit the Mount Auburn Hospital.

Bouillon will be served from 10:15 to 10:45. On hand to greet the subscribers will be Mrs. Andrew Anderson-Bell, junior chairman, Mrs. Chilton S. Cabot, Mrs. Albert L. Hopkins, Mrs. John Jeppson 3rd, Mrs. William C. King, Mrs. Edmund K. Summersby and Mrs. Peter Winn.

"War and Peace in the Middle East" will be discussed Thursday morning, Feb. 15 at Hamilton Hall, Salem. David S. Landes, professor of history, Research Associate to the Program on Technology and Society, and director of the Center for Middle Eastern Studies at Harvard University, will give this third in the series of current events lectures to benefit Hamilton Hall.

Pouring bouillon before the 11 o'clock lecture will be Mrs. George E. Benson and Mrs. Philip Bourne. Assisting Mrs. Paul D. Giles with tickets at the door will be Mrs. Frances Brown Jr., Mrs. John B. Ballou and Mrs. Stilman G. David. Ushers will be Mrs. Channing Bacall Jr., Mrs. Jeremiah S. Burns, Mrs. Henry P. Binney Jr. and Mrs. William Russell Burns Jr.

Of course, men, as well as women, are welcomed to these talks, but most men find it difficult to go to lectures in the morning.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
MT. WASHINGTON PRESS
W. 5,000

MAR 21 1968 Buffalo

Boston Pops Coming

Erich Leinsdorf, winner of numerous awards for his conducting achievements, will direct his Boston Symphony Orchestra at a special concert in Music Hall, Friday, March 29, at 8:30 p.m. The concert is sponsored by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The program will be comprised of music by famous German composers.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert are avaiable at the Symphony Box Office, Baldwin's, 29 West 4th St. Cincinnati. They may be charged at Shillito's Ticket Center in downtown and suburban stores.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Pops Night to Aid Italian Children

Dr. John E. Mangini of Saugus has been named chairman of the committee arranging a Night at the Pops, at Symphony Hall, May 29, to benefit the Home for Italian Children. He is past president of Medford Tecachers Association.

Sponsors of the annual event are members of the Guild for the Home for Italian Children. Mrs. John Zammarchi of Winchester, is president of the Guild and Anthony Tomasello is treasurer.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

MAR 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Newsy Paragraphs

The Middlesex Chapter of the Massachusetts Association of Medical Assistants held a dinner meeting at The Ship on Route 1, Lynnfield, on Wednesday, March 27. Mrs. Agnes Sanford, secretary to Dr. John McNulty of Wakefield presided. Arthur Veno of the Choate Memorial Hospital in Woburn was the speaker on "Hospital Administrative Procedures."

Mrs. John Zammarchi of 1 Hutchinson Road is president of the Guild for the Home for Italian Children which this year will again sponsor a Boston Pops concert. The benefit is scheduled for Wednesday, May 29.

Ralph R. Macaulay. All brands of vacuum cleaners sold and serviced. Authorized Hoover dealer, 29 Park Avenue, Medford. Tel. 395-6265. dec26-tf

Robert Brotherston of 5 Ridgefield Road, a member of the Boston Area Committee for Goddard College, will help to sponsor a program by the college dance group in Boston on Monday, April 22. The group will present a series of numbers which will include controlled improvisations by students. The presentation will take place at the New England Life Hall, 225 Clarendon Street at 8:15 p.m.

For Fuel Oil, Phone Fitzgerald Fuel Co., 729-3000. tf

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 384,100

APR 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Karsh portraits on view

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Paul Schmid and his wife, just back in Westport from a visit in Australia, will have a British guest at today's invitation preview of Portraits by Karsh at the Museum. Michael Stewart-Smith, who'll be here for a while, will be given a party at the Chilton Club after the Museum's 5:30 to 7:30 round of Yousuf Karsh's extraordinary pictures of "Men Who Make Our World."

★

The Henry B. Cabots have sent out concise and cordial directions for finding Strawberry Hill street in Dover and their lovely old house, which will be the perfect setting for a Boston Symphony party — complete with music. May 5 is the date.

★

The party circuit this week includes two farewells: one to the Giorgio Caregas on Thursday (he'll be consul general for Italy at Los Angeles as of May 1); and the other at the British Officer's Club, British Consul Frank Darvall, who's going to London for a Parliamentary post.

★

The Boston Pops will be 83 years old on Apr. 29. A share in the season's dates will go to New York's Paper Industry Management and to Ikebana International.

Harvard has its usual three nights: a 25th reunion, the entire house will be theirs, on June 10; the Business School, on May 13; and the Harvard class of 1963, on June 7.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

APR 21 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony ends Apr. 27, Boston Pops due Apr. 30

The Boston Symphony will close its 87th Winter season with concerts Tuesday, Friday and Saturday and an open rehearsal Thursday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The Friday-Saturday program will open with Stravinsky's Ode, a work that the orchestra will play this Summer in New York's Philharmonic Hall series honoring the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Also to be heard Friday and Saturday are Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and the Brahms Symphony No. 1. The Thursday open rehearsal at 7:30 is the final preparation for this concert.

Tuesday evening the program will be made up of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" Prelude, Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Following these concerts Leinsdorf will travel in Europe, conducting in Frankfurt and Lausanne. His next appearance with the Boston Symphony will be the opening concert, July 5, at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood.

Monday evening, Apr. 29, the Boston Pops will take over Symphony Hall. For the first program, conductor Arthur Fiedler has chosen Rossini's "Barber of Seville" Overture to make the centenary of the composer's death. Shostakovich's Incidental Music to "Hamlet" will be introduced to the Pops repertory, and a pianist long associated with Pops, Jesus Maria Sanroma, will be welcomed back. Sanroma will play the G major Ravel Piano Concerto and the andante of Mozart Piano Concerto (K. 467) which is theme music for the movie, "Elvira Madigan."

Also on the Pops opening program will be Gold's Boston Pops March, a medley from "Camelot," the pop song "Georgy Girl" and the TV medley, "Look-Sharp-Be-Sharp." Pops will continue for nine weeks. Concerts will be nightly, Monday-Saturday, at 8:30, through June 29.

88

TRANSCRIPT
DEDHAM, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,000

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

UNH Alumni Pops Night

University of New Hampshire alumni will hold their 17th Annual Pops Night on May 10 at Boston's Symphony Hall. The Boston Alumni Club will host the concert. Proceeds will go to the UNH Scholarship Fund of the Boston Club.

Edward J. Heney, formerly of John Philip Sousa's band, and campus Alumni Bandmaster will be the featured saxophone soloist with the Pops Orchestra. A 50-man group from the Durham campus "The New Hampshiremen" will sing during intermission.

A post-Pops party will follow at the Somerset Hotel.

Tickets may be obtained from Frederick Armstrong, III, of Sudbury, Pops Night Chairman.

HERALD
ARLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,500

APR 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Regis Night At The Pops

The Regis College Guild will sponsor the Thirty Second Annual Regis Night at the Pops on Saturday, May 4, 1968 -- Arthur Fiedler directing the orchestra.

At the Intermission, the Regis College Gle Club under the direction of Berj Zamkochian will be featured in a program that will include works by Mendelssohn and Verdi and selections from "Man of La Mancha."

For reservations and tickets contact Mrs. William Edmonds, 862-4713, and Mrs. William Swift, 944-3673.

The annual Mass and Communion Breakfast of the Regis College Guild will be held on Tuesday, April 30, 1968 at 10:30 a.m. The Mass will be concelebrated in Angela Hall. Breakfast will be served in the Student Union. Reverend Charles Ring C.P.S. Espousal Retreat House will be the guest speaker at the breakfast. Mrs. Francis Forrest is chairman.

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Elliot Hospital Juniors Sponsor Concert

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are scheduled to appear at the John F. Kennedy Memorial Coliseum, 303 Beech Street, Manchester, on Sunday, April 21, 1968 at 8:30 p.m. The event again being sponsored by the Elliot Hospital Junior Associates.

Tickets may be purchased at the Bill DeRemer Insurance Agency, Broadway, Derry.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
CIRC. 7,850

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

...Townsman, Wellesley, Mass., Thursday, April 25,

UNH Pops Night Symphony Hall Friday, May 10

University of New Hampshire alumni will converge on Boston's Symphony Hall on May 10 for their 17th Annual Pops Night. The Boston Alumni Club as host of the program invites all alumni and students of the University, including the campuses at Durham, Plyouth State College and Keene State College. Proceeds go to the UNH Scholarship Fund of the Boston Club.

Edward J. Heney, formerly of John Philip Sousa's Band, and campus Alumni Bandmaster, will be the featured saxophone soloist with the Pops Orchestra, and during intermission a 50-man choral group from the Durham campus known as "The New Hampshiremen" will sing.

A post-Pops party will follow at the Somerset Hotel.

Chairman of UNH Night at the Pops is Frederick P. Armstrong, 3rd, of Sudbury, from whom tickets are obtainable.

Invited guests include Governor and Mrs. John W. King of New Hampshire, President and Mrs. John W. McConnell of the University, President and Mrs. Harold E. Hyde of Plymouth State College, President and Mrs. Roman J. Zorn of Keene State College, and President and Mrs. Dean P. Williamson of the UNH Board of Trustees.

Paul I. ('38) and Rhoda Mann of 137 Temple st., West Newton are serving on the Committee.

TRANSCRIPT
DEDHAM, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,000

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Plan "Fisher Night At Pops"

Mrs. Angela Speros of 13 Demetra terrace, Dedham, is a member of the committee planning "Fisher Night at the Pops," to be held on Tuesday, April 30, in Symphony Hall, Boston.

Sponsored by Fisher Junior College, the event will aid the school's Memorial Scholarsip Fund Drive.

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Dean Night At The Pops' Set Wednesday In Boston

FRANKLIN — The fourth annual "Dean Night at the Pops" will be held Wednesday in Boston's Symphony Hall. The concert, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, will get under way at 8:30.

More than 500 persons from the Dean Junior College area will attend. Concert patrons will include E. Ross Anderson, Robert L. Bissland, Miss Brenda Lee Buchanan, Mr. and Mrs. M. Luther Buchanan, Samuel Castleman, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund J. Connolly Jr., and David B. Crowley.

Also, Dean President and Mrs. Donald E. Deyo, James W. Fox, Mrs. M. Kenneth Henderson, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Horan Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Donald M. Hyde, Dwight B. MacCormack Jr., Atty. and Mrs. Louis J. Noferi, Mr. and Mrs. David L. Peirce, Miss Susan S. Pond, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley R. Tippett and Mr. and Mrs. Paul R. Torres.

Dean students and others attending the concert will board buses that evening at 6:45 in front of Pierce House on the campus.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 139,709

APR 30 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Pops Regis Night On Saturday

Regis Night at the Boston Pops will be held Saturday, opening night of the Pops 32d anniversary.

Reunions and dinner parties will precede the musical portion of Regis Night.

Proceeds will benefit Regis College Building Fund, currently in a three-year pledge for an additional dormitory and auditorium.

Committee members includes Regis Guild President, Mrs. Leo Heffernan, Somerville; Mrs. William R. Edmonds, Lexington, gneral chairman; Mrs. William Swift, Reading, Mrs. Frank Hutchinson, Milton, and Mrs. Peter Tassinari, Arlington, alumnae president.

Sister Mary Claire, guild moderator, will be hostess to the Sisters of St. Joseph, attending the concert.

CHRONICLE
NEEDHAM, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,300

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Couples Club Plan Night At Boston Pops

A Night at the Boston Pops will be the final event of the current season for the Needham Congregational Church Couples Club. The club event will take place Friday, June 7. Following the Pops, dessert will be served at the church.

Bus transportation is available, according to an announcement from the club.

Tickets for the Pops and dessert are priced at $4 and $5. With bus transportation, prices are $5.25 and $6.25. Reservations may be made on or before May 5.

For additional information call Paul Abbott at 444-7260 or Mrs. Fred Perry at 444-2513.

The steering committee for the coming season will meet June 15th at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Brosman to discuss plans for the season and enjoy a cookout. Committee members are Mr. and Mrs. Robert Calkins, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Engdahl, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Faulkner, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Genaske, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Marble, Mr. and Mrs. Tony Wyman and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,960

APR 26 1968 New England Newsclip

UNH Alumni Plan 17th Pops Night

BOSTON — University of New Hampshire Alumni will hold their 17th Pops Night at Sympony Hall May 10. All alumni and students of UNH are invited to attend.

Proceeds will go to the club's scholarship fund. Tickets are available from Frederick P. Armstrong III, 38 Grindstone Lane, Sudbury, chairman of the event.

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 16,400

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Night at Pops

The Connecticut College Club of Boston will sponsor a night at the Pops, preceded by dinner at the Midtown Motor Inn, Friday, May 3, and proceeds will benefit the scholarship fund with preference for a student in the Greater Boston area.

Mrs. Samuel K. Martin of Wellesley is chairman, assisted by Mrs. Charles W. Morse Jr. of Wayland and Mrs. Richard Purdy of Weston.

The following alumnae will serve as patronesses: Mrs. Paul Kateman of Waltham, Mrs. Alfred W. William of Belmont, Mrs. Roger Lester and Mrs. Earle Wilkins, both of Newton; Mrs. Charles Norton and Mrs. Carl Weisenbach, both of Wellesley; Mrs. W. Brownell Freeman and Mrs. John T. Funkhouser, both of Weston. Mrs. Funkhouser is president.

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
CIRC. 7,850

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Regis Pops Night Saturday, May 4

The Regis College Guild will sponsor the Thirty-Second Annual Regis Night at the Pops on Saturday, May, 1968 — Arthur Fiedler directing the Orchestra.

At the Intermission, the Regis College Glee Club under the direction of Berj Zamkochian will be featured in a program that will include works by Mendelssohn and Verdi, and selections from "Man of La Mancha."

For Reservations and Tickets, contact: Mrs. William Edmonds, 862-4713, or Mrs. William Swift, 944-3673.

CHAMBER CONCERTS

89

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to Introduce Eight New String Players

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra reconvenes later this month for the first rehearsals of the new season, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will introduce eight new string players to the members of the orchestra. The new players replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching, and another who was appointed to a first chair in the St. Louis Symphony.

Two new players will join each of the string choirs of the orchestra. They are: violisn — Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison; violas — Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten; cellos — Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman; Basses — Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olsen.

Christopher Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Julliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Mr. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandlelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Robert Barnes comes from the Detroit Symphony orchestra. He studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Yizhak Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianopolis Symphony Orchestras.

EACH OF THE cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Jerome Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Ronald Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, former member of the orchestra's cello section.

Buell Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Robert Olsen was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Ray Fitch.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Eight New String Players Joining Boston Symphony

Eight string players will join the Boston Symphony this season. They replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching and a third who becomes principal cellist in the St. Louis Symphony.

The new men are violinists Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison, violists Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten, cellists Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman, and bass players Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olson.

Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Juilliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Barnes joins the Boston Symphony from the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He has studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianapolis Symphony Orchestras.

Each of the cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, for a number of years a member of the orchestra's cello section. Patterson has been a member of the Puerto Rico Symphony, the New Haven Symphony and most recently the Pittsburgh Orchestra. Feldman, the youngest of the new players, previously has performed in the Boston Ballet and Opera Orchestras and on occasion with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo. He has played in the Houston Symphony and his teacher was the late Georges Moleux, former principal bass of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Olson was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Ray Fitch.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW ROCHELLE STANDARD
Wednesday, September 27, 1967

BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music will sponsor a new chamber music series this season. Using seven instrumental ensembles drawn from the orchestra's personnel, the symphony will present ten concerts on Monday evenings in Boston's Jordan Hall.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

OCT 6 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Club Lists Arts Program

A French comedy, a world premiere by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series and a Christmas concert by the Worcester Orchestra will highlight this year's performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be given an exclusive showing at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium to start the series.

Guest Conductor

The noted troupe, "Treteau de Paris," will make its only Worcester appearance of the year in presenting the play.

A new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., "Concert for Organ and Orchestra," will receive its world premiere Nov. 19, played by the 26-member Boston Symphony Ensemble under the direction of Berj Zamkochian. Ferris will be guest conductor for the performance of his work.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas concert, directed by Harry Levenson and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

The Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department at the school, will present a series, "Listening to Music Creatively," Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28. The series is open to the public.

The series' annual Dollars for Scholars Ball will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller Orchestra will be featured.

Also in Series

Other performances of the series will include "Piano Artistry" by concert pianist Lily Siao Owyang, Jan. 14; the St. Paul Aspostle Chorale, March 3; the Milford Youth Orchestra, March 10; "H.M.S. Pinafore," April 17-24; and "Cyrano de Bergerac," April 27 and 28.

Reservations for any of the performances of the D'Alzon Club series may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Calude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

OCT 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Plans Performing Arts Events

A French comedy, a world premiere played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series, and a Christmas Concert by the Worcester Orchestra highlight the performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be performed at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium by "Treteau de Paris." It will be the only Worcester appearance this year by the noted troupe.

"Concert for Organ and Orchestra," a new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., will receive its world premiere Nov. 19 when played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble with Ferris as guest conductor.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas Concert, directed by Harry Levenson, and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

A series entitled "Listening to Music Creatively" will be given by the Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department of the school. The series, open to the public, will be presented Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28.

The annual "Dollars for Scholars Ball" will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller band will be featured.

Reservations for any of the performances may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Claude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

CHAMBER CONCERTS

89

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to Introduce Eight New String Players

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra reconvenes later this month for the first rehearsals of the new season, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will introduce eight new string players to the members of the orchestra. The new players replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching, and another who was appointed to a first chair in the St. Louis Symphony.

Two new players will join each of the string choirs of the orchestra. They are: violisn — Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison; violas — Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten; cellos — Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman; Basses — Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olsen.

Christopher Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Julliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Mr. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandlelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Robert Barnes comes from the Detroit Symphony orchestra. He studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Yizhak Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianopolis Symphony Orchestras.

EACH OF THE cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Jerome Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Ronald Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, former member of the orchestra's cello section.

Buell Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Robert Olsen was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Rav Fitch.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Eight New String Players Joining Boston Symphony

Eight string players will join the Boston Symphony this season. They replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching and a third who becomes principal cellist in the St. Louis Symphony.

The new men are violinists Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison, violists Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten, cellists Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman, and bass players Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olson.

Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Juilliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Barnes joins the Boston Symphony from the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He has studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianapolis Symphony Orchestras.

Each of the cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, for a number of years a member of the orchestra's cello section. Patterson has been a member of the Puerto Rico Symphony, the New Haven Symphony and most recently the Pittsburgh Orchestra. Feldman, the youngest of the new players, previously has performed in the Boston Ballet and Opera Orchestras and on occasion with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo. He has played in the Houston Symphony and his teacher was the late Georges Moleux, former principal bass of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Olson was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Ray Fitch.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW ROCHELLE STANDARD
Wednesday, September 27, 1967

BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music will sponsor a new chamber music series this season. Using seven instrumental ensembles drawn from the orchestra's personnel, the symphony will present ten concerts on Monday evenings in Boston's Jordan Hall.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

OCT 6 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Club Lists Arts Program

A French comedy, a world premiere by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series and a Christmas concert by the Worcester Orchestra will highlight this year's performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be given an exclusive showing at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium to start the series.

Guest Conductor

The noted troupe, "Treteau de Paris," will make its only Worcester appearance of the year in presenting the play.

A new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., "Concert for Organ and Orchestra," will receive its world premiere Nov. 19, played by the 26-member Boston Symphony Ensemble under the direction of Berj Zamkochian. Ferris will be guest conductor for the performance of his work.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas concert, directed by Harry Levenson and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

The Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department at the school, will present a series, "Listening to Music Creatively," Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28. The series is open to the public.

The series' annual Dollars for Scholars Ball will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller Orchestra will be featured.

Also in Series

Other performances of the series will include "Piano Artistry" by concert pianist Lily Siao Owyang, Jan. 14; the St. Paul Aspostle Chorale, March 3; the Milford Youth Orchestra, March 10; "H.M.S. Pinafore," April 17-24; and "Cyrano de Bergerac," April 27 and 28.

Reservations for any of the performances of the D'Alzon Club series may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Calude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

OCT 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Plans Performing Arts Events

A French comedy, a world premiere played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series, and a Christmas Concert by the Worcester Orchestra highlight the performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be performed at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium by "Treteau de Paris." It will be the only Worcester appearance this year by the noted troupe.

"Concert for Organ and Orchestra," a new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., will receive its world premiere Nov. 19 when played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble with Ferris as guest conductor.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas Concert, directed by Harry Levenson, and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

A series entitled "Listening to Music Creatively" will be given by the Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department of the school. The series, open to the public, will be presented Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28.

The annual "Dollars for Scholars Ball" will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller band will be featured.

Reservations for any of the performances may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Claude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

CHAMBER CONCERTS

89

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to Introduce Eight New String Players

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra reconvenes later this month for the first rehearsals of the new season, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will introduce eight new string players to the members of the orchestra. The new players replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching, and another who was appointed to a first chair in the St. Louis Symphony.

Two new players will join each of the string choirs of the orchestra. They are: violisn — Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison; violas — Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten; cellos — Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman; Basses — Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olsen.

Christopher Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Julliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Mr. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandlelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Robert Barnes comes from the Detroit Symphony orchestra. He studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Yizhak Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianopolis Symphony Orchestras.

EACH OF THE cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Jerome Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Ronald Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, former member of the orchestra's cello section.

Buell Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Robert Olsen was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Rav Fitch.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Eight New String Players Joining Boston Symphony

Eight string players will join the Boston Symphony this season. They replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching and a third who becomes principal cellist in the St. Louis Symphony.

The new men are violinists Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison, violists Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten, cellists Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman, and bass players Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olson.

Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Juilliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Barnes joins the Boston Symphony from the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He has studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianapolis Symphony Orchestras.

Each of the cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, for a number of years a member of the orchestra's cello section. Patterson has been a member of the Puerto Rico Symphony, the New Haven Symphony and most recently the Pittsburgh Orchestra. Feldman, the youngest of the new players, previously has performed in the Boston Ballet and Opera Orchestras and on occasion with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo. He has played in the Houston Symphony and his teacher was the late Georges Moleux, former principal bass of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Olson was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Ray Fitch.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW ROCHELLE STANDARD
Wednesday, September 27, 1967

BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music will sponsor a new chamber music series this season. Using seven instrumental ensembles drawn from the orchestra's personnel, the symphony will present ten concerts on Monday evenings in Boston's Jordan Hall.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

OCT 6 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Club Lists Arts Program

A French comedy, a world premiere by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series and a Christmas concert by the Worcester Orchestra will highlight this year's performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be given an exclusive showing at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium to start the series.

Guest Conductor

The noted troupe, "Treteau de Paris," will make its only Worcester appearance of the year in presenting the play.

A new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., "Concert for Organ and Orchestra," will receive its world premiere Nov. 19, played by the 26-member Boston Symphony Ensemble under the direction of Berj Zamkochian. Ferris will be guest conductor for the performance of his work.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas concert, directed by Harry Levenson and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

The Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department at the school, will present a series, "Listening to Music Creatively," Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28. The series is open to the public.

The series' annual Dollars for Scholars Ball will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller Orchestra will be featured.

Also in Series

Other performances of the series will include "Piano Artistry" by concert pianist Lily Siao Owyang, Jan. 14; the St. Paul Aspostle Chorale, March 3; the Milford Youth Orchestra, March 10; "H.M.S. Pinafore," April 17-24; and "Cyrano de Bergerac," April 27 and 28.

Reservations for any of the performances of the D'Alzon Club series may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Calude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

OCT 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Plans Performing Arts Events

A French comedy, a world premiere played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series, and a Christmas Concert by the Worcester Orchestra highlight the performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be performed at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium by "Treteau de Paris." It will be the only Worcester appearance this year by the noted troupe.

"Concert for Organ and Orchestra," a new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., will receive its world premiere Nov. 19 when played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble with Ferris as guest conductor.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas Concert, directed by Harry Levenson, and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

A series entitled "Listening to Music Creatively" will be given by the Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department of the school. The series, open to the public, will be presented Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28.

The annual "Dollars for Scholars Ball" will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller band will be featured.

Reservations for any of the performances may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Claude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

CHAMBER CONCERTS

89

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to Introduce Eight New String Players

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra reconvenes later this month for the first rehearsals of the new season, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will introduce eight new string players to the members of the orchestra. The new players replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching, and another who was appointed to a first chair in the St. Louis Symphony.

Two new players will join each of the string choirs of the orchestra. They are: violisn — Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison; violas — Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten; cellos — Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman; Basses — Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olsen.

Christopher Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Julliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Mr. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandlelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Robert Barnes comes from the Detroit Symphony orchestra. He studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Yizhak Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianopolis Symphony Orchestras.

EACH OF THE cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Jerome Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Ronald Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, former member of the orchestra's cello section.

Buell Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Robert Olsen was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Ray Fitch.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

SEP 17 1967 New England Newsclip

Eight New String Players Joining Boston Symphony

Eight string players will join the Boston Symphony this season. They replace five retired musicians, two who have gone into teaching and a third who becomes principal cellist in the St. Louis Symphony.

The new men are violinists Christopher Kimber and Spencer L. Larrison, violists Robert D. Barnes and Yizhak Schotten, cellists Jerome Patterson and Ronald Feldman, and bass players Buel Neidlinger and Robert Olson.

Kimber comes to Boston by way of Australia and London. He studied at Juilliard with Ivan Galamian. For two years he was assistant concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony and has participated in the Marlboro and Casals Festival in Puerto Rico. Larrison studied at the Eastman School, Curtis Institute, and Meadowmount School. His teachers have included Galamian and Bernard Mandelkern. Previously he has played in the Rochester Philharmonic, the Robert Shaw Orchestra and the Eastman Philharmonic Orchestra.

Barnes joins the Boston Symphony from the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He has studied at Wayne State University and his principal viola teacher was Henri Nosco. A native of Israel, Schotten lists his principal teacher as William Primrose. Professionally he has played with the Pittsburgh and Indianapolis Symphony Orchestras.

Each of the cellists joining the orchestra for the new season has studied with a member of the Boston Symphony. Patterson's teachers have been Luigi Silva and Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the orchestra. Feldman has studied with John Sant Ambrogio, for a number of years a member of the orchestra's cello section. Patterson has been a member of the Puerto Rico Symphony, the New Haven Symphony and most recently the Pittsburgh Orchestra. Feldman, the youngest of the new players, previously has performed in the Boston Ballet and Opera Orchestras and on occasion with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Neidlinger joins the orchestra from the academic life where for two years he was a member of the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo. He has played in the Houston Symphony and his teacher was the late Georges Moleux, former principal bass of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Olson was for 10 years a member of the Minneapolis Symphony and prior to that a member of the Kansas City Philharmonic. He holds a B.A. degree from the University of Minnesota and studied with Ray Fitch.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW ROCHELLE STANDARD
Wednesday, September 27, 1967

BOSTON CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music will sponsor a new chamber music series this season. Using seven instrumental ensembles drawn from the orchestra's personnel, the symphony will present ten concerts on Monday evenings in Boston's Jordan Hall.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

OCT 6 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Club Lists Arts Program

A French comedy, a world premiere by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series and a Christmas concert by the Worcester Orchestra will highlight this year's performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be given an exclusive showing at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium to start the series.

Guest Conductor

The noted troupe, "Treteau de Paris," will make its only Worcester appearance of the year in presenting the play.

A new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., "Concert for Organ and Orchestra," will receive its world premiere Nov. 19, played by the 26-member Boston Symphony Ensemble under the direction of Berj Zamkochian. Ferris will be guest conductor for the performance of his work.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas concert, directed by Harry Levenson and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

The Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department at the school, will present a series, "Listening to Music Creatively," Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28. The series is open to the public.

The series' annual Dollars for Scholars Ball will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller Orchestra will be featured.

Also in Series

Other performances of the series will include "Piano Artistry" by concert pianist Lily Siao Owyang, Jan. 14; the St. Paul Aspostle Chorale, March 3; the Milford Youth Orchestra, March 10; "H.M.S. Pinafore," April 17-24; and "Cyrano de Bergerac," April 27 and 28.

Reservations for any of the performances of the D'Alzon Club series may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Calude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

OCT 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Assumption Prep Plans Performing Arts Events

A French comedy, a world premiere played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a music appreciation series, and a Christmas Concert by the Worcester Orchestra highlight the performing arts program sponsored by the D'Alzon Club at Assumption Preparatory School.

"Turcaret," an 18th century French comedy, will be performed at 8 p.m. Oct. 16 in the school's Hebert Auditorium by "Treteau de Paris." It will be the only Worcester appearance this year by the noted troupe.

"Concert for Organ and Orchestra," a new work by William Ferris of Rochester, N.Y., will receive its world premiere Nov. 19 when played by the Boston Symphony Ensemble with Ferris as guest conductor.

The Worcester Orchestra's Christmas Concert, directed by Harry Levenson, and made possible by Local 143 of the Worcester Musicians Association, will be presented Dec. 17.

A series entitled "Listening to Music Creatively" will be given by the Rev. Gilbert E. Chabot, A.A., a musicologist and chairman of the classics department of the school. The series, open to the public, will be presented Oct. 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 3, and Jan. 28.

The annual "Dollars for Scholars Ball" will be held New Year's Eve in the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. The Glen Miller band will be featured.

Reservations for any of the performances may be made by contacting Assumption Preparatory School.

Claude B. Dufault is chairman of the series.

MISSING
PAGE(S)

99

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

OCT 18 1967 New England Newsclip

Our Soviet Visitors

If history teaches anything, it is that tomorrow brings changes. When Catherine II of Russia harbored the Jesuits in 1773 after they had been ordered to disband, she probably never dreamt that one day her land would be ruled by an atheistic regime. By the same token, Joseph Stalin probably had no idea that in 1967 a Soviet educational exhibit would be on display in a Jesuit university just outside Boston.

The day may also come when the United States and the Soviet Union, instead of being adversaries exploring a hesitant kind of detente, may actually be able to co-exist in true peace. Certainly the chances for this are increased as understanding between the two nations and people increase.

There is considerable value, therefore, in the U.S.-Soviet cultural exchange program and the events it has brought to our community this week. Besides the Soviet educational exhibit at Boston College, open to the public daily except Monday through Nov. 12, the Moscow Circus last night began a six-day engagement at Boston Garden. Just as the visit of chamber members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Russia gave Soviet citizens a taste of an important part of American life, the educational exhibit and the circus afford our citizens exposure to two disparate fruits of Soviet culture.

Residents of Greater Boston should take advantage of the exchange program offerings. Whatever happens in U.S.-Soviet relations in years ahead, it is to our interest to know more about the Soviet people, including how they are educated and what entertains them.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

OCT 8 1967 New England Newsclip

Music

Conservatory Head Outlines His Plans

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Gunther Schuller, new president of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, is a man of action.

We interviewed him this summer about his plans for the conservatory. It had been intimated that as one of this country's major exponents of contemporary idioms, his concentration would be on that area of the school's curriculum.

Schuller conceded that the contemporary music department would be expanded "a little bit."

But he added, "However, chamber music is definitely in need of expansion. This is the first area in which I'm going to work."

New Chamber Series

It is now announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in cooperation with the New England Conservatory, will sponsor a new chamber music series this season.

Using seven instrumental ensembles drawn from Boston Symphony personnel, ten Monday evening concerts of chamber music will be given in the Conservatory's Jordan Hall, beginning tomorrow night at 8:30.

About 40 players will take part in the new serieds to be known as Ensembles of the Boston Symphony. Included with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, formed in 1963, will be the Boston Sinfonietta, Boston Symphony String Trio, Boston Trio, Music Guild String Quartet, New England Woodwind Quintet and Stockbridge String Quartet.

Inevitable results of this chamber music promotion will be increased interest, rise in standards, and founding of resident chamber music groups within the conservatory framework.

CRITICS' "BRAINWASH?" — The term "brainwash" has invaded the field of music criticism.

It headlines an article by free lance music writer Rose Heylbut in Music Journal's 1967 Anthology. Title is 'Brainwash or Back Talk."

Miss Heylbut declares that "like the drop of a guillotine, the printed review is final."

She goes on to say, "there come times when the urge to talk back grows urgent. Such moments occur when the reviewer steps beyond his function of reporting a performance, and begins, however subtly, to editorialize by (1) presenting his preferences (as to taste, styles, etc.) as though they were positive musical values; and (2) rebuking esteemed performers for preferring a different set of values."

Addressing members of the Music Critics Association this summer at Tanglewood, Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf remarked that it amused him to discover how often critics are thought to "change hats."

When they write favorably about a performance, they wear the hat of genius. The same genius becomes a lunatic when he "rebukes esteemed performers."

The basis of any unfavorable review is the writer's preference for "a different set of values."

"BOOTS" MUSSULLI — With the death of "Boots" Mussulli, not only the Milford area but the musical profession has lost a dedicated advocate.

For many years, Boots had a liberal taste of national fame in the world of jazz, notably with Stan Kenton's orchestra.

Some three years ago, Boots embarked on a new career when he founded the Milford Youth Orchestra. In an interview last December, he said, "I have as great an incentive in this as in anything I've ever done in my life."

Boots set high standards for the 55 members of his youth orchestra.

For example, his statement, "A lot of our jazz ideas today are taken from the great masters. Bach is still the granddaddy of jazz. A jazz player can benefit tremendously from studying Bach's counterpoint."

An Emotional Thing

Nor did Boots deplore those who "give Bach the business."

"When straight Bach digresses into jazz," he said, "that's an emotional thing."

He was just as positive in his opinion of grotesque jazz and folk music images that are more and more prevalent.

To emphasize it, Boots decided that there was no place in the Milford band for "way outs."

He dismissed the possibility by deciding, "It's against our policy, and that's that."

Boots' two main objectives, each influencing the other, were the making of good music and character building.

Music has lost a fine person and splendid musician.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,070,836

OCT 29 1967

Lincoln Center Rival: Culture in Canarsie

The Guggenheims and the Kennedys are doing it and so are the Fords and the Bernsteins—they're going to Canarsie to get their culture.

It's the Gerritsen Beach Guggenheims, the Flatbush Fords, the Bay Ridge Bernsteins and the Canarsie Kennedys of whom we're speaking.

No longer do they have to travel to Lincoln Center, not since the Canarsie Beach Cultural and Civic Center announced its first subscription series.

Shows on Sundays

With only four dates scheduled, the series is off to a modest start, but an ambitious one. The four events feature Hal Holbook, famed Mark Twain impersonator; the Edward Villella dance company, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, and Earl Wrightson and Lois Hunt.

The series is already underway and the Villella troupe has made its appearance. However, tickets are still available for the other three performances, at $12 for the whole series. All shows are on Sunday at 8 p. m. in the Canarsie High School auditorium.

Holbrook will appear Nov. 28 with the show that won him a Tony on Broadway. In his impersonation, he uses only material written by Twain.

The Boston Symphony Players appear Jan. 28 and the series concludes with Earl Wrightson and Lois Hunt singing duets on March 31.

Proceeds are used to promote the Canarsie Beach Cultural and Civic Center, which the Parks Department now has on the drawing boards. The center is expected to be constructed within the next five years.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
46,350

OCT 28 1967 New England Newsclip

Music

Concerts for Young People To Open Seventh Season

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Opening concert of the seventh season of the Concerts for Young People, Inc., will be held in the Little Theater at Lowell State College, on Saturday, Nov. 4, will feature the well known duo, classical guitarist, Robert Paul Sullivan, of the New England Conservatory of Music faculty, and counter-tenor Daniel Collins of the Boston Opera company, in a program of guitar, lute and voice.

The series will offer three concerts. The second program will be "An Introduction to the Dance" featuring members of the dance department at the Boston Conservatory of Music; and the final program, the Orpheus Singers.

Richard G. Chadwick

It has been announced that the annual presentation of Handel's "Messiah" by the Congregational Church choir of Pelham, N. H., in association with leading choir singers from this area will be held in the Pelham church on Sunday evening, Dec. 3, at 8 p. m.

Mrs. Bernice R. Bigelow will again direct and Richard G. Chadwick will serve as organist. Selected soloists will include Elisabeth Phinney, soprano; Betty Morabito, contralto; John Morabito, tenor, and Richard T. Gill, bass.

Making music in a happy and very informal manner is in the offing for those male singers who would join the Townsmen Chorus which is directed by Brian O'Leary of Marblehead. The group, which is part of this country's "big" musical organization known as the Society for the Preservation and Encouragement of Barber Shop Quartet Singing in America, lists presently about 30 singers who hail from eight communities in the Lowell-Lawrence area. Those interested are urged to attend open rehearsals which are held every Monday evening at 8 p. m., at 175 Abbot Street, Andover. There are openings in all of the vocal sections. Singers may also contact Richard Gardner, at 10 Beaconsfield Street, Lawrence.

COMMUNITIES WHO HAVE wished for concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their areas will now have the opportunity of enjoying the superb ability of this organization's newly created Chamber Players. Actually formed by the Orchestra few seasons ago, the groups perform in various combines.

First there is the Boston Sinfonietta, directed by George Zazofsky, numbering three first and second violins, two viols, two celli and single bass. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players is headed by Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the BSO; Richard Goode, pianist who has joined the group this season; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, French horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone, and Everett Firth, timpini.

The BSO String Trio offers as members, Messrs. Silverstein, Fine and Eskin. Appearing with the Boston Trio are Roger Shermont, violin; John Sant Ambrogio, cello, and Phyllis Moss, piano. Players who make up the Music Guild String Quartet are Gerald Gelbloom, violin; Max Winder, violin; Bernard Kadinoff, viola, and Stephen Geber, cello.

For those who follow woodwind ensembles the New England Wind Quintet provides such outstanding artists as Lois Schaefer, Lawrence Thorstenberg, Peter Hadcock, Matthew Ruggiero, and Thomas Newell.

The brilliant Stockbridge String Quartet features Julius Schulman, William Marshall, Jerome Lipson and Mischa Nieland.

In speaking of the formation of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music director, Erich Leinsdorf said: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, trustees and management, feel that the highly accomplished individuals who perform in the Orchestra need, from time to time, to step out of being members of a choir and assert their artistic individuality."

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

NOV 12 1967 New England Newsclip

Cambridge Civic Symphony

The Cambridge Civic Symphony Orchestra will open its tenth anniversary season on Sunday, Nov. 19, with a concert at 8:30 p.m. in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University.

Victor Manusevitch, who founded the Orchestra in 1958, will conduct. The program will include Marcello's "Introduction—Aria—Presto," first performed in the Boston area by the CCSO in 1960, and Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor," introduced in 1963. Also on the program are Vivaldi's "Concerto for Piccolo in C Major" and Copland's "Quiet City."

Three prominent musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear as soloists with the Orchestra in this opening concert. They are Lois Schaefer, piccolo; Roger Voisin, trumpet; and Laurence Thorstenberg, English horn.

Tickets for the concert are available at the Harvard Coop and Briggs & Briggs, or at the door.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 3,100

NOV 14 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players Excel In Revival of Martinu Work

By GEORGE GELLES
Contributing Critic

It is good to see that the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony are reintroduceing the music of Bohuslav Martinu to local audiences. This most important of contemporary Czech composers came to this country in 1941, and spent the war years composing and teaching at New York's Mannes College and at Princeton. During the dozen years Martinu was here, it was the BSO which premiered several of his important works, among them his First, Third and Sixth Symphonies.

The 'Nonet,' which the Boston Symphony Chamber Players presented Monday night, was written in 1959, the year of the composer's death. Scored for woodwind quintet and one of each string, the piece draws melodically on the same folkloric stock which inspired Martinu's compatriot of half a century earlier, Janacek. The material in the 'Nonet' though, receives a much more elaborate and witty treatment than Janacek might have given it. The performance was excellent. we ela bo

New this year to the Chamber Players is pianist Richard Goode, who joined Silverstein, Fine, and Eskin in an excellent reading of the Brahms. Goode was very much in control of the performance, and with a remarkable sense of pace and shape moulded the piece most convincingly.

Ensemble was generally fine, as was intonation, though Silverstein every now and then seemed a bit too anxious and rushed on ahead.

It was the B.S.O. concertmaster who conducted none-too-happily the 'Octandre' of Varese. As was apparent in the performance several weeks ago by the chamber ensemble of the French Orchestra National, it seems impossible to make this piece go with a conductor. If conducted, there is, of necessity, a barrage of downbeats that flails the music to death. The piece wants to be led, sitting by one of the players; otherwise it seems to refuse to move.

The concert opened with an inconsequential performance of something labled Haydn's Trio, Opus 100.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS — Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; Richard Goode, piano), performing Haydn's G Major Trio for flute, violin, and cello, Op. 100; Varese's 'Octandre;' Martinu's 'Nonet;' and Brahms' Quartet for piano and strings, Op. 25, Monday night at Jordan Hall.

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.

NOV 10 1967 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS BOSTON CONCERT

BOSTON — Boston area chamber music audiences will have their first opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Chamber Players since their return from a lengthy international tour when the group performs on Monday evening, November 13, at Jordan Hall. The Chamber Players program will be the third in the new Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series, presented by the Orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory. The ten concert series consists of ensembles, drawn from the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performing chamber music from the Baroque to the contemporary periods.

The November 13 prosram will begin with Haydn's Trio No. 2 for Flute, Violin, and Cello in G Major, Op. 100, and continue with Octandre by Varese. Also to be heard will be Martinu's Nonet and, pianist Richard Goode will join the Chamber Players for the concluding music of the concert, Brahms' Piano Quartet in G minor, Op. 25. Mr. Goode accompanied the Players throughout last spring's seven week tour to England, the Soviet Union, and West Germany. He will be the regular pianist for the group this season.

Tickets for this concert and the remaining seven on the Ensembles series are available from the Jordan Hall Box Office, 30 Gainsborough St., Boston (Telephone 536-2412).

The Boston Symphony String Trio will give the next concert in the series on December 4. Complete information on other performing Ensembles and programs may also be obtained at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

NOV 2 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Groups To Perform In Schools

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players are no strangers to the New England musical scene.

Since the formation of the group several years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chamber Players have performed in many regional locations both large and small.

In expanding its offerings of chamber music, the orchestra is bringing to the attention of potential sponsors additional chamber ensembles ranging from trios to a small ensemble, all members from within the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This wide variation in size of the ensembles will enable them to give concerts in small halls, and before school, college and club audiences that might otherwise not be able to hear these experienced and renowned musicians.

According to Music Director Erich Leinsdorf: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, both trustees and management, feel that the highly accomplished individuals who perform in the orchestra, need, from time to time, to step out of being members of a choir and assert their artistic individuality. This is the reason we all favor, officially endorse, and manage the ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, and member of the Chamber Players, stated: "Expansion of the players' activities into this new program will give music lovers an opportunity to hear many fine chamber groups which have existed for some time without the important exposure they richly deserve. A repertoire spanning the complete breadth of chamber music will now become available to concert-goers in the area."

Further information may be obtained from Thomas D. Perry Jr., Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston, Mass. 02115.

OLD COLONY REMEMBRANCER
PLYMOUTH, MASS.

NOV 22 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony quintet will play at the First Church next Sunday

The Violone Quintet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the dedication service for the New Parish House at the Unitarian Church on Sunday, Nov. 26. The public is invited to attend. The quintet will play from 2:45 in the church. The service will begin at 3 p.m. Paul Whipple and William Brewster will be the speakers.

A collation and reception under the supervision of Miss Sarah Bent will follow the service.

The following members of the Building and Furnishing Committee will conduct members and guests on tours through the newly furnished parish house: Paul W. Whipple Robert Davis, Ellis W. Brewster, Mrs. William S. Brewster, John W. Packard, Robert D. Sampson, Mrs. Harold M. Beal, Mrs. Harry M. Taylor, Mrs. James Rae, Mrs. Ellis Brewster, Kenneth Smart and F. Edward Nicolas.

Mrs. Elizabeth Walker has prepared and will exhibit a photographic history of the movement of the Finney House and the Old Chapel and their joining and remodeling to form the New Parish House

The program of the Violone Ensemble is as follows: Minuet and Finale from the Divertimento in B flat of Michael Hadyen, Adagio from the same composition, and Allegro Con Fuoco movement from a quintet by Antone Dvorak.

Players will be: Max Hobart, first violin; Alfred Schneider, second violin; Earl Hedberg, viola; Robert Ripley, cellist; Joseph Hearne double bass.

HERALD 11/14/67 100

At Jordan Hall

Chamber Program Varied in Mood

By LEE ALLEN

On paper, the program of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players at Jordan Hall last night was a well-balanced representation of works of the last three centuries; in fact, it was heavily weighted toward the 19th century.

Certainly the most exciting and the most eagerly received of the four works presented was the Brahms first piano quartet in G minor. It was the major work of the evening, the most extended in length and the most complex and varied in form. In its varieties of texture and mood, and in its vitality, it was the most interesting of those performed.

It was also the work the most and the least well played. Led by pianist Richard Goode, who tended to dominate the quartet, the players in the first movement seemed to be fighting to be heard. By the second movement, however, they had settled down and they played the remainder of the Quartet in balanced and blended control.

In fact, as the piece progressed, they worked with increasing involvement, portraying with expression the variations in mood and volume, and making way for the thematic line as it moved from instrument to instrument. The Quartet outdid themselves in the exciting and intricate Presto finale.

The other three works represented strikingly different uses of the chamber group and were interestingly arranged to show how 20th century works derive from both 18th and 19th century forms. The pleasant, but minor, second Trio in G major for flute, violin, and cello, by Haydn, was followed by Varese's "Octandre", a piece which also gives each instrument soloistic treatment.

Written in 1926, the Varese piece experiments with unusual rhythmic and textural patterns, working with seven wind instruments and double bass. But except for the haunting oboe opening lines and a few brass crescendoes, the work lacks life, or the emotional energy which makes music more than intellectually interesting as a period piece.

It was played well, as might be expected, by the Chamber Players, though neither excellently nor excitingly. The piece was probably more inspiring when it was composed than it is now that so much further experimentation with sound patterns has been done.

Martinu's "Nonet," also of the 20th century, followed, but it resembled the Brahms more than the Haydn or the Varese. It, too, exemplified ensemble playing, in its rich and moving chordal patterns. Clearly more committed to 19th than 20th century forms, Martinu tampers only slightly with rhythm and tone. This backward-looking piece was surprisingly the most interesting and enjoyable of those played in the first half of the program.

The Chamber Players played as professionally as might be expected. And if they did not show much enthusiasm in the first three works, they more than made up for it in the Brahms.

101

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

NOV 9 1967 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS James Stagliano, horn, Henry Portnoi, bass, and Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, are part of the group which will present the third Ensembles of the Boston Symphony program on Monday at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

Flute Concert Earns A Warm Reception

By McLAREN HARRIS

Recitals of solo flute music from the Baroque era are quite infrequent. Last night's cambridge Society for Early Music concert by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, and Louis Bagger, harpsichord, at Sanders Theater demonstrated just why this is so.

I don't mean to infer that tedium was a factor; the music is beautiful, but oh, so difficult! Two sonatas in E major and B minor by J.S. Bach, another in A minor for flute unaccompanied, Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach's Sonata in G major and the Septieme Concert of Francois Couperin made up a formidable two-hour program where virtuosic pressure never really let up. I'd not be surprised if Mrs. Dwyer, principal flutist for the Boston Symphony, were relieved to return to Symphony Hall and the tranquil strains of Strauss, Stravinsky and Schoenberg.

The two flute-harpsichord sonatas of Johann Sebastian are marvels of lyric grace and contrapuntal ingenuity. BWV 1035 contains a Siciliano of gentle delicacy, while the Andante and Largo of BWV 1030, the famous B minor, are almost haunting, and the Presto's fugue-plus-gigue brings forth great spirit and expertise. But Bach, in his artistic fervor, seemed to forget that flutists are human and require air, for he wrote long phrases without rests in the solo part. And in the Sonata for flute alone, BWV 1013, where he labored hard and successfully to create a complete contrapuntal-harmonic structure with a single instrument, he included no rests at all. The soloist is left to solve simultaneous tasks of meaningful phrasing and survival.

Mrs. Dwyer managed to accomplish her duties in a very respectable fashion— particularly in the unaccompanied sonata, where she traversed many series of leaps in register without introducing jaggedness or spoiling linear continuity. It earned her a warm reception. Her partnership with Mr. Bagger, which Bach assures most completely in the B minor work, struck a flexible balance; the harpsichordist's work was clean and resolute in tempo.

There were moments of uneasiness for Mrs. Dwyer which resulted in occasional and momentary losses of bearing, most noticeably in the Couperin work. These situations must require extreme concentration to avoid, especially with the Couperin; while lacking much harmonic variety (as most dance suites do) or thematic invention, the Septieme Concert puts together chains of small-interval leaps up and down the scale and contains ornamental textures which make it diabolically difficult.

Perhaps we might expect Mrs Dwyer to muster this brand of concentration and come up with a perfect performance, but at the same time we cannot banish feelings of sympathy or genuine admiration for the things which were done superbly.

The Program

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flue, and Louis Bagger, harpsichord, were presented last night at Sanders Theater by the Cambridge Society for Early Music.

Sonata in E major, BWV 1035; Sonata in A minor for flute alone, BWV 1013; Sonata in B minor, BWV 1030 — J. S. Bach

Sonata in G major, W 127 — C. P. E. Bach

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

NOV 14 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players Return To Jordan Hall

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Diverting and imaginative programming marked the return to Jordan Hall last night of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players after their triumphal seven-week tour of England, Germany and Russia. Participants were Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, voila; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone, with Richard Goode, a Serkin pupil joining in as guest pianist.

Concluding offering, the Brahms quartet for piano, violin, viola and cello (Op. 25, in G minor) was the concert's high point. It is one of his richer chamber works, combining extraordinary fertility of melodic invention with plasticity of form.

The second and fourth movements introduce elements which became characteristic of the later, mature Brahms. The gentle second movements, in 9/8 time, marked Allegro, ma non troppo, resembles a nocturne, but Brahms eschewed calling it a scherzo, using, instead, the title "intermezzo," whose mood is veiled and mysterious.

His concluding Rondo alla Zingarese shows, for the first time, his preoccupation with the Magyar folk idiom, being one of his more genuinely Hungarian pieces. The Bostonians responded to this moody music with spirit and strength, delving deeply for breadth and warmth, yet their approach was deft and lyrical.

Curtain-raiser was Haydn's Trio No. 2 for flute, violin and cello (Op. 100, in G), an amiable trifle embodying Haydn's superb skill. Gifted musicianship, marked by refined and subtle taste, graced this performance.

There followed the intriguing Octandre of Edgard Varese (1883-1965), essaying curious effects in instrumental polyphony. This exceptional musical title, derived from a flower with eight stamens, is a singular chamber-orchestra score. Although Octandre employes eight players, it demands a conductor (Concertmaster Silverstein.

Last night's exposition was quite as effective and authoritative as a performance under the composer's own supervision heard in New York's Museum of Modern Art in the late forties.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

NOV 10 1967

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is spreading out again.

Seven different chamber music ensembles, made up of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are available for concerts at a "reasonable" price throughout the northeast.

Beginning with a Sinfonietta and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players the group also includes two trios, two quartets and a quintet.

Sample programs and available dates may be obtained by writing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symprony Hall, Boston, 02115.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

DEC 11 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO Quartet At Fontbonne

A string quartet from the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a concert today for students at Fontbonne Academy in Milton.

The program will be highlighted by several selections from the classical field of music.

Quartet members are George Zazofsky and Stanley Benson on the violin, Bernard Kadnoff, viola, and Robert Ripley, cello.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

DEC 5 1967 New England Newsclip

String Trio at Jordan Hall Proves Dramatic, Polished

By McLAREN HARRIS

A note in last night's Jordan Hall program stated that this occasion was pianist Richard Goode's first appearance with the Boston Symphony String Trio. As a matter of fact, it was the Trio's first appearance, too, unless one counts the days a few years ago when it was known as the Nova Arte Trio.

At any rate, the Trio — Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello — and Goode revealed themselves as sublime, dramatic, polished and delicate, though these qualities did not always coincide. The 24-year-old pianist, in particular, seemed to be the emotional leader; he has a fine feeling for sweeping phrases, for dark tone-colors and striking dynamic contrasts.

That's excellent for Brahms but not the best formula for Mozart, and in thelat ter's E flat Piano Quartet, K. 493, there was some sacrifice in note clarity and linear detail. Then, too, his tendency toward heaviness encouraged strain on the part of his colleagues. For all that certain sections worked out well, notably the Larghetto's sustained romantic hush. Elsewhere classic lightness was present chiefly in the strings, though Goode relaxes some what in the exchanges of the final Allegretto.

Two duet "Madrigals" from a set of three by Bohuslav Martinu were performed by Silverstein and Fine. They are rather marvelous pieces for variety and invention, creating tonal depth via frequent double-stops and wide-interval harmonies, full of rapid-fire imitation in the fast movements. The players gave them strength and dash, Fine's mellow viola timbres providing ample balance and support for Silverstein's lightertone.

Goode's opportunity came with Brahms' Trio in B major, Op. 8, for piano, violin and cello (which received its world premiere in 1855 in New York, of all places). And he made the best of it, bringing a soft-spoken eloquence to middle and low-register passages, bursting forth in full voice when Brahms wished it. Silverstein and Eskin were not caught off guard; their approach called for a measure of abandon, especially in the Scherzo, one of Brahms' few. Motion and thrust, not delicacy, became uppermost, and justifiably so. Though polish took second seat here and there, the reading retained compulsion to the end.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

DEC 5 1967 New England Newsclip

BSO String Trio With Pianist Play Mozart, Martinu and Brahms Music

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Another impressive evening of chamber music was presented in Jordan Hall last night by the Boston Symphony String Trio under sponsorship of the BSO and New England Conservatory. Participating players were Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello, with Richard Goode guest artist at the piano.

They led off with Mozart's second piano quartet (KV-493, in E flat). Though the earlier piano quartet (KV-475, in G minor) stands pre-eminent in this format, the later one is quite as cunningly laid out and full of enticing opportunities for each instrument. This work has a fine slow movement and an utterly bewitching finale, an imitative passage, presumably derived from an earlier rondo episode.

It is the pianist who is the balance-wheel here and the guest artist displayed tonal coloration blending superbly with the sensitive and lyrical Bostonians.

There followed an invigorating and incisive performance of two of Bohuslav Martinu's three madrigals for violin and viola. Messrs. Silverstein and Fine manifested well-coordinated balances, strong rhythmic feeling and a penchant for contemporary style. There are grand sonorities, with densities occurring at climactic points, effectively registered.

Brahms' earliest example of his chamber music, a piano trio (Op. 8, in B), concluded the concert. It is impressive in its brash youthfulness, tender concepts, soft and sensual tonalities and richly mingled moods. It was completed in January, 1854, before the composer had attained his majority.

When he was 57, Brahms (in 1890) re-examined an revised his eighth opus, but, as he wrote, he "did not provide it with a wig, but just combed and arranged its hair a little." The first movement opens with a broad, swinging introductory theme. In the scherzo he evolved something new of his own his starting point being the impulsive presto scherzo associated with Beethoven.

In the revisions, only the scherzo received mercy from the mature Brahms. Elsewhere, whole segments were rewritten.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

John Kim Conducts On Feb. 9

The exchange of batons between Kalman Novak of the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston and John S. Kim, conductor of the Seoul, Korea, Philharmonic Orchestra, will begin here in Boston on Feb. 9, when Mr. Kim will guest conduct the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

Mr. Kim has received recognition as a conductor and as a patron to the musical world. In addition to being a member of the Korean Arts and Science Council, he has founded the Yegrin Symphony Orchestra and is presently director of the international touring Arirang Korean Troupe.

Mr. Kim studied conducting at the Tanglewood Music Festival under Leonard Bernstein. It was at Tanglewood that he and Mr. Novak first met.

Two fellow countrymen will join Mr. Kim for the Feb. 9 concert: Tenor Ivan Oak, who has been soloist with the Boston Pops and the Roger Wagner Chorale, and violinist Won-Mo Kim, known for his appearances at Aspen and Tanglewood. Mr. Kim will play the Sibelius Violin Concerto, and Mr. Oak will sing a Mozart concert aria.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

2 Ensemble Concerts

During the month of February two Jordan Hall concerts in the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series have been scheduled.

The first of next month's concerts will be given on Feb. 5 by the Boston Symphony Chamber players with Richard Goode, pianist. This will be the Chamber Players' second concert of the series. Their program consists of Balakirev's Octet; Concerto, Op. 24 by Webern; the Duo Concertante for flute and percussion by Ingolf Dahl; the Mozart's Divertimento in E flat; K. 563.

On Feb. 19 the Stockbridge String Quartet will be heard for the first time in a public concert in Boston. The members of the Stockbridge Quartet, all players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are: Julius Schulman and William Marshall, violins; Jerome Lipson, viola; and Mischa Nieland, cello.

Their program begins with Haydn's Quartet, Op. 64, No. 5 "The Lark," and includes Prokofiev's Quartet, Op. 50, and the Quartet in D minor, "Death and the Maiden," by Schubert.

Tickets for these concerts are available at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

The remaining three programs in the Ensembles series are, in March, Boston Trio and Boston Symphony Chamber players and, in April, the Boston Sinfonietta.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony's Music Series Schedules Jordan Hall Concerts

BOSTON — During the month of February two Jordan Hall concerts in the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series have been scheduled.

In First Year

Presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music, the series now in its first year, includes performances by seven different chamber music groups drawn from players within the orchestra.

The first of next month's concerts will be given on Feb. 5 by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Richard Goode, pianist.

This will be the Chamber Players' second concert of the series. Their program consists of Balakirev's Octet; Concerto Op 24 by Webern; th eDuo Concertante for flute and percussion by Ingolf Dahl; the Mozart's Divertimento in E Flat, K. 563.

Stockbridge Quartet

On Feb. 19 the Stockbridge String Quartet will be heard for the first time in a public concert in Boston.

The members of the Stockbridge Quartet, all players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are: Julius Schulman and William Marshall, violins; Jerome Lipson, viola; and Mischa Nieland, cello.

Their program begins with Haydn's Quartet, Op. 64, No. 5, "The Lark" and includes Prokofiev's Quartet, Op. 50, and the Quartet in D minor, "Death and the Maiden" by Schubert.

Tickets for these concerts are available at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

The remaining three programs in the Ensembles series are, in March, Boston Trio and Boston Symphony Chamber Players and, in April, the Boston Sinfonietta.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Cheers for Huggler and Aeolian Players

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

For the second time since coming here, originally as composer in residence to the Boston Symphony, John Huggler puts us in his debt by arranging a fine series of contemporary music concerts. He did it three years ago for the Gardner Museum; this time the concerts are sponsored by the University of Massachusetts at Boston.

The high point of the concert played Thursday evening by the Aeolian Chamber Players was the performance of Stefan Wolpe's Trio in Two Parts for flute, cello, and piano. Wolpe is now in his 60's, and, though he is neither performed nor published very much, he has been an enormous and vitalizing influence on a whole generation of American composers, and his Trio, written 1963-64, is something of an underground classic.

Its behavior suggests a game. A player proposes something, the other two react rapidly and intensely. At once, the three lines have become an involved knot, which, as quickly as it came into being, is unraveled again into a single strand or, more often, just chopped into silence. The Trio's second part is more tranquil, concerned more with bridges of sound than with silences, with continuities more than with abruptions.

Wolpe's gestures are exuberant, almost violent, but everything sounds transparent, and the larger ordering of the knots and flurries is of classic clarity. Wolpe writes some of the most dramatic and exciting music of our time, and it sounds splendidly undoctrinaire, and the Trio, which was effectively played by flutist David Gilbert, cellist Michael Rudiakov, and pianist Jacob Maxin, is one of the outstanding pieces of the post-war years.

George Crumb's "Eleven Echoes of Autumn 1965" is characteristic in its delicate, poetic sensibility, and in its original efficient way of writing for the instruments and, for that matter, the instrumentalists' vocies. Gunther Schuller's Fantasy for Cello Alone exploits instrumental virtuosity of a more conventional sort, and it provided an occasion for excellent playing by Rudiakov. The program began and ended with two 20th century classic (non-underground), Ives's Violin Sonata No. 2 and Bartok's "Contrasts."

Feb. 29 (Rossini's birthday) is the date for the next concert in the series. The Composers Quartet will play works Horvath, Huggler, Layton and Shapey.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

JAN 25 1968 New England Newsclip

VIRTUOSI DI ROMA will return to Symphony Hall, Boston, April 17 as the first event in the WCRB 20th Anniversary Concert Series.

Concerts Bentfit Scholarship Fund

BOSTON — Radio station WCRB has announced a 20th anniversary series of three concerts in Symphony Hall this year to benefit the WCRB scholarship fund. General Manager Richard L. Kaye says that in addition to the 10th Annual WCRB Night at Pops June 15 with the Boston Pops the Virtuosi di Roma, Renato Fasano conductor, April 17 and the Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, Anshel Brusilov conductor, October 11. These will be the only Greater Boston appearances in 1968 for the Virtuosi and the Philadelphia Chamber Symphony.

WCRB is now accepting series ticket orders only. Sale of tickets for individual concerts will be announced at a later date.

Proceeds of the concerts will go to the WCRB Scholarship Fund which each year since 1965 has provided financial assistance for young musicians at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. Horn soloist William Lane, who received scholarship aid in 1966, was soloist at the 1967 WCRB Night at Pops. Mr. Lane is now first horn in the Buffalo Philharmonic. 'Cellist Jerome Patterson, who received scholarship aid in 1967, is now a member of the Boston Symphony.

In conjunction with the concert events, Mr. Kaye has also announced WCRB will stage three special dinners including one for members of the Greater Boston musical community on Oct. 11. He explained that WCRB as New England's only fulltime AM-FM concert music station has been expanding its role in the music community. The 20th anniversary concert series and the dinner events represent another step in this direction.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

John Kim Conducts On Feb. 9

The exchange of batons between Kalman Novak of the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston and John S. Kim, conductor of the Seoul, Korea, Philharmonic Orchestra, will begin here in Boston on Feb. 9, when Mr. Kim will guest conduct the Civic Symphony Orchestra of Boston at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall.

Mr. Kim has received recognition as a conductor and as a patron to the musical world. In addition to being a member of the Korean Arts and Science Council, he has founded the Yegrin Symphony Orchestra and is presently director of the international touring Arirang Korean Troupe.

Mr. Kim studied conducting at the Tanglewood Music Festival under Leonard Bernstein. It was at Tanglewood that he and Mr. Novak first met.

Two fellow countrymen will join Mr. Kim for the Feb. 9 concert: Tenor Ivan Oak, who has been soloist with the Boston Pops and the Roger Wagner Chorale, and violinist Won-Mo Kim, known for his appearances at Aspen and Tanglewood. Mr. Kim will play the Sibelius Violin Concerto, and Mr. Oak will sing a Mozart concert aria.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

2 Ensemble Concerts

During the month of February two Jordan Hall concerts in the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series have been scheduled.

The first of next month's concerts will be given on Feb. 5 by the Boston Symphony Chamber players with Richard Goode, pianist. This will be the Chamber Players' second concert of the series. Their program consists of Balakirev's Octet; Concerto, Op. 24 by Webern; the Duo Concertante for flute and percussion by Ingolf Dahl; the Mozart's Divertimento in E flat; K. 563.

On Feb. 19 the Stockbridge String Quartet will be heard for the first time in a public concert in Boston. The members of the Stockbridge Quartet, all players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are: Julius Schulman and William Marshall, violins; Jerome Lipson, viola; and Mischa Nieland, cello.

Their program begins with Haydn's Quartet, Op. 64, No. 5 "The Lark," and includes Prokofiev's Quartet, Op. 50, and the Quartet in D minor, "Death and the Maiden," by Schubert.

Tickets for these concerts are available at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

The remaining three programs in the Ensembles series are, in March, Boston Trio and Boston Symphony Chamber players and, in April, the Boston Sinfonietta.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 175,950

JAN 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony's Music Series Schedules Jordan Hall Concerts

BOSTON — During the month of February two Jordan Hall concerts in the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series have been scheduled.

In First Year

Presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music, the series now in its first year, includes performances by seven different chamber music groups drawn from players within the orchestra.

The first of next month's concerts will be given on Feb. 5 by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Richard Goode, pianist.

This will be the Chamber Players' second concert of the series. Their program consists of Balakirev's Octet; Concerto Op 24 by Webern; th eDuo Concertante for flute and percussion by Ingolf Dahl; the Mozart's Divertimento in E Flat, K. 563.

Stockbridge Quartet

On Feb. 19 the Stockbridge String Quartet will be heard for the first time in a public concert in Boston.

The members of the Stockbridge Quartet, all players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are: Julius Schulman and William Marshall, violins; Jerome Lipson, viola; and Mischa Nieland, cello.

Their program begins with Haydn's Quartet, Op. 64, No. 5, "The Lark" and includes Prokofiev's Quartet, Op. 50, and the Quartet in D minor, "Death and the Maiden" by Schubert.

Tickets for these concerts are available at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

The remaining three programs in the Ensembles series are, in March, Boston Trio and Boston Symphony Chamber Players and, in April, the Boston Sinfonietta.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Cheers for Huggler and Aeolian Players

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

For the second time since coming here, originally as composer in residence to the Boston Symphony, John Huggler puts us in his debt by arranging a fine series of contemporary music concerts. He did it three years ago for the Gardner Museum; this time the concerts are sponsored by the University of Massachusetts at Boston.

The high point of the concert played Thursday evening by the Aeolian Chamber Players was the performance of Stefan Wolpe's Trio in Two Parts for flute, cello, and piano. Wolpe is now in his 60's, and, though he is neither performed nor published very much, he has been an enormous and vitalizing influence on a whole generation of American composers, and his Trio, written 1963-64, is something of an underground classic.

Its behavior suggests a game. A player proposes something, the other two react rapidly and intensely. At once, the three lines have become an involved knot, which, as quickly as it came into being, is unraveled again into a single strand or, more often, just chopped into silence. The Trio's second part is more tranquil, concerned more with bridges of sound than with silences, with continuities more than with abruptions.

Wolpe's gestures are exuberant, almost violent, but everything sounds transparent, and the larger ordering of the knots and flurries is of classic clarity. Wolpe writes some of the most dramatic and exciting music of our time, and it sounds splendidly undoctrinaire, and the Trio, which was effectively played by flutist David Gilbert, cellist Michael Rudiakov, and pianist Jacob Maxin, is one of the outstanding pieces of the post-war years.

George Crumb's "Eleven Echoes of Autumn 1965" is characteristic in its delicate, poetic sensibility, and in its original efficient way of writing for the instruments and, for that matter, the instrumentalists' voices. Gunther Schuller's Fantasy for Cello Alone exploits instrumental virtuosity of a more conventional sort, and it provided an occasion for excellent playing by Rudiakov. The program began and ended with two 20th century classic (non-underground), Ives's Violin Sonata No. 2 and Bartok's "Contrasts."

Feb. 29 (Rossini's birthday) is the date for the next concert in the series. The Composers Quartet will play works Horvath, Huggler, Layton and Shapey.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

JAN 25 1968 New England Newsclip

VIRTUOSI DI ROMA will return to Symphony Hall, Boston, April 17 as the first event in the WCRB 20th Anniversary Concert Series.

Concerts Bentfit Scholarship Fund

BOSTON — Radio station WCRB has announced a 20th anniversary series of three concerts in Symphony Hall this year to benefit the WCRB scholarship fund. General Manager Richard L. Kaye says that in addition to the 10th Annual WCRB Night at Pops June 15 with the Boston Pops the Virtuosi di Roma, Renato Fasano conductor, April 17 and the Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, Anshel Brusilov conductor, October 11. These will be the only Greater Boston appearances in 1968 for the Virtuosi and the Philadelphia Chamber Symphony.

WCRB is now accepting series ticket orders only. Sale of tickets for individual concerts will be announced at a later date.

Proceeds of the concerts will go to the WCRB Scholarship Fund which each year since 1965 has provided financial assistance for young musicians at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. Horn soloist William Lane, who received scholarship aid in 1966, was soloist at the 1967 WCRB Night at Pops. Mr. Lane is now first horn in the Buffalo Philharmonic. 'Cellist Jerome Patterson, who received scholarship aid in 1967, is now a member of the Boston Symphony.

In conjunction with the concert events, Mr. Kaye has also announced WCRB will stage three special dinners including one for members of the Greater Boston musical community on Oct. 11. He explained that WCRB as New England's only fulltime AM-FM concert music station has been expanding its role in the music community. The 20th anniversary concert series and the dinner events represent another step in this direction.

103

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

FEB 11 1968 New England Newsclip

STOCKBRIDGE QUARTET PLANS FEB. 19 CONCERT

The Stockbridge String Quartet will be heard in its first public concert in Boston on Monday evening, Feb. 19. The Quartet's concert will be the seventh program of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series presented for the first time this year by the orchestra in co-operation with the New England Conservatory. All concerts of this series are given in Jordan Hall.

The program chosen by the Stockbridge String Quartet includes Haydn's Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5, "The Lark." Also to be heard are Prokofiev's Quartet No. 1, Op. 50 and the Quartet in D minor, "Death and the Maiden," by Schubert.

The members of this ensemble, all players in the Boston Symphony, are: Julius Schulman and William Marshall, violins; Jerome Lipson, viola; and Mischa Nieland, cello.

Tickets for the Stockbridge String Quartet's program are available at the Jordan Hall Box Office. The next Jordan Hall concert of the Ensembles series will be given by the Boston Trio on March 4.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

FEB 11 1968 New England Newsclip

String Quartet Of Stockbridge In Boston Debut

BOSTON — The Stockbridge String Quartet will be concert in Boston Monday night. The quartet's concert will be the seventh program of the ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series presented for the first time this year by the orchestra in cooperation with the New England Conservatory. All concerts of this series are given in Jordan Hall.

The program chosen by the includes Haydn's Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5, "The Lark." Also to be heard are Prokofiev's Quartet No. 1, Op. 50 and the Quartet in D minor, "Death and Maiden" by Schubert.

The members of this ensemble, all players in the Boston Symphony, are: Julius Schulman and William Marshall, violins; Jerome Lipson, viola; and Mischa Nieland, cello.

The next Jordan Hall concert of the Ensembles series will be given by the Boston Trio on March 4.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 16 1968 New England Newsclip

THE STOCKBRIDGE STRING QUARTET, composed of Boston Symphony members Jerome Lipson, viola; Julius Schulman and William Marshall, violins; and Mischa Nieland, cello, will present the seventh Ensembles of the Boston Symphony concert Monday night at 8:30 in Jordan Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 6 1968 New England Newsclip

From Balakirev to Mozart

Chamber Group Shows It's Scope

By McLAREN HARRIS

Works by Balakirev, Ingolf Dahl, Webern and Mozart on last night's Boston Symphony Symphony Chamber Players program at Jordan Hall made for sufficient idiomatic variety. Of course, variety and interest are not necessarily the same, and as things turned out there was more of the former than of the latter.

The final, large work—Mozart's E flat Divertimento, K. 563, for string trio—won out for pure musical value. For lyric beauty, rhythmic vitality or architectural finesse it is the equal of almost any of Mozart's examples in the "serious" chamber genres, containing a sublime opening Allegro and Adagio, a kaleidoscopic variation movement framed by a pair of minuets and thoroughly lightheartened concluding Allegro.

Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine and Jules Eskin gave willingly of their technical energies, which served up a decent thrust and adequate width to the dynamic horizon. For all that it was not greatly poetic, with variable phrasing and inner spaces filled with tonal warmth only at intermittent periods; but it would be difficult not to enjoy the work.

Webern's Concerto, Op. 24, for nine instruments — strings, winds and piano — preceded the Mozart. Its three short movements stress absolute economy, which is no surprise in Webern. The composer divides the basic twelve-note row into quarters of three notes each, sprinkling the ensemble. He yet manages to evolve definite form, continuity and even a sort of lyricism from it, though I would have hated to see him make it any more elemental.

Pianist Richard Goode and the players performed the concerto twice — more successfully the first time—folowing a manner which Schoenberg probably devised to insure getting his points across.

What else was there? Balakirev's one-movement Octet, Op. 3, for piano, four strings and three winds, which is as much a concert overture for small orchestra as it is a chamber work, with the piano filling in for the missing instruments; and Ingolf Dahl's Duo cooncertante for flute and percussion, in which Doriot Anthony Dwyer was forced to be a foil for Everett Firth's virtuosic spectacle on instruments from tenor drum up to triangle. Not their fault, but Dah's; if one closes his eyes the piece becomes crashing bore.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, assisted by Richard Goode, pianist, were presented last night at Jordan Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New England Conservatory.

Octet, Op. 3 — Balakirew
Duo concertante for flute and percussion — Dahl
Concerto for nine instruments, Op. 24 — Webern
Divertimento in E flat, K. 563 — Mozart

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 139,700

FEB 6 1968 New England Newsclip

Webern concerto chamber feature

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players played an enliveningly varied program in Jordan Hall Monday evening, one that began with curiosities and diversion and that ended with marvels.

The start was an Octet for strings with flute, oboe, horn and piano, written in 1855 by the 18-year-old Mili Balakirev, the wheeling-dealing curmudgeon of Russian music. It had folksy themes and the sound of a grand orchestral piece that had been adapted for the Palm Court ensemble of a posh hotel. The performance had a murky sound.

The Duo Concertante for flute and percussion by the contemporary American composer Ingolf Dahl is adroit, though not especially imaginative, in its writing for the instruments; amusing in the way an ensemble is somehow forged from the uncompromising flutiness of the flute and the resolute insistence of the percussionist on his world of tch-tch and poc-poc; agreeably punctual, professional, and neat. It had a nice-sounding performance from Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Everett Firth.

Then came something wonderful: Webern's Concerto for 9 Instruments, Op.24, which was repeated after intermission. This is Webern on the road to Brandenburg, not writing pseudo. Baroque sewing-machine stuff that goes digga-digga-digga, but projecting, like Bach in his richest movement, an astonishingly varied and subtle rhythmic image by way of an equally fantastic interplay of textures and dynamics. Perhaps it is Bachlike, too, in that it contains in its quick finale Webern's dancingest music; the slow movement, with its tranquil but by no means simple rhythmic surface, has a tenderness of expression that gives it quite a special place in Webern's work.

It is difficult music, of which I have not yet heard a really good performance. The merit of this one was that care was taken about temp shifts and the outlining of individual phrases, but degrees of musical awareness, attention and technical skill were widely varied.

The final work was Mozart's violin, viola, and cello zart's violin, viola, and cello Divertimento in E flat, K.563, one of those pieces in which he quite loses sight of his presumed first intention of delivering a mere entertainment. It is an astounding succession of delights, some serious, like the shifts of harmony that begin the first movement's development, some innocent, like the wonderfully fresh viola tune in the Landler-Trio of the second Minuet, and which Burton Fine played better, with more health and humor, than I have ever heard it. In general, the playing of violinist Joseph Silverstein with Fine and cellist Jules Eskin was of delicate sonority with convincing tempi, but there were vaguenesses about rhythm and breathing that were the telltales of a performance not thoroughly prepared.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

FEB 6 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players in [illegible] Hall Concert

By ROLFE BOSWELL

Had it not been for Mozart, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Players in Jordan Hall, sponsored by the New England Conservatory, would have been a complete dud. Their reading of Mili Balakirev's octet in one movement (Op. 3), was sufficiently facile, but the [illegible]ic is definitely dull, in [illegible] best Russky-folksy manner.

Ingolf Dahl's duo concertante for flute and percussion was expertly played by Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Everett Firth, but it left a void of emptiness.

Webern's concerto for nine instruments (Op 24) ensued. It is the type of music over which the avant-garde goes into ecstasies. It is the type of music over which this critic retches.

It is repeated after the intervall, presumably for the benefit of those who could not get the point-pointillism.

Mozart's divertimento for string trio (KV-563, in E flat) concluded the concert with Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola, and Jules Eskin, cello, playing Mozart as if they had known him personally.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

MAR 6 1968 New England Newsclip

The ARTS

Boston Trio adept chamber ensemble

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Critic

The Boston Trio plays with better finish and more agreement about style than some of the other ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it became apparent in Jordan Hall Monday night.

It's just that there isn't really any music written in the foursquare style they have worked out.

Violinist Roger Shermont and cellist John Sant Ambrogio play with a firm marcato inflection which makes the shape of everything they play abundantly clear; pianist Phyllis Moss, who teaches at Wellesley, plays with a lighter touch and takes some astoundingly complex passages in her stride: all creditably professional. But the grace of adaptation which quickens a chamber musician's style when it comes into contact with distinctive music was missing.

The trio's interpretive reflexes seemed to work best in music which might be called, in a general way, neo-classic. Beethoven's early Trio in B-flat, Op. 1, in the alternative version with violin, skipped along cleanly enough. But whenever Beethoven really started writing — the sonorous piano filigree in the Adagio or the laconic string motives in Variation 7 of the finale — the response was exactly the same as in the more prosaic passages, and nothing happened.

Ravel's Trio in A Minor benefitted from the evenness and clarity of the trio's performance. But you could not say there was anything darting or sinuous about the playing. The light and shade which are the substance of Ravel's otherwise rather inconsequnetial music were missing.

For Dvorak's "Dumky" Trio, they knew they had to do something different, but the febrile drama they tried to infuse into Dvorak's marvelously unpretentious late work wasn't the right answer. It did serve to lessen the string players' tone quality (they seemed to be uncomfortable, doing neither their thing nor Dvorak's) but it left them with no place to go when the writing got really "orchestral" at the end.

In a couple of broadly sketched antiphonal passages in the Beethoven and Dvorak works, Miss Moss started to make a larger pianistic statement. But her Milquetoast execution of a long series of high trills in Beethoven's ninth variation — a distant ancestor of the climax of Op. 11 — was irritating.

The chance to play chamber concerts is valued by the players of the B.S.O., their spokesmen often reiterate. But is a full-dress Jordan Hall series, complete with subscription tickets, the best solution to their need? My companion counted 10 persons asleep in their seats by the end of Dvorak.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

MAR 5 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

One Was More Equal

By Dorothy Newell

Bravos for The Boston Trio (piano, violin, cello), and well deserved. Phyllis Moss, Roger Shermont and John Sant Ambrogio earned a standing ovation for their performance of works by Beethoven, Ravel and Dvorak at Jordan Hall last night.

The three have polished their performance to perfection over the six years of their association. The talent of each one compliments the skill of the others.

The piano dominated the first movement of Beethoven's Trio in B flat, opus 11, with cello taking the background for piano and violin solos. The Adagio, with piano only echoing string solos, was followed by the Allegretto in 10 variations.

Rounds and Runs

There were piano runs; cello-violin rounds, both a capella and accompanied by staccato percussion; Allegretto in a minor key; piano runs with a string background; the dotted half-note treatment; a march with a round, and an off-beat (that is delayed beat) ending.

The performance was a triumph of precision.

Ravel's Trio in A Minor, as deftly performed, is a vehicle for ultra-high violin and the whisper of sound in trios, solos and duets. The bass piano and deep sustained cello sound of the Passacaille are a contrast to the double octave finger exercises and sustained trills and triples of the Finale.

The performance of Dvorak's "Dumka," Trio in E Minor, opus 90, also required of the violin the ultra high range and softest trios with intricate swirls.

A few annoyances can hardly be called faults in the pianist's performance. She still has the child's trick of hunching her shoulders for emphasis. And in some of the early movements the piano dominated the fine tone of string harmony.

Like Orwell's "Animal Farm," everyone was equal — but one was more equal than the others.

Soloing At Twelve

Miss Moss, who teaches piano at Wellesley College, made her solo debut at only 12 with the Philadelphia Sinfonietta and played with the Federal Symphony in New York City at 15. She has since performed with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Pops and Boston Civic Symphony, and the Bamberger Symphony.

Both Shermont and Sant Ambrogio are BSO regulars. The violinist, a native of Paris, also soloed early and has a record of performances with the National Orchestra and Little Orchestra Society of New York, Boston Esplanade Concerts, BSO and Boston Pops.

He and Sant Ambrogio recently played Brahms' Double Concerto with North Shore Philharmonic and Harrisburg (Pa.) Symphony.

The cellist has been with Boston Symphony since 1959 after playing with the Harrisburg Symphony and Seventh Army Symphony. He too has taken solo parts with Boston Pops and New Jersey Fine Arts Orchestra. He teaches at Boston University and is co-director of Red Fox Music Camp in New Marlboro. Two of his students have joined the BSO.

The program was one of a series cosponsored by Boston Symphony Orchestra and New England Conservatory of Music. For the final offerings, the BSO Chamber Players will perform works by Haydn Poulenc, Koper and Dvorak on March 18, and Boston Sinfonietta will be featured April 22.

They will have to be in top form to equal the efforts of The Boston Trio.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 840-746 SUN. 1,178,515

MAR 3 1968

104

Concerts and Recitals

THE JUILLIARD Quartet returns to the Orchestra hall foyer Wednesday at 8:30 to present the final program of the Pro Musica's current season. The quartet will be joined by Cellist Raya Garbousova in the following works: Schubert's Quintet in C Major, opus 163; Mozart's Quartet K. 387 in G Major; Gershwin's Lullaby, and Mayuzumi's Prelude.

• • •

The Fine Arts Quartet will be joined by Frederick Clem, principal violist of the Milwaukee Symphony, in concerts tomorrow in the Goodman theater and Tuesday in Howard auditorium, Wilmette. Both concerts are at 8:15. The program includes Haydn's "Emperor" Quartet, opus 76, no. 3; Shastakovich's First Quartet, and Brahms' Viola Quintet. The Shastakovich is being performed for the first time at these concerts.

• • •

Early music will be getting its due at the University of Chicago this week. Today at 8:30, the Collegium Musicum, directed by Howard M. Brown, will present a free concert of Renaissance music in Bond chapel. Friday at 8:30, the Early Music Quartet will program Middle Ages and Renaissance music from romance countries.

Raya Garbousova Eddy Arnold

• • •

The Stockholm Philharmonic orchestra, conducted by Antal Dorati who conducted the Chicago Symphony the first week in January, will present a concert in Orchestra hall next Sunday at 3:30. The concert is part of the orchestra's first America tour and includes 25 concerts in 24 cities over a period of 5 weeks. The program includes Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Batok's Two Images, opus 10; Sibelius' Second Symphony, in D minor, and Karl-Birger Blomdahl's "Sisyphos" Choreographic Suite. The 100 member group was founded in 1914.

Antal Dorati

• • •

Speaking of conductors, both George Szell and Erich Leinsdorf are scheduled to conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as part of their all-Beethoven programs here. Szell's program with the Chicago Symphony, March 21 and 22, also includes the Overture to "Prometheus," and the Sixth Symphony. Leinsdorf's, when he brings the Boston Symphony orchestra to Orchestra hall March 28 at 8:15, also lists the "Fidelio" Overture and the Violin Concerto [Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, is soloist].

• • •

Milton Preves, principal violist of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will conduct the North Side Symphony orchestra in a concert next Sunday at 3:30 in the Siena High school Auditorium 5600 Washington blvd. The program includes Bizet's "Carmen" Suite, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, Beethoven's Romance for Violin and Orchestra, Bach's Two Violin Concerto, and "Rhapsody for Orchestra — 1967," by the Rev. Mr. Edward McKenna. The Rev. McKenna and Sister Gerda Moehler will be the afternoon's violin soloists.

• • •

The New Christy Minstrels will perform in the Lyons Township High school auditorium next Friday at 8:30.

• • •

Diana Ross and the Supremes will give concerts at 7 and 10 next Saturday in the Opera house.

• • •

Pianist Jeffrey Siegel will perform Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto with the Elgin Civic Symphony today at 3:30 in the Larkin High school auditorium, Larkin avenue and McLean boulevard, Elgin. Douglas Steensland also will conduct Dvorak's Sixth Symphony, in D Major.

• • •

The Eddy Arnold show in the Auditorium theater Friday and Saturday at 8:30, includes Eddy Arnold, Fannie Flagg [of Candid Camera and Ladybird Johnson impression fame] and Monique Van Vooren.

• • •

Samuel Thavieu, Gui Mombaerts, Jerome Stowell, Robert Slaughter, Eduardo Fiorelli and Dudley Powers —all members of Northwestern university's faculty Chamber Music society—will present works of Mozart, Dvorak and Absil Wednesday at 8:15 in a free concert in Alice Millar chapel, Evanston campus.

• • •

The Chicago Guitar society present a recital by Paul Reilly this afternoon at 3:30 in room 812 of the Fine Arts building, 410 S. Michigan.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
JEWISH TIMES
W. 27,500

MAR 14 1968

Zimbler Sinfonietta to Present 4th International Festival

The Zimbler Sinfonietta, under the direction of Richard Burgin, will present the fourth event of the 1967-68 International Festival of Chamber Orchestras on Sunday, 8 p.m., at the Academy of Music.

The Sinfonietta, an organization principally of string players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, includes in the program baroque classical and modern works. George Zazofsky, concertmaster of the Sinfonietta and assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in the Bach violin concerto.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

MAR 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Chamber Finale

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their third appearance of the season Monday in Jordan Hall as part of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra chamber series. Monday's program will be the next to last concert of this season's series, which is presented by the BSO in cooperation with the New England Conservatory of Music.

The program includes Poulenc's Sextet for Piano and Woodwind Quintet; Kammermusik for Oboe, Bassoon, Percussion and Piano, and Dvorak's Piano Quartet, Op. 87. Pianist Richard Goode will join the Chamber Players for this concert.

The final program of the Ensembles series will be offered by the Boston Sinfonietta on April 22. Tickets for both concerts are available at the Jordan Hall box office.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 250,000

MAR 13 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO Players At Jordan Hall

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will make their third appearance of the season in the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony chamber music series on Monday evening at 8:30 in Jordan Hall. The Chamber Players will perform PoulencS Sextet for Piano and Woodwinds; Schoenberg, Kammermusik for Oboe, Bassoon, Percussion and Piano; and Dvorak's Piano Quartet, Op. 87. Pianist Richard Goode will assist the Chamber Players for this concert.

105

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

MAR 20 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Echoes from BSO's Chamber

By Peter M. Knapp

The variety of its repertoire and the virtuosity of its players make the Boston Symphony Chamber Players one of the most fascinating of chamber groups. Not the least of its virtues lies in bringing fresh material to Boston audiences, or at least to the all too small group that attends chamber concerts in the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series.

Monday night's concert at Jordan Hall presented a typical excursion into the little-known, with two 20th century works, a small but somewhat daring piano trio by Haydn, and Antonin Dvorak's lusty piano quartet in E-flat, opus 83. The Chamber Players are first-desk musicians from the Boston Symphony, with the exception of pianist Richard Goode. And although all instrumental families are represented, no parts are doubled.

The highlight of the concert was easily the Dvorak piano quartet, a composition of luxurious sound bristling with melody and snappy rhythms — even to the suggestion of a coffee house waltz in the third movement. It was performed with total musical and emotional commitment by pianist Goode, violinist Joseph Silverstein, violist Burton Fine and cellist Jules Eskin. And while the other works of the evening were expertly done, none had the passion, the refinement, and the over-all excitement of the Dvorak.

It particularly seemed to suit Goode's temperament, as the Haydn Trio No. 4 in E did not. The Haydn, played with Silverstein and Eskin, suffered from a domineering, over-pedaled piano, though Haydn did intend it to be the protagonist. In the Dvorak, however, there was crisp teamwork in which Goode's pianism was as impassioned as it was technically impressive.

The other works went further afield than piano and strings. Francis Poulenc's fey Sextour for piano and wind quintet combined Goode, flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, oboist Ralph Gomberg, clarinetist Gino Cioffi, bassoonist Sherman Walt and hornist James Stagliano. It is not a profound work, and rather makes fun of itself with its music-hall tunes and abrupt lunges into different byways.

In its wry humor, oblique manner and eccentricities, the Poulenc composition is reminiscent of a Gallic Prokofiev — a trifle to be enjoyed and not to take too seriously. At any rate, it's not simple music, and the playing was awesomely adept, especially Stagliano's contributions.

The other "modern" work was Koeper's Kammermusik for oboe, bassoon, percussion and piano, with percussionist Everett Firth demonstrating his virtuosity on an array of hardware — timpani, snare drums, vibraphone, cymbals, xylophone et al — backed by Goode, Walt and Gomberg in music making much of repetitive motifs and leaving no great lasting impression.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Chamber Players In Well-Rounded Program

For the hardy number of listeners who turned up at Jordan Hall last night the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performed a well-rounded program of classic simplicity, 20th-century French gaiety, modern German rhythmic energy and romantic warmth.

Each of the four works seemed to display its own particular moments of interest. In the Haydn Trio No. 4 in E, performed by pianist Richard Goode, violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin, it was the second movement, an Allegretto virtually for piano solo with string accompaniments or doublings thrown in, against the true trio contexts of the outer movements.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players were presented last night at Jordan Hall as the ninth program of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony series:

Piano Trio No. 4 in E major — Haydn
Sextour for piano and woodwind quintet — Poulenc
Kammermusik for oboe, bassoon, piano and percussion — Koeper
Piano Quartet in E flat, Op. 83 — Dvorak

For Poulenc's Sextour for piano and five woodwinds it was the combination of mischievous levity and folk-like thematic material in a style which the composer seemed to have inherited from Ibert — but who knows? It was a familiar characteristic of French chamber idioms of 20's and 30's.

Then there was the Kammermusik for oboe, bassoon, percussion and piano by one Koeper, born 1927; I cannot bring myself to remember his first name and the program was not kind enough to inform me. Anyway, Herr Koeper's Kammermusik contained plenty of varied activity for Everett Firth, who rattled a variety of sticks across snare drum, tambourine, cymbal, xylophone, marimba, timpani, bass drum (via foot) and other machinery. The other players also kept up the tempo and texture with short-motive themes and all contributed in turns to the rhythmic scheme.

Finally, Dvorak's Piano Quartet in E flat, Op. 83, brought tonal intensity and melodic sentiment to the proceedings — even snatches of tinkling charm from the piano in a deliciously graceful third movement.

The various flavors were served with appropriate feeling and capable musicianship by Mme. Dwyer and Messrs. Goode, Silverstein, Fine, Eskin, Gomberg, Cioffi, Walt, Stagliano and Firth, and if none of the readings could be called definitive they were all sincere, spirited and just plain fun.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN. 956,206

MAR 18 1968

At the Academy

Zimbler Sinfonietta Featured

The Zimbler Sinfonietta, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's counterpart of the Philadelphia Orchestra's Amerita in that its personnel are members of the larger ensemble, made a belated local debut Sunday. The 15 players, of whom six were in the original ensemble founded in 1948 by cellist Josef Zimbler, played at the Academy of Music in the Philadelphia Chamber Orchestra series.

The Zimbler ensemble is conducted by Richard Burgin, retired longtime concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony. Of course, conductors never retire. The Warsaw-born Burgin, now teaching at Florida State University, is a hearty and youngish-looking 74.

The Sinfonietta meets a high standard. Its tone is bright and solid, less lush than that of our local ensembles. The ensemble is impeccable. The group's rapport is of the best, whether in baroque or contemporary works, with or without solo players.

ZESTFUL OFFERING

The principal soloist was George Zazofsky, concertmaster and musical director of the Sinfonietta (and assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony), in Bach's Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor. Soloist and ensemble were of one mind in a performance that envisioned the concerto in positive, zestful interpretation rather than a deferential, dry one. This mood was conveyed in the buoyant outer movements, with the Andante expressively played, marked by delicacy of dynamic contrast within a restricted tonal frame.

There were three seldom-heard 20th-century works. Half a dozen of Britten's Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge served to demonstrate the then-youthful composer's flair for this popular form of composition.

The Britten work concludes with a perpetual motion, a feature also of Hindemith's Five Pieces for String Orchestra, which include a couple of somber movements and a canonical, propulsive section, and of Tansman's "Triptych," which contrasts several moods in its three movements.

The program opened with Mozart's Divertimento in D (K. 136), the first of a set of three by the 16-year-old genius, and closed with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 11 in A. Clarity and precision were the hallmarks here as elsewhere.

SAMUEL L. SINGER

ADDISON CO. INDEPENDENT
MIDDLEBURY, VT.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,350

APR 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Noted Boston Chamber Players In Midd Sunday

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of nine principal musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard at Middlebury College Sunday, April 21, at 8:15 p.m. in Mead Memorial Chapel, in the final concert of this season's Middlebury College Concert Series.

Works of Mozart, Dahl, Barber, Beethoven and Poulenc will be played by the group which includes Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, 'cello; Georges Moleux, bass; Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Geino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn and Claude Frank, piano.

Heard regularly in Boston and New York, the Chamber Players are on their fourth annual tour.

All the musicians have studied with eminent teachers and all but two are on the faculty either of the Boston Conservatory of Music or Boston University, or both.

DETROIT, MICH.
JEWISH NEWS
W 5 000

APR 19 1968

Boston Symphony Trio to Perform Here

The Boston Symphony String Trio will perform 8:30 p.m. April 30 at Rackham Auditorium. This group, composed of concertmaster and principal viola and cello of the Boston Symphony, will perform this special concert in addition to the regular series of the Chamber Music Society. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, is a native Detroiter and the product of the Detroit community. His early music training was given by his father, followed by Mischa Mischakoff, assisted by awards and scholarships by local music groups, all of which assisted him in the attainment of his present position.

The Chamber Music Society has added this concert to its 24th season, apart from its regularly scheduled subscription season.

Admission tickets are available at Hudsons, Grinnells, and Adler/Schnee, or with self-addressed, stamped envelope to Chamber Music Society, 521 Hague, Detroit 48202.

ADDISON CO. INDEPENDENT
MIDDLEBURY, VT.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,350

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS: Joseph Silverstein, violin; James Stagliano, horn; Burton Fine, viola; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Jules Eskin, cello; Claude Frank, piano.

B.S.O. & JAPANESE PLAYERS IN EXCHANGE

106

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750

APR 11 1967

New England Newsclip

Symphonic swap links U.S. and Japan

By Clifford Barnes

The Boston Symphony's unique contribution to understanding among people of different countries is a kind of musical Peace Corps. An exchange of four string players between the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has touched the social and cultural lives of the organizations involved, as well as their music-making.

The idea for an exchange was conceived five years ago by George Zazofsky, violinist with the BSO. The tight itineraries of American orchestras on tour don't allow much time for their players to meet musicians in the countries visited. Such meaningful contacts need to be set up on a long-term basis.

In 1962 Mr. Zazofsky proposed a full-season-exchange plan to a special assistant of President Kennedy. Two years later, with the approval of music-director Erich Leinsdorf and president-of-the-board-of-trustees Henry Cabot, he secured the interest of Roger Stevens and the National Council on the Arts. The pilot program got under way in May, 1966, when Mr. Leinsdorf visited Japan to audition a violinist, two violists, a cellist, and a contrabassist.

Adjustments required

Konosuke Ono and Soichi Kasuta were among those recommended by Akeo Watanabe, conductor of the Japan Philharmonic, and by concertmaster Louis Graeler, the only Occidental member of that orchestra. With just three-day's notice, for their auditions Mr. Ono played Bartók's Viola Concerto and Mr. Katsuta the Lalo Cello Concerto.

When Robert Karol, violist, and Richard Kapuscinski, cellist, agreed to leave the BSO and spend a year with their families in Japan, the exchange was effected. Then followed adjustments to food, living conditions, foreign languages, and some financial difficulties. The musical rewards have compensated for any other problems.

Katsuta-sa (Mr. Katsuta) and Ono-san arrived last June in time for study at Tanglewood. The beginning of the BSO season found them seated with the orchestra in Symphony Hall. They were already familiar with most of the standard repertoire programed this year.

Mr. Leinsdorf has performed several new American works since they have been here. None has particularly impressed these young Japanese musicians. Ono-san listed several contemporary Japanese composers that he felt should be heard in America: Yasushi Akutagaw, Ikuma Dan, Yoshio Mamiya, Toshio Mayuzumi, Akiya Miyoshi, and Tohyu Takemitsu.

American music and musicians are highly respected in Japan. In addition to BSO recordings, Ono-san's library includes discs by Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, and Colin Davis. He spoke with pride of the work done by the talented young Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa.

Western composers popular

Katsuta-san played with the Japan Philharmonic on their recent tour of 36 American cities. This year in Boston has given him a real insight on life in the United States. He is particularly impressed with the Fine Arts Museum.

Ono-san has been married a year and a half. His first child, a son, Kohji, was born after he left Japan. The proud father keeps up on his growth through photographs. Memories of the fall foliage and the Charles River will be prime topics for conversation when he returns home.

The exchange program for this year terminates after the Boston Pops season. Ono-san will take a boat to Japan because he doesn't like planes—even though it will be longer before he can see his new son. Katsuta-san will fly back to Tokyo.

The Japan Philharmonic has almost 100 musicians, of which 12 are women. Pop and symphonic programs are mixed throughout the season. Tokyo's middle- and upper-classes support seven symphony orchestras. The standard repertoire of Western music is very popular, including contemporary composers like Bartók and Hindemith. Music by Japanese composers is featured whenever possible.

The exchange-musicians have been interested by differences of audiences in Tokyo and Boston. There is definitely less applause in Japan unless it be for a foreign orchestra. Although Japanese audiences are not so vociferous as European ones, an occasional shout of "he takuso" (no good!) can be heard when they don't like the music.

The most impressive aspect of American musical life to these visitors has been the way amateurs get together to make music and enjoy it. Seeing older people turn to this kind of recreation came as quite a surprise, since this isn't done in Japan.

Letters between Tokyo and Boston have given strong support to this pilot program. President Johnson is aware of the exchange and the good it has accomplished. The BSO now has a new role to fill as Musical-Peace-Corps Ambassador to the world!

Photography, Inc.

Exchange players

Konosuke Ono, viola, and Soichi Katsuta, cello, are completing their season as exchange players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are shown here with George Zazofsky, violinist, who originated the exchange plan. The Japanese players traded places with Robert Karol, viola, and Richard Kapuscinski, who are playing in the Japan Philharmonic Symphony in Tokyo.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,425

AUG 29 1967

Musicians Exchange Between U. S., Japan

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — At the close of the 1967 Berkshire Festival the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced that arrangements had just been completed for the second year of an exchange of players with the Japan Philharmonic. Initiated last season, the plan involves the exchange of two players by each of the orchestras.

For the 1967-68 orchestra year, Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist Ronald Knudsen and violist George Humphrey will go to Japan. Toshiyuki Kikkawa, violin, and Adio Akabaski, viola, will join the Boston Symphony in late September when the Orchestra reconvenes in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The exchange plan is the result of the thought and efforts of George Zazofsky, Chairman of the Boston Symphony Players Committee, and has had the full support of Henry B. Cabot, President of the Orchestra, and Music Director Erich Leinsdorf. Travel arrangements for the exchange are handled by the Department of State and each orchestra pays its players their regular salary.

With one successful year of exchange completed it is hoped that the plan will soon involve other orchestras in this country and throughout the world.

Mr. Knudsen and Mr. Humphrey and their families departed for Japan immediately after the final Berkshire Festival concert, the concluding program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eighty-sixth season.

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

SEP 26 1967

New England Newsclip

Two Japanese Musicians Join Hub Symphony

BOSTON (AP)—Two Japanese musicians and their families today began a season's stay with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Toshiyuki Kikkawa, violinist, and Akie Akabashi, violist, swapped orchestras with two BSO musicians, Ronald Knudsen, violinist, and George Humphrey, violist.

The two Americans are scheduled to play with the Japanese Philarmonic Orchestra. Their families will accompany them.

The swap was arranged as part of a cultural exchange between the two orchestras.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 149,058

JUN 27 1966

Musicians' Exchange Begins

Members of the Japan Philharmonic—violinist Konosuke Ono (left) and cellist Soichi Katsuta—meet Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf under whom they will play next season in the first exchange between a U.S. and a foreign orchestra. Ono and Katsuta will spend the Summer in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

SUN (e)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
CIRC. 12,400

SEP 26 1967

New England Newsclip

JAPANESE MUSICIANS WITH HUB SYMPHONY

BOSTON (AP)—Two Japanese musicians and their families today began a season's stay with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Toshiyuki Kikkawa, violinist, and Akie Akabashi, violist, swapped orchestras with two BSO musicians, Ronald Knudsen, violinist, and George Humphrey, violist.

The two Americans are scheduled to play with the Japanese Philarmonic Orchestra. Their families will accompany them.

The swap was arranged as part of a cultural exchange between the two orchestras.

105

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 59,900

MAR 20 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Echoes from BSO's Chamber

By Peter M. Knapp

The variety of its repertoire and the virtuosity of its players make the Boston Symphony Chamber Players one of the most fascinating of chamber groups. Not the least of its virtues lies in bringing fresh material to Boston audiences, or at least to the all too small group that attends chamber concerts in the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series.

Monday night's concert at Jordan Hall presented a typical excursion into the little-known, with two 20th century works, a small but somewhat daring piano trio by Haydn, and Antonin Dvorak's lusty piano quartet in E-flat, opus 83. The Chamber Players are first-desk musicians from the Boston Symphony, with the exception of pianist Richard Goode. And although all instrumental families are represented, no parts are doubled.

The highlight of the concert was easily the Dvorak piano quartet, a composition of luxurious sound bristling with melody and snappy rhythms — even to the suggestion of a coffee house waltz in the third movement. It was performed with total musical and emotional commitment by pianist Goode, violinist Joseph Silverstein, violist Burton Fine and cellist Jules Eskin. And while the other works of the evening were expertly done, none had the passion, the refinement, and the over-all excitement of the Dvorak.

It particularly seemed to suit Goode's temperament, as the Haydn Trio No. 4 in E did not. The Haydn, played with Silverstein and Eskin, suffered from a domineering, over-pedaled piano, though Haydn did intend it to be the protagonist. In the Dvorak, however, there was crisp teamwork in which Goode's pianism was as impassioned as it was technically impressive.

The other works went further afield than piano and strings. Francis Poulenc's fey Sextour for piano and wind quintet combined Goode, flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, oboist Ralph Gomberg, clarinetist Gino Cioffi, bassoonist Sherman Walt and hornist James Stagliano. It is not a profound work, and rather makes fun of itself with its music-hall tunes and abrupt lunges into different byways.

In its wry humor, oblique manner and eccentricities, the Poulenc composition is reminiscent of a Gallic Prokofiev — a trifle to be enjoyed and not to take too seriously. At any rate, it's not simple music, and the playing was awesomely adept, especially Stagliano's contributions.

The other "modern" work was Koeper's Kammermusik for oboe, bassoon, percussion and piano, with percussionist Everett Firth demonstrating his virtuosity on an array of hardware — timpani, snare drums, vibraphone, cymbals, xylophone et al — backed by Goode, Walt and Gomberg in music making much of repetitive motifs and leaving no great lasting impression.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Chamber Players In Well-Rounded Program

For the hardy number of listeners who turned up at Jordan Hall last night the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performed a well-rounded program of classic simplicity, 20th-century French gaiety, modern German rhythmic energy and romantic warmth.

Each of the four works seemed to display its own particular moments of interest. In the Haydn Trio No. 4 in E, performed by pianist Richard Goode, violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin, it was the second movement, an Allegretto virtually for piano solo with string accompaniments or doublings thrown in, against the true trio contexts of the outer movements.

For Poulenc's Sextour for piano and five woodwinds it was the combination of mischievous levity and folk-like thematic material in a style which the composer seemed to have inherited from Ibert — but who knows? It was a familiar characteristic of French chamber idioms of 20's and 30's.

Then there was the Kammermusik for oboe, bassoon, percussion and piano by one Koeper, born 1927; I cannot bring myself to remember his first name and the program was not kind enough to inform me. Anyway, Herr Koeper's Kammermusik contained plenty of varied activity for Everett Firth, who rattled a variety of sticks across snare drum, tambourine, cymbal, xylophone, marimba, timpani, bass drum (via foot) and other machinery. The other players also kept up the tempo and texture with short-motive themes and all contributed in turns to the rhythmic scheme.

Finally, Dvorak's Piano Quartet in E flat, Op. 83, brought tonal intensity and melodic sentiment to the proceedings — even snatches of tinkling charm from the piano in a deliciously graceful third movement.

The various flavors were served with appropriate feeling and capable musicianship by Mme. Dwyer and Messrs. Goode, Silverstein, Fine, Eskin, Gomberg, Cioffi, Walt, Stagliano and Firth, and if none of the readings could be called definitive they were all sincere, spirited and just plain fun.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players were presented last night at Jordan Hall as the ninth program of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony series:

Piano Trio No. 4 in E major — Haydn
Sextour for piano and woodwind quintet — Poulenc
Kammermusik for oboe, bassoon, piano and percussion — Koeper
Piano Quartet in E flat, Op. 83 — Dvorak

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN. 956,206

MAR 18 1968

At the Academy

Zimbler Sinfonietta Featured

The Zimbler Sinfonietta, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's counterpart of the Philadelphia Orchestra's Amerita in that its personnel are members of the larger ensemble, made a belated local debut Sunday. The 15 players, of whom six were in the original ensemble founded in 1948 by cellist Josef Zimbler, played at the Academy of Music in the Philadelphia Chamber Orchestra series.

The Zimbler ensemble is conducted by Richard Burgin, retired longtime concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony. Of course, conductors never retire. The Warsaw-born Burgin, now teaching at Florida State University, is a hearty and youngish-looking 74.

The Sinfonietta meets a high standard. Its tone is bright and solid, less lush than that of our local ensembles. The ensemble is impeccable. The group's rapport is of the best, whether in baroque or contemporary works, with or without solo players.

ZESTFUL OFFERING

The principal soloist was George Zazofsky, concertmaster and musical director of the Sinfonietta (and assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony) in Bach's Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor. Soloist and ensemble were of one mind in a performance that envisioned the concerto in positive, zestful interpretation rather than a deferential, dry one. This mood was conveyed in the buoyant outer movements, with the Andante expressively played, marked by delicacy of dynamic contrast within a restricted tonal frame.

There were three seldom-heard 20th-century works. Half a dozen of Britten's Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge served to demonstrate the then-youthful composer's flair for this popular form of composition.

The Britten work concludes with a perpetual motion, a feature also of Hindemith's Five Pieces for String Orchestra, which include a couple of somber movements and a canonical, propulsive section, and of Tansman's "Triptych," which contrasts several moods in its three movements.

The program opened with Mozart's Divertimento in D (K. 136), the first of a set of three by the 16-year-old genius, and closed with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 11 in A. Clarity and precision were the hallmarks here as elsewhere.

SAMUEL L. SINGER

ADDISON CO. INDEPENDENT
MIDDLEBURY, VT.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,350

APR 11 1968 New England Newsclip

Noted Boston Chamber Players In Midd Sunday

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of nine principal musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard at Middlebury College Sunday, April 21, at 8:15 p.m. in Mead Memorial Chapel, in the final concert of this season's Middlebury College Concert Series.

Works of Mozart, Dahl, Barber, Beethoven and Poulenc will be played by the group which includes Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, 'cello; Georges Moleux, bass; Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Geino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn and Claude Frank, piano.

Heard regularly in Boston and New York, the Chamber Players are on their fourth annual tour.

All the musicians have studied with eminent teachers and all but two are on the faculty either of the Boston Conservatory of Music or Boston University, or both.

DETROIT, MICH.
JEWISH NEWS
W 5,000

APR 19 1968

Boston Symphony Trio to Perform Here

The Boston Symphony String Trio will perform 8:30 p.m. April 30 at Rackham Auditorium. This group, composed of concertmaster and principal viola and cello of the Boston Symphony, will perform this special concert in addition to the regular series of the Chamber Music Society. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, is a native Detroiter and the product of the Detroit community. His early music training was given by his father, followed by Mischa Mischakoff, assisted by awards and scholarships by local music groups, all of which assisted him in the attainment of his present position.

The Chamber Music Society has added this concert to its 24th season, apart from its regularly scheduled subscription season.

Admission tickets are available at Hudsons, Grinnells, and Adler/Schnee, or with self-addressed, stamped envelope to Chamber Music Society, 521 Hague, Detroit 48202.

ADDISON CO. INDEPENDENT
MIDDLEBURY, VT.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,350

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS: Joseph Silverstein, violin; James Stagliano, horn; Burton Fine, viola; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Jules Eskin, cello; Claude Frank, piano.

B.S.O. & JAPANESE PLAYERS IN EXCHANGE

106

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 177,750

APR 11 1967

New England Newsclip

Symphonic swap links U.S. and Japan

By Clifford Barnes

The Boston Symphony's unique contribution to understanding among people of different countries is a kind of musical Peace Corps. An exchange of four string players between the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has touched the social and cultural lives of the organizations involved, as well as their music-making.

The idea for an exchange was conceived five years ago by George Zazofsky, violinist with the BSO. The tight itineraries of American orchestras on tour don't allow much time for their players to meet musicians in the countries visited. Such meaningful contacts need to be set up on a long-term basis.

In 1962 Mr. Zazofsky proposed a full-season-exchange plan to a special assistant of President Kennedy. Two years later, with the approval of music-director Erich Leinsdorf and president-of-the-board-of-trustees Henry Cabot, he secured the interest of Roger Stevens and the National Council on the Arts. The pilot program got under way in May, 1966, when Mr. Leinsdorf visited Japan to audition a violinist, two violists, a cellist, and a contrabassist.

Adjustments required

Konosuke Ono and Soichi Kasuta were among those recommended by Akeo Watanabe, conductor of the Japan Philharmonic, and by concertmaster Louis Graeler, the only Occidental member of that orchestra. With just three-day's notice, for their auditions Mr. Ono played Bartók's Viola Concerto and Mr. Katsuta the Lalo Cello Concerto.

When Robert Karol, violist, and Richard Kapuscinski, cellist, agreed to leave the BSO and spend a year with their families in Japan, the exchange was effected. Then followed adjustments to food, living conditions, foreign languages, and some financial difficulties. The musical rewards have compensated for any other problems.

Katsuta-sa (Mr. Katsuta) and Ono-san arrived last June in time for study at Tanglewood. The beginning of the BSO season found them seated with the orchestra in Symphony Hall. They were already familiar with most of the standard repertoire programed this year.

Mr. Leinsdorf has performed several new American works since they have been here. None has particularly impressed these young Japanese musicians. Ono-san listed several contemporary Japanese composers that he felt should be heard in America: Yasushi Akutagaw, Ikuma Dan, Yoshio Mamiya, Toshio Mayuzumi, Akiya Miyoshi, and Tohyu Takemitsu.

American music and musicians are highly respected in Japan. In addition to BSO recordings, Ono-san's library includes discs by Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, and Colin Davis. He spoke with pride of the work done by the talented young Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa.

Western composers popular

Katsuta-san played with the Japan Philharmonic on their recent tour of 36 American cities. This year in Boston has given him a real insight on life in the United States. He is particularly impressed with the Fine Arts Museum.

Ono-san has been married a year and a half. His first child, a son, Kohji, was born after he left Japan. The proud father keeps up on his growth through photographs. Memories of the fall foliage and the Charles River will be prime topics for conversation when he returns home.

The exchange program for this year terminates after the Boston Pops season. Ono-san will take a boat to Japan because he doesn't like planes—even though it will be longer before he can see his new son. Katsuta-san will fly back to Tokyo.

The Japan Philharmonic has almost 100 musicians, of which 12 are women. Pop and symphonic programs are mixed throughout the season. Tokyo's middle- and upper-classes support seven symphony orchestras. The standard repertoire of Western music is very popular, including contemporary composers like Bartók and Hindemith. Music by Japanese composers is featured whenever possible.

The exchange-musicians have been interested by differences of audiences in Tokyo and Boston. There is definitely less applause in Japan unless it be for a foreign orchestra. Although Japanese audiences are not so vociferous as European ones, an occasional shout of "he takuso" (no good!) can be heard when they don't like the music.

The most impressive aspect of American musical life to these visitors has been the way amateurs get together to make music and enjoy it. Seeing older people turn to this kind of recreation came as quite a surprise, since this isn't done in Japan.

Letters between Tokyo and Boston have given strong support to this pilot program. President Johnson is aware of the exchange and the good it has accomplished. The BSO now has a new role to fill as Musical-Peace-Corps Ambassador to the world!

Photography, Inc.

Exchange players

Konosuke Ono, viola, and Soichi Katsuta, cello, are completing their season as exchange players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are shown here with George Zazofsky, violinist, who originated the exchange plan. The Japanese players traded places with Robert Karol, viola, and Richard Kapuscinski, who are playing in the Japan Philharmonic Symphony in Tokyo.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,425

AUG 29 1967

Musicians Exchange Between U. S., Japan

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — At the close of the 1967 Berkshire Festival the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced that arrangements had just been completed for the second year of an exchange of players with the Japan Philharmonic. Initiated last season, the plan involves the exchange of two players by each of the orchestras.

For the 1967-68 orchestra year, Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist Ronald Knudsen and violist George Humphrey will go to Japan. Toshiyuki Kikkawa, violin, and Adio Akabaski, viola, will join the Boston Symphony in late September when the Orchestra reconvenes in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The exchange plan is the result of the thought and efforts of George Zazofsky, Chairman of the Boston Symphony Players Committee, and has had the full support of Henry B. Cabot, President of the Orchestra, and Music Director Erich Leinsdorf. Travel arrangements for the exchange are handled by the Department of State and each orchestra pays its players their regular salary.

With one successful year of exchange completed it is hoped that the plan will soon involve other orchestras in this country and throughout the world.

Mr. Knudsen and Mr. Humphrey and their families departed for Japan immediately after the final Berkshire Festival concert, the concluding program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eighty-sixth season.

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

SEP 26 1967

New England Newsclip

Two Japanese Musicians Join Hub Symphony

BOSTON (AP)—Two Japanese musicians and their families today began a season's stay with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Toshiyuki Kikkawa, violinist, and Akie Akabashi, violist, swapped orchestras with two BSO musicians, Ronald Knudsen, violinist, and George Humphrey, violist.

The two Americans are scheduled to play with the Japanese Philarmonic Orchestra. Their families will accompany them.

The swap was arranged as part of a cultural exchange between the two orchestras.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 149,058

JUN 27 1966

Musicians' Exchange Begins

Members of the Japan Philharmonic—violinist Konosuke Ono (left) and cellist Soichi Katsuta—meet Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf under whom they will play next season in the first exchange between a U.S. and a foreign orchestra. Ono and Katsuta will spend the Summer in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

SUN (e)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
CIRC. 12,400

SEP 26 1967

New England Newsclip

JAPANESE MUSICIANS WITH HUB SYMPHONY

BOSTON (AP)—Two Japanese musicians and their families today began a season's stay with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Toshiyuki Kikkawa, violinist, and Akie Akabashi, violist, swapped orchestras with two BSO musicians, Ronald Knudsen, violinist, and George Humphrey, violist.

The two Americans are scheduled to play with the Japanese Philarmonic Orchestra. Their families will accompany them.

The swap was arranged as part of a cultural exchange between the two orchestras.

107

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press
WESTWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,641

AUG 24 1966

Local Symphony Players In Exchange With Japan

PAGE ONE

Two Westwood residents, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will participate in a program of exchanging players with the Japan Philharmonic for next season. Henry B. Cabot, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees, who announced the program, also revealed that the Orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, would visit Japan early next month under the auspices of the Department of State and complete the details of the exchange. The exchange program and Mr. Leinsdorf's visit have been made possible by the Department's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs.

The new program is the result of the initiative of George Zazofsky, Chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Players Committee and of the International Conference of Symphony and Opera Musicians. Mr. Zazofsky suggested to the State Department officials that such an exchange would broaden the musical horizons and provide new points of view to the participants.

Each of the orchestras involved will continue to pay their players' salaries. The Department of State will pay for transportation of the musicians. The Japanese orchestra will supplement the salaries of its participants to make it possible for them to live in this country.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the first American orchestra to take part in the exchange program. The program has the support of the American Federation of Musicians, Herman D. Kenin, President.

The two members of the

—SYMPHONY—

(Continued on Page 16)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
234,100

APR 27 1968 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. honors for Japanese

Two Japanese musicians who have been playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under a cultural exchange plan were honored by the B.S.O. at a party in Symphony Hall Thursday night.

Violinist Toshiyuki Kikkawa and violist Akio Akaboshi came here from Tokyo last Fall. B.S.O. musicians Ronald Knudsen and George Humphrey went to Tokyo to spend the season with the Japan Philharmonic.

Music Director Erich Leinsdorf presented the Japanese players large, autographed pictures of the orchestra during the buffet supper after rehearsal for the season's final two concerts.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 400,124

JUN 28 1966

* * *

The Boston Symphony will take part in an exchange program with the Japan Philharmonic next season. Cellist Richard Kapuscinski and violinst Robert Karol will spend the season playing in Japan, while a violist and cellist of the Japan Philharmonic take their place in Boston. Each of the orchestras will continue to pay their own players' salaries.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, JULY 9, 1967

Four Tickets in Boston-Tokyo Swap

By RAYMOND ERICSON

THE opening of the Berkshire Music Festival last weekend found two of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's players back in their places after a season's absence. They had been taking part in an experiment that they felt was invaluable yet might die on the vine.

The origins of the experiment go back to the thinking of George Zazofsky, one of the orchestra's first violinists, who had long believed that his colleagues deserved a sabbatical as a refresher after years of routine work. Realizing the impracticalities involved, he conceived a related plan. Why not exchange two of Boston's string players for two from a foreign orchestra? A Japanese ensemble, where the organization was young but the players experienced, seemed a useful choice all around.

At first the project did not look expensive. Zazofsky approached the State Department, which was enthusiastic. Bureaucracy being what it is, no proper category for advancing money for the Bostonian's purpose could be found. The Department was able, in the end, to furnish four round-trip tickets — one for each player — and a 140-pound allowance for extra baggage. The Bostonians would get their regular salary, the Japanese theirs — from the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra.

Two Bostonians were willing to make the financial sacrifice involved in going and taking their families with them: Robert Karol, a violist, with a wife and two children; Richard Kapuscinski, a cellist, with a wife and three children. Since the cost of living in Tokyo is as high as in any other metropolis and the children had to attend private schools, the trip proved exhorbitant for the two instrumentalists, so much so as to discourage future volunteers.

Yet, in discussing the experience last Sunday just before the afternoon concert at Tanglewood, both Karol and Kapuscinski spoke not of the financial hardships but of what they thought had been achieved. Karol took his opposite number's place in the Tokyo orchestra. In his very first day there, on entering for rehearsal, he was greeted by one of the local violists, who pointed to a passage in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Karol realized that he was being asked for the fingering.

During the season, all the violists rotated seats so that each could have a chance to work with Karol, a procedure that worked with Kapuscinski, too. What they feel they contributed to the situation besides performance details were out-and-out instruction and a sense of traditional stylistic playing values to an orchestra only 10 years old. Regular patrons in the audience could observe the byplay and relaxed attitudes between the Japanese and American players. For their part, the two Boston musicians' wives were active in useful ways, in elementary education, teaching English, or helping handicapped children.

How did the Bostonians profit? Some of it was a matter of personality, of finding out about oneself in a new environment. Each had opportunities for solo work that he might not have had at home. Kapuscinski gave a Beethoven cello and piano sonata recital with a Mrs. Mikimoto, which as a benefit enabled some music students to go to the United States. In turn, the College Women's Association of Tokyo commissioned a piece for Kapuscinski, for cello and prepared piano, by Jogi Yuasa.

*

Musicians being gregarious and able to communicate in their own special language, it was easier for the two Boston players to enter into the social life of their Japanese colleagues than for most Americans living abroad. It took some time, of course, but after they had been in Tokyo for a while they realized suddenly that they were no longer on a formal basis with their hosts. As Karol put it, "The value of our being in Japan with our families was, I think, incalculable. For a very small investment there was an enormous profit in the human element."

And what of the Japanese players here? The violist was Konosuke Ono, whose wife was left behind because she was expecting her first baby. It was born during the father's absence. The cellist, Soichi Katsuta, was a bachelor. Obviously they must have learned much from playing in an orchestra of the caliber of the Boston Symphony. Ono also studied Walter Piston's Viola Concerto with the composer so that he could play it when he got back home.

Getting back to where the idea began — George Zazofsky — he thinks the recent experiment should justify a very broad international exchange, with many musicians from many American orchestras swapping places with their colleagues in countries in Asia, in Africa when practical and in Europe where performance tradition is not too inflexible.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

SEP 28 1967 New England Newsclip

(UPI Telephoto)

SYMPHONY-JAPAN PHILHARMONIC exchange brought Akaboshi (second left) and Toshiyuki Kikkawa (right) to Boston Symphony for a year. Two of BSO members will play in Tokyo. At left is violinist Harry Ellis Dickson. Also shown is violinist George Zazofsky, who initiated the exchange.

107

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 02106 • 742-4200

Press
WESTWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,641

AUG 24 1966

Local Symphony Players In Exchange With Japan

Two Westwood residents, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will participate in a program of exchanging players with the Japan Philharmonic for next season. Henry B. Cabot, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees, who announced the program, also revealed that the Orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, would visit Japan early next month under the auspices of the Department of State and complete the details of the exchange. The exchange program and Mr. Leinsdorf's visit have been made possible by the Department's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs.

The new program is the result of the initiative of George Zazofsky, Chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Players Committee and of the International Conference of Symphony and Opera Musicians. Mr. Zazofsky suggested to the State Department officials that such an exchange would broaden the musical horizons and provide new points of view to the participants.

Each of the orchestras involved will continue to pay their players' salaries. The Department of State will pay for transportation of the musicians. The Japanese orchestra will supplement the salaries of its participants to make it possible for them to live in this country.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the first American orchestra to take part in the exchange program. The program has the support of the American Federation of Musicians, Herman D. Kenin, President.

The two members of the

—SYMPHONY—
(Continued on Page 16)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
234,100

APR 27 1968 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. honors for Japanese

Two Japanese musicians who have been playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under a cultural exchange plan were honored by the B.S.O. at a party in Symphony Hall Thursday night.

Violinist Toshiyuki Kikkawa and violist Akio Akaboshi came here from Tokyo last Fall. B.S.O. musicians Ronald Knudsen and George Humphrey went to Tokyo to spend the season with the Japan Philharmonic.

Music Director Erich Leinsdorf presented the Japanese players large, autographed pictures of the orchestra during the buffet supper after rehearsal for the season's final two concerts.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 400,124

JUN 28 1966

* * *

The Boston Symphony will take part in an exchange program with the Japan Philharmonic next season. Cellist Richard Kapuscinski and violinst Robert Karol will spend the season playing in Japan, while a violist and cellist of the Japan Philharmonic take their place in Boston. Each of the orchestras will continue to pay their own players' salaries.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, JULY 9, 1967

Four Tickets in Boston-Tokyo Swap

By RAYMOND ERICSON

THE opening of the Berkshire Music Festival last weekend found two of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's players back in their places after a season's absence. They had been taking part in an experiment that they felt was invaluable yet might die on the vine.

The origins of the experiment go back to the thinking of George Zazofsky, one of the orchestra's first violinists, who had long believed that his colleagues deserved a sabbatical as a refresher after years of routine work. Realizing the impracticalities involved; he conceived a related plan. Why not exchange two of Boston's string players for two from a foreign orchestra? A Japanese ensemble, where the organization was young but the players experienced, seemed a useful choice all around.

At first the project did not look expensive. Zazofsky approached the State Department, which was enthusiastic. Bureaucracy being what it is, no proper category for advancing money for the Bostonian's' purpose could be found. The Department was able, in the end, to furnish four round-trip tickets — one for each player — and a 140-pound allowance for extra baggage. The Bostonians would get their regular salary, the Japanese theirs — from the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra.

Two Bostonians were willing to make the financial sacrifice involved in going and taking their families with them: Robert Karol, a violist, with a wife and two children; Richard Kapuscinski, a cellist, with a wife and three children. Since the cost of living in Tokyo is as high as in any other metropolis and the children had to attend private schools, the trip proved exhorbitant for the two instrumentalists, so much so as to discourage future volunteers.

Yet, in discussing the experience last Sunday just before the afternoon concert at Tanglewood, both Karol and Kapuscinski spoke not of the financial hardships but of what they thought had been achieved. Karol took his opposite number's place in the Tokyo orchestra. In his very first day there, on entering for rehearsal, he was greeted by one of the local violists, who pointed to a passage in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Karol realized that he was being asked for the fingering.

During the season, all the violists rotated seats so that each could have a chance to work with Karol, a procedure that worked with Kapuscinski, too. What they feel they contributed to the situation besides performance details were out-and-out instruction and a sense of traditional stylistic playing values to an orchestra only 10 years old. Regular patrons in the audience could observe the byplay and relaxed attitudes between the Japanese and American players. For their part, the two Boston musicians' wives were active in useful ways, in elementary education, teaching English, or helping handicapped children.

How did the Bostonians profit? Some of it was a matter of personality, of finding out about oneself in a new environment. Each had opportunities for solo work that he might not have had at home. Kapuscinski gave a Beethoven cello and piano sonata recital with a Mrs. Mikimoto, which as a benefit enabled some music students to go to the United States. In turn, the College Women's Association of Tokyo commissioned a piece for Kapuscinski, for cello and prepared piano, by Jogi Yuasa.

*

Musicians being gregarious and able to communicate in their own special language, it was easier for the two Boston players to enter into the social life of their Japanese colleagues than for most Americans living abroad. It took some time, of course, but after they had been in Tokyo for a while they realized suddenly that they were no longer on a formal basis with their hosts. As Karol put it, "The value of our being in Japan with our families was, I think, incalculable. For a very small investment there was an enormous profit in the human element."

And what of the Japanese players here? The violist was Konosuke Ono, whose wife was left behind because she was expecting her first baby. It was born during the father's absence. The cellist, Soichi Katsuta, was a bachelor. Obviously they must have learned much from playing in an orchestra of the caliber of the Boston Symphony. Ono also studied Walter Piston's Viola Concerto with the composer so that he could play it when he got back home.

Getting back to where the idea began — George Zazofsky — he thinks the recent experiment should justify a very broad international exchange, with many musicians from many American orchestras swapping places with their colleagues in countries in Asia, in Africa when practical and in Europe where performance tradition is not too inflexible.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

SEP 28 1967 New England Newsclip

(UPI Telephoto)

SYMPHONY-JAPAN PHILHARMONIC exchange brought Akaboshi (second left) and Toshiyuki Kikkawa (right) to Boston Symphony for a year. Two of BSO members will play in Tokyo. At left is violinist Harry Ellis Dickson. Also shown is violinist George Zazofsky, who initiated the exchange.

THE STRIDE RITE
NEEDHAM
Prescriptions Filled and Fitted Daily

SOFT WITH ... AIR CLEANERS

(Continued from page 1)

... Symphony Orchestra ... will spend the winter ... Symphony season in Japan are Robert Karol, viola, and Richard Kapuscinski, cellist, both of Westwood. Their places in the Orchestra will be taken by a violist and a cellist from the Japan Philharmonic. Mr. Karol and Mr. Kapuscinski plan to be accompanied by their wives and children.

In commenting on the exchange and his forthcoming visit to Japan, Mr. Leinsdorf said:

"This program should be extremely beneficial not only for musicians but for music itself since it provides a meeting ground for ideas and experiences over a prolonged period. I also share the hopes of the State Department's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs that this will become an annual venture and that in the future it will be on a much larger scale involving American and foreign orchestras within the same years's span."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
... 294,100

APR 27 1968 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. honors for Japanese

Two Japanese musicians who have been playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under a cultural exchange plan were honored by the B.S.O. at a party in Symphony Hall Thursday night.

Violinist Toshiyuki Kikkawa and violist Akio Akaboshi came here from Tokyo last Fall. B.S.O. musicians Ronald Knudsen and George Humphrey went to Tokyo to spend the season with the Japan Philharmonic.

Music Director Erich Leinsdorf presented the Japanese players large, autographed pictures of the orchestra during the buffet supper after rehearsal for the season's final two concerts.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 400,124

JUN 28 1966

* * *

The Boston Symphony will take part in an exchange program with the Japan Philharmonic next season. Cellist Richard Kapuscinski and violinst Robert Karol will spend the season playing in Japan, while a violist and cellist of the Japan Philharmonic take their place in Boston. Each of the orchestras will continue to pay their own players' salaries.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, JULY 9, 1967

Four Tickets in Boston-Tokyo Swap

By RAYMOND ERICSON

THE opening of the Berkshire Music Festival last weekend found two of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's players back in their places after a season's absence. They had been taking part in an experiment that they felt was invaluable yet might die on the vine.

The origins of the experiment go back to the thinking of George Zazofsky, one of the orchestra's first violinists, who had long believed that his colleagues deserved a sabbatical as a refresher after years of routine work. Realizing the impracticalities involved; he conceived a related plan. Why not exchange two of Boston's string players for two from a foreign orchestra? A Japanese ensemble, where the organization was young but the players experienced, seemed a useful choice all around.

At first the project did not look expensive. Zazofsky approached the State Department, which was enthusiastic. Bureaucracy being what it is, no proper category for advancing money for the Bostonian's purpose could be found. The Department was able, in the end, to furnish four round-trip tickets — one for each player — and a 140-pound allowance for extra baggage. The Bostonians would get their regular salary, the Japanese theirs — from the Japan Philharmonic Orchestra.

Two Bostonians were willing to make the financial sacrifice involved in going and taking their families with them: Robert Karol, a violist, with a wife and two children; Richard Kapuscinski, a cellist, with a wife and three children. Since the cost of living in Tokyo is as high as in any other metropolis and the children had to attend private schools, the trip proved exhorbitant for the two instrumentalists, so much so as to discourage future volunteers.

Yet, in discussing the experience last Sunday just before the afternoon concert at Tanglewood, both Karol and Kapuscinski spoke not of the financial hardships but of what they thought had been achieved. Karol took his opposite number's place in the Tokyo orchestra. In his very first day there, on entering for rehearsal, he was greeted by one of the local violists, who pointed to a passage in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Karol realized that he was being asked for the fingering.

During the season, all the violists rotated seats so that each could have a chance to work with Karol, a procedure that worked with Kapuscinski, too. What they feel they contributed to the situation besides performance details were out-and-out instruction and a sense of traditional stylistic playing values to an orchestra only 10 years old. Regular patrons in the audience could observe the byplay and relaxed attitudes between the Japanese and American players. For their part, the two Boston musicians' wives were active in useful ways, in elementary education, teaching English, or helping handicapped children.

How did the Bostonians profit? Some of it was a matter of personality, of finding out about oneself in a new environment. Each had opportunities for solo work that he might not have had at home. Kapuscinski gave a Beethoven cello and piano sonata recital with a Mrs. Mikimoto, which as a benefit enabled some music students to go to the United States. In turn, the College Women's Association of Tokyo commissioned a piece for Kapuscinski, for cello and prepared piano, by Jogi Yuasa.

*

Musicians being gregarious and able to communicate in their own special language, it was easier for the two Boston players to enter into the social life of their Japanese colleagues than for most Americans living abroad. It took some time, of course, but after they had been in Tokyo for a while they realized suddenly that they were no longer on a formal basis with their hosts. As Karol put it, "The value of our being in Japan with our families was, I think, incalculable. For a very small investment there was an enormous profit in the human element."

And what of the Japanese players here? The violist was Konosuke Ono, whose wife was left behind because she was expecting her first baby. It was born during the father's absence. The cellist, Soichi Katsuta, was a bachelor. Obviously they must have learned much from playing in an orchestra of the caliber of the Boston Symphony. Ono also studied Walter Piston's Viola Concerto with the composer so that he could play it when he got back home.

Getting back to where the idea began — George Zazofsky — he thinks the recent experiment should justify a very broad international exchange, with many musicians from many American orchestras swapping places with their colleagues in countries in Asia, in Africa when practical and in Europe where performance tradition is not too inflexible.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

SEP 28 1967 New England Newsclip

(UPI Telephoto)

SYMPHONY-JAPAN PHILHARMONIC exchange brought Akaboshi (second left) and Toshiyuki Kikkawa (right) to Boston Symphony for a year. Two of BSO members will play in Tokyo. At left is violinist Harry Ellis Dickson. Also shown is violinist George Zazofsky, who initiated the exchange.

CULTURAL CENTER

108

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

APR 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Hands across a racial barrier

In these times of racial tension and turmoil, even the smallest gesture of conciliation between whites and blacks is cause for satisfaction.

That the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston has now given a million dollars worth of land and buildings in Roxbury over to the black community for $1, for educational and artistic purposes, must therefore be considered grounds for prayerful and universal rejoicing.

The former Temple Mishkan and School property, once the center of Conservative Judaism in Boston, will soon be the site of an experimental, community-directed public school, a museum of black art, and a drama center and school for the performing arts, the latter to be operated by Miss Elma Lewis, a noted black teacher of drama and the dance.

Of great significance also is the concurrent announcement that the art museum will be set up at the property by the Museum of Fine Arts and will have a black curator, and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will provide free pop concerts this Summer in Franklin Park.

The school will be set up with state and private support by the non-profit Committee for Community Educational Development (C.C.E.D.) and will ultimately attract some 2000 students from six communities, including the black neighborhoods, Brookline and Cambridge.

The importance of this cross-cultural gift cannot be underestimated. "These buildings," as Pres. Bernard D. Grossman of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies observed, "have long stood as a majestic expression of our religious heritage. We sincerely hope that they will continue to serve as a common bond that unites all men, that they will be a source of pride and their future use a source of inspiration to our entire community."

Who can doubt that these hopes will be fully justified, and that this gift will stand as a perpetual testament to the brotherhood of all men?

HERALD (e)
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
CIRC. 32,400

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Jews Financing Cultural Center For Hub Negroes

BOSTON (UPI) — A unique Negro cultural and educational center is being planned here following the transfer of $1.125 million worth of property to the residents of the city's mostly Negro Roxbury section.

The center will include a 2,000-pupil experimental school funded by the state and run by the community, a Negro art museum and a drama center.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston bought the two major buildings in Roxbury and Wednesday turned them over to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts in Roxbury on behalf of the community for $1. The two buildings, a temple and a 20-room school, officially will be turned over July 1.

To Open Next Year

The experimental "metropolitan" school is scheduled to open in September 1969 and will be the first of three experimental state-supported schools authorized by legislation enacted last year.

The school will be operated by the non-profit Committee for Community Educational Development (CCED) which is hopeful of additional financial support from the Ford Foundation, Paul Parks, CCED president said Wednesday.

The integrated facility will house children between the ages of 3 to 18 from at least three and possibly six neighboring communities.

The drama center and school for performing arts will be run by Miss Lewis who has taught in Roxbury for more than 15 years. She announced Wednesday the Boston Pops Orchestra will play three concerts in Roxbury's Franklin Park this summer featuring black artists. Several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra also have offered free tutoring in their individual instruments for interested Negro children, she said.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. [illegible]

APR 20 1968 New England Newsclip

Giant Step

BOSTON THIS WEEK has taken a giant step to surmount racial barriers, to ease tensions, to promote good will in the transfer of the former Temple Mishkan Tefila and School in Roxbury to the city's black community.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston has estimated that the land and buildings are valued at more than $1 million. The purchase price was $1. The properties are to be used as a community supervised public school, as a museum of black art, as a center for the performing arts to be directed by Miss Elma Lewis, a black teacher of dance and drama, who has established an enviable reputation in her field.

In addition, announcement has been made that the Museum of Fine Arts will initiate the art museum, which will be in charge of a black curator, and that free summer pop concerts will be given in Franklin Park this summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All members of both communities who worked so conscientiously to make possible this property and cultural exchange deserve the highest credit. Their achievement should be a source of pride and inspiration not only to Greater Boston but to all America.

There is more involved here than the simple transfer of a physical plant and more, too, than the mere exchange of cultural gifts. These are but the outward signs. Of far greater significance is the climate of understanding which made it possible, and the atmosphere of co-operation in which, let us hope, we can continue to develop further moves to build peace, harmony and progress.

ENTERPRISE (E)
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
CIRC. 4600

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Cultural And Educational Center Set For Negroes

BOSTON (UPI) — A unique Negro cultural and educational center is being planned here following the transfer of $1.125 million worth of property to the residents of the city's mostly Negro Roxbury section.

The center will include a 2,000-pupil experimental school funded by the state and run by the community, a Negro art museum and a drama center.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston bought the two major buildings in Roxbury and Wednesday turned them over to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts in Roxbury on behalf of the community for $1. The two buildings, a temple and a 20-room school, officially will be turned over July 1.

The experimental "metropolitan" school is scheduled to open in September 1969 and will be the first of three experimental state-supported schools authorized by legislation enacted last year.

The school will be operoted by the non-profit Committee for Community Educational Development (CCED) which is hopeful of additional financial support from the Ford Foundation, Paul Parks, CCED president said Wednesday.

The integrated facility will house children between the ages of 3 to 18 from at least three and possibly six neighboring communities.

The drama center and school for performing arts will be run by Miss Lewis who has taught in Roxbury for more than 15 years. She announced Wednesday the Boston Pops Orchestra will play three concerts in Roxbury's Franklin Park this summer featuring black artists. Several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra also have offered free tutoring in their individual instruments for interested Negro children, she said.

The Boston Museum of Fine Arts will set up the "black art" museum with a black curator. The facility is expected to open by early fall with an exhibit by five Negro artists.

In announcing the plans for the center, Miss Lewis said, "We'll be a beacon light in America as to what art should be in America."

More than 70 Roxbury organizations and prominent citizens, including both conservative and militant Negro groups, have endorsed the plan.

R. I. HERALD
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,000

APR 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Temple Given To Negro Community For Cultural Use

BOSTON — A temple and a school that once served as a center for Conservative Judaism in Boston have been sold for $1 to the Negro community for use as a cultural facility.

The temple, formerly housing the Congregation Mishkan Tefila, and the school were appraised at $1,125,000 by the combined Jewish philanthropies. They were sold to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts. The property is situated in the Roxbury district, a slum area of the city.

Miss Lewis, a Negro drama and arts teacher for 15 years, said the proposed drama and arts center would be the first of its kind in the nation. She also said that the Boston Museum of Fine Arts would set up an art gallery with a Negro curator at the center. The gallery is expected to be opened in the fall with an exhibition of the work of Negro artists.

In addition, Miss Lewis said, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will provide free pop concerts in the summer in nearby Franklin Park, a city facility.

By the fall of 1969, Miss Lewis said, the school will house temporarily an integrated public school, the first of three experimental state-supported schools authorized by legislation passed last fall. With state financing, the school will be operated by representatives of the Negro community instead of the Boston School Committee.

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,050

APR 18 1968 New England Newsclip

$1M Hub Property Gift To Spark Negro Center

BOSTON (UPI) — A unique Negro cultural and educational center is being planned here following the transfer of $1.125 million worth of property to the residents of the city's mostly Negro Roxbury section.

The center will include a 2,000-pupil experimental school funded by the state and run by the community, a Negro art museum and a drama center.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston bought the two major buildings in Roxbury and Wednesday turned them over to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts in Roxbury on behalf of the community for $1. The two buildings, a temple and a 20-room school, officially will be turned over July 1.

The experimental "metropolitan" school is scheduled to open in September 1969 and will be the first of three experimental state-supported schools authorized by legislation enacted last year.

The school will be operated by the non-profit Committee for Community Educational Development (CCED) which is hopeful of additional financial support from the Ford Foundation Paul Parks, CCED president said Wednesday.

The integrated facility will house children between the ages of 3 to 18 from at least three and possibly six neighboring communities.

The drama center and school for performing arts will be run by Miss Lewis who has taught in Roxbury for more than 15 years. She announced Wednesday the Boston Pops Orchestra will play three concerts in Roxbury's Franklin Park this summer featuring black artists. Several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra also have offered free tutoring in their individual instruments for interested Negro children, she said.

The Boston Museum of Fine Arts will set up the "black art" museum with a black curator. The facility is expected to open by early fall with an exhibit by five Negro artists.

In announcing the plans for the center, Miss Lewis said, "We'll be a beacon light in America as to what art should be in America."

109

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 254,100

APR 18 1968

New England Newsclip

$1 Million Gift of Jewish Group

Negro Art School Given 2 Buildings

By ALAN LUPO
Staff Reporter

Two buildings that once served as a center for Conservative Judaism in Boston were given to the black community Wednesday for use as a cultural facility and as temporary headquarters for the nation's first state-supported public school.

The former Temple Mishkan Tefila and School at Seaver street and Elm Hill avenue, Roxbury, appraised by the Combined Jewish Philanthropies at $1,125,000, was sold to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts for $1.

ELMA LEWIS

The transaction ended two years of negotiations between black community leaders and Jewish organizations.

Both Miss Lewis, a drama and dance instructor in Roxbury, and C.J.P. spokesmen said the donation and the proposed drama and art center were the first of their kind in the nation.

BUILDINGS Page 21 7

Lewis School

school, now New England Hebrew Academy, were of Fine Arts in Roxbury.

'Children...Damaged by System'

★ BUILDINGS
Continued from Page 1

Miss Lewis said she will develop a "Drama Center and School for the Performing Arts."

At a press conference in Dorchester, she announced that the Museum of Fine Arts will set up a black arts museum with a black curator in one of the two structures. The museum is expected to open by early Fall with an exhibit by five black artists.

She said the Boston Symphony Orchestra will provide free pop concerts this Summer in Franklin Park, and "We have talked in terms of black soloists." The orchestra also has discussed a "management trainee" program and Tanglewood scholarships for young black musicians.

"Some orchestra members have offered to teach their instruments at their own expense to any serious child," she said. About 50 black and white citizens attending the press conference applauded.

RUN BY STATE

By the Fall of 1969, the school building is to house temporarily an integrated public school, the first of three experimental state-supported schools authorized by legislation passed last year. The school will be financed with state funds and will be run by the community, not the Boston School Committee.

It will be set up by the nonprofit Committee for Community Educational Development (C.C.E.D.) and ultimately will attract 2000 students from six communities, including the black neighborhoods, Brookline and Cambridge.

"What we are talking about is how to educate children," Paul Parks, C.C.E.D. president and aide to Mayor Kevin H. White, said. "I don't think we know how. Too many children are now being damaged by the system."

CHANGING TIMES

The synagogue includes a sanctuary with social halls. The school contains 20 classrooms, an auditorium-gymnasium and a kitchen. They have been used for 10 years by the New England Hebrew Academy, which is moving to Brookline. About 300 Greater Boston Jewish youngsters now attend classes there.

Sources said little progress had been made in negotiations until about two months ago, when the C.J.P. stepped in and began raising $200,000 to pay for the mortgage, some repairs and some moving costs for the academy.

The temple, built in 1925, had become a "Stadt Shul," a central synagogue that attracted not only worshipers and students but also leaders in Judaism and government, but the temple gave way to changing times and a changing neighborhood.

By the late 1940s and early 1950s, many members were leaving Roxbury and Dorchester for suburbia. In 1958, the congregation formally followed them and dedicated a new temple in Newton. The old property was sold for $100,000 to the Lubavitz Yeshivah, which subsequently became the New England Hebrew Academy.

In recent months, sources in the Jewish community said, the temple has been subject to some neglect and vandalism.

"These buildings have long stood as a majestic expression of our religious heritage," Bernard D. Grossman, C.J.P. president, declared.

"We sincerely hope that they will continue to serve as a symbol of the common bond that unites all men, that they will be a source of pride and their future use a source of inspiration to our entire community."

Miss Lewis, who has taught more than 15 years in Roxbury, predicted: "We'll be a beacon light in America as to what art should be in America."

Eli Goldston, president of Eastern Gas & Fuel Associates and a supporter of Miss Lewis's efforts, said after the press conference:

"There's no place in the community where 500 people can get together. If there's no place to do constructive things, you're in trouble, and that was the point used to sell this idea. If you can get together only on the street, then you've got trouble."

Miss Lewis, a gregarious, straight-talking woman who enjoys the support of both moderates and militants, said she is out to get $6 million to $7 million "to be self-sustaining."

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

APR 19 1968

New England Newsclip

WORKING TOGETHER

An exciting development in human relations has occurred in Boston with the gift of two buildings from the combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston to the Negro community.

The buildings will be used for cultural and educational facilities, including the first of three state experimental schools authorized by legislation and regarded as a pioneering enterprise in American education.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies have made a magnificent gift in conveying the former Temple Mishkan Tefila and school in Roxbury, appraised at $1,125,000, to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts Inc. One of the buildings will house a Drama Center and School for the Performing Arts, and there will be a museum featuring works of black artists.

Moreover, two of Boston's most distinguished cultural institutions, the Museum of Fine Arts and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will participate in the cultural enterprise. The Museum of Fine Arts will bring to the new cultural center various exhibits and displays, beginning with an exhibition by black artists.

The Boston Symphony has scheduled three pops concerts for Franklin Park this summer, and has discussed a management trainee program for Negroes and Tanglewood scholarships for young Negro musicians. A number of orchestra members also have offered to give free lessons at the cultural center to seriously interested Negro students.

"Children in this area see little beauty where they are," according to Miss Lewis, a Negro drama and dance teacher who has taught in Roxbury for more than 15 years. Her judgment is supported by the recent report of the state Council on the Arts and Humanities which found, however, "an artistic and intellectual ferment" in Roxbury. Hopefully, the new cultural center will provide both a place for enrichment and creativity in Roxbury, as well as a strong new contribution to Boston's over-all artistic life.

An equally exciting venture is the new school to be created under the state Board of Education by the Committee for Community Educational Development headed by Paul Parks, committee president and administrator of Boston's model city program. The school will be integrated, with an eventual enrollment of about 2,000 students from six communities. Financial aid is expected from the Ford Foundation.

The school will not be under the jurisdiction of the Boston School Committee, but rather established under the state Board of Education and operated by Mr. Parks' committee. The new state experimental schools are designed to try to find answers to vexing educational problems and to improve teaching techniques.

According to Sen. Kevin Harrington, D-Salem, who was chairman of the Willis-Harrington report on education in Massachusetts, "the idea was to use this new system, first of its kind in the nation, to find out why we are not making progress in these grades that many believe we should.

"The new system would have a mixture of students not possible under the present sytem, in which classes are composed of students from approximately the same economic, ethnic and religious backgrounds. The proposed classes would have youngsters from high, middle and low-income families of different racial extractions and from Protestant, Catholic and Jewish families," Senator Harrington has pointed out.

"In this way, we hope to come up with the answers to questions which have interested educators everywhere. For instance, why do some youngsters from low economic backgrounds make a success of education while others with a much better economic background fail? Why do some students with a comparatively high IQ become dropouts . . .? Can we design a system in which children of diverse backgrounds and upbringing can be placed in the educational melting-pot and prove that with the right teachers, the correct curricula and the proper surroundings they can be educated?"

It is fitting that the first of these schools be located in a Negro neighborhood, in a school building donated by a Jewish group. This gift, the cooperation of community leaders and community institutions, demonstrates what can and should be done to cut across the unfortunate ethnic, social, religious, and economic borders which have been allowed to separate citizens of Boston.

This combined venture does not solve the immense and complex problems of our urban community, but it is a major step forward and a beacon for others to follow.

2d Harvard Man Joins Black School

By WILLIAM FRIPP
Staff Reporter

New England Newsclip

TEMPLE MISHKAN TEFILA at left and its former school, now New England Hebrew Academy, were acquired yesterday for $1 by the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts in Roxbury.

'Children...Damaged by System'

★ BUILDINGS

Continued from Page 1

Miss Lewis said she will develop a "Drama Center and School for the Performing Arts."

At a press conference in Dorchester, she announced that the Museum of Fine Arts will set up a black arts museum with a black curator in one of the two structures. The museum is expected to open by early Fall with an exhibit by five black artists.

She said the Boston Symphony Orchestra will provide free pop concerts this Summer in Franklin Park, and "We have talked in terms of black soloists." The orchestra also has discussed a "management trainee" program and Tanglewood scholarships for young black musicians.

"Some orchestra members have offered to teach their instruments at their own expense to any serious child," she said. About 50 black and white citizens attending the press conference applauded.

RUN BY STATE

By the Fall of 1969, the school building is to house temporarily an integrated public school, the first of three experimental state-supported schools authorized by legislation passed last year. The school will be financed with state funds and will be run by the community, not the Boston School Committee.

It will be set up by the nonprofit Committee for Community Educational Development (C.C.E.D.) and ultimately will attract 2000 students from six communities, including the black neighborhoods, Brookline and Cambridge.

"What we are talking about is how to educate children," Paul Parks, C.C.E.D. president and aide to Mayor Kevin H. White, said. "I don't think we know how. Too many children are now being damaged by the system."

CHANGING TIMES

The synagogue includes a sanctuary with social halls. The school contains 20 classrooms, an auditorium-gymnasium and a kitchen. They have been used for 10 years by the New England Hebrew Academy, which is moving to Brookline. About 300 Greater Boston Jewish youngsters now attend classes there.

Sources said little progress had been made in negotiations until about two months ago, when the C.J.P. stepped in and began raising $200,000 to pay for the mortgage, some repairs and some moving costs for the academy.

The temple, built in 1925, had become a "Stadt Shul," a central synagogue that attracted not only worshipers and students but also leaders in Judaism and government, but the temple gave way to changing times and a changing neighborhood.

By the late 1940s and early 1950s, many members were leaving Roxbury and Dorchester for suburbia. In 1958, the congregation formally followed them and dedicated a new temple in Newton. The old property was sold for $100,000 to the Lubavitz Yeshivah, which subsequently became the New England Hebrew Academy.

In recent months, sources in the Jewish community said, the temple has been subject to some neglect and vandalism.

"These buildings have long stood as a majestic expression of our religious heritage," Bernard D. Grossman, C.J.P. president, declared.

"We sincerely hope that they will continue to serve as a symbol of the common bond that unites all men, that they will be a source of pride and their future use a source of inspiration to our entire community."

Miss Lewis, who has taught more than 15 years in Roxbury, predicted: "We'll be a beacon light in America as to what art should be in America."

Eli Goldston, president of Eastern Gas & Fuel Associates and a supporter of Miss Lewis's efforts, said after the press conference:

"There's no place in the community where 500 people can get together. If there's no place to do constructive things, you're in trouble, and that was the point used to sell this idea. If you can get together only on the street, then you've got trouble."

Miss Lewis, a gregarious, straight-talking woman who enjoys the support of both moderates and militants, said she is out to get $6 million to $7 million "to be self-sustaining."

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

APR 19 1968

New England Newsclip

WORKING TOGETHER

An exciting development in human relations has occurred in Boston with the gift of two buildings from the combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston to the Negro community.

The buildings will be used for cultural and educational facilities, including the first of three state experimental schools authorized by legislation and regarded as a pioneering enterprise in American education.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies have made a magnificent gift in conveying the former Temple Mishkan Tefila and school in Roxbury, appraised at $1,125,000, to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts Inc. One of the buildings will house a Drama Center and School for the Performing Arts, and there will be a museum featuring works of black artists.

Moreover, two of Boston's most distinguished cultural institutions, the Museum of Fine Arts and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will participate in the cultural enterprise. The Museum of Fine Arts will bring to the new cultural center various exhibits and displays, beginning with an exhibition by black artists.

The Boston Symphony has scheduled three pops concerts for Franklin Park this summer, and has discussed a management trainee program for Negroes and Tanglewood scholarships for young Negro musicians. A number of orchestra members also have offered to give free lessons at the cultural center to seriously interested Negro students.

"Children in this area see little beauty where they are," according to Miss Lewis, a Negro drama and dance teacher who has taught in Roxbury for more than 15 years. Her judgment is supported by the recent report of the state Council on the Arts and Humanities which found, however, "an artistic and intellectual ferment" in Roxbury. Hopefully, the new cultural center will provide both a place for enrichment and creativity in Roxbury, as well as a strong new contribution to Boston's over-all artistic life.

An equally exciting venture is the new school to be created under the state Board of Education by the Committee for Community Educational Development headed by Paul Parks, committee president and administrator of Boston's model city program. The school will be integrated, with an eventual enrollment of about 2,000 students from six communities. Financial aid is expected from the Ford Foundation.

The school will not be under the jurisdiction of the Boston School Committee, but rather established under the state Board of Education and operated by Mr. Parks' committee. The new state experimental schools are designed to try to find answers to vexing educational problems and to improve teaching techniques.

According to Sen. Kevin Harrington, D-Salem, who was chairman of the Willis-Harrington report on education in Massachusetts, "the idea was to use this new system, first of its kind in the nation, to find out why we are not making progress in these grades that many believe we should.

"The new system would have a mixture of students not possible under the present sytem, in which classes are composed of students from approximately the same economic, ethnic and religious backgrounds. The proposed classes would have youngsters from high, middle and low-income families of different racial extractions and from Protestant, Catholic and Jewish families," Senator Harrington has pointed out.

"In this way, we hope to come up with the answers to questions which have interested educators everywhere. For instance, why do some youngsters from low economic backgrounds make a success of education while others with a much better economic background fail? Why do some students with a comparatively high IQ become dropouts . . .? Can we design a system in which children of diverse backgrounds and upbringing can be placed in the educational melting-pot and prove that with the right teachers, the correct curricula and the proper surroundings they can be educated?"

It is fitting that the first of these schools be located in a Negro neighborhood, in a school building donated by a Jewish group. This gift, the cooperation of community leaders and community institutions, demonstrates what can and should be done to cut across the unfortunate ethnic, social, religious, and economic borders which have been allowed to separate citizens of Boston.

This combined venture does not solve the immense and complex problems of our urban community, but it is a major step forward and a beacon for others to follow.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 154,100
APR 18 1968
New England Newsclip

Black Boston's Miss Lewis: Art Czarina With a Needle

By MARGO MILLER
Staff Reporter

Black Boston's cultural czarina, Elma Lewis, bosses everybody — black and white alike — with poetry and satire.

At her School of Fine Arts, which found Wednesday a permanent home in the Jewish community's gift of an old Roxbury temple and yeshiva, she is likely to scold a dawlding teen-age ballerina with "Your best tempo is stop."

Or Elma Lewis will take on a traditionally white citatel, the Museum of Fine Arts, with "I stopped looking at your pictures a long time ago. I'm looking now at all that pretty green money you have. Yankee people make money at such a high level we black never see any of it. Now I've found it out on Huntington av."

The Lewis needle, in the case of the museum, has resulted in the M.F.A.'s agreeing to organize and staff a loan show of black art by black artists for Miss Lewis's new cultural center.

The Boston Symphony heard Miss Lewis call, too. Three of the orchestra's Esplanade concerts will move to Franklin Park, perhaps with black soloists. Several players have offered to teach. And, because Miss Lewis knows that everyone is not equipped for a performing career, she is dickering with B.S.O. management for a staff trainee program.

Miss Lewis calls the museum and orchestra projects community "outreach." It is one of her few jargon words. Elma is Elma, large, comfortable, in a lime green dress, urging another drink on those at the press conference but plainly stating, "What was considered good enough for us isn't good enough. I'm going to get mine." Or, on her old friend Sen. Edward Brooke, "His pace is leisurely; I'm by temperament hasty and angry." Or, "You can't cut a people off from beauty for 300 years and expect us to come up beautiful."

Elma Lewis has been an arts dynamo since the age of three. "I began with elocution lessons, as you did in those days. Piano at five. But no dance until I was 13. They didn't think ladies danced in those days."

She got a degree from Emerson College in 1943 and specialized at Boston University in the education of exceptional children. She has taught speech therapy and its natural adjunct, theater arts, at a number of Boston schools and clinics. In 1950, she opened the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts.

Lewis alumni have gone on to Broadway shows and dance companies. She has talked black non-Bostonians into teaching for her here.

"We had Pearl Primus show the children how to batik cloth. Now I could go out and buy batik, and wouldn't have cost me the $9 a yard this demonstration did, but it wouldn't have been the same." Her Boston-born staff gives classes in other of the visual and performing arts.

Last Summer Miss Lewis went outdoors for a series called Playhouse in Franklin Park. She had the name stars and the amateurs, and she intends a similar program this Summer.

Indoors, at the former Temple Mishkin Tefila property, she plans a gallery and studios for drama and dance. Existing black organizations — the Boston Negro Artists Guild, the Quill Club, the interracial Peoples Theater — will be welcome and new performing groups encouraged. She humorously draws a talent line: 'We have an 800-seat auditorium in the yeshiva (school) for the amateurs, and the pros can be in the temple building."

The lesson for black Boston is in the Biblical quote, "I am black and I am comely," Miss Lewis says, and for all-Boston, "We're finally coming to understand what we have to do for each other."

ELMA LEWIS PAYS $1 FOR MISHKAN TEFILA BUILDINGS (Paul Connell Photo)

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 190,169 SUN. 302,042
APR 22 1968

Boston Temple Sold For Dollar To Negro Group

© New York Times Service

BOSTON—A temple and a school that once served as a center for conservative Judaism in Boston has been sold for one dollar to the Negro community for use as a cultural facility.

The temple, formerly housing the Congregation Mishkan Tefila and the school were appraised at $1,125,000 by the Combined Jewish Philanthropies. They were sold to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts. The property is situated in the Roxbury District, a slum area of the city.

Miss Lewis, a Negro drama and arts teacher for 15 years, said the proposed drama and arts center would be the first of its kind in the nation. She also said that the Boston Museum of Fine Arts would set up an art gallery with a Negro curator at the center. The gallery is expected to be opened in the fall with an exhibition of Negro artists.

In addition, Miss Lewis said, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would provide free pop concerts in the summer in nearby Franklin Park, a city facility.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900
APR 18 1968
New England Newsclip

Jewish Gift Launches Negro Cultural Center

By PAUL M. GIACOBBE
Patriot Ledger Staff Reporter

BOSTON — "The value of art is not beauty, but right action," W. Somerset Maugham once said. Yesterday the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston combined right action with art when it donated two large buildings to the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts Inc. in Roxbury.

The buildings, formerly the Temple Mishkan Tefila and School at Seaver Street and Elm Hill Avenue, will be used by neighborhood residents for cultural and educational purposes.

$200,000 Donated

Bernard D. Grossman, president of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston, said that funds in excess of $200,000 were contributed by a number of individuals and foundations.

"These buildings have long stood as a majestic expression of our religious heritage," Mr. Grossman said in a letter to Miss Lewis. "It therefore seems singularly appropriate that the buildings should now announce to the world the proud heritage of Boston's black community."

The buildings have been appraised at $1,125,000, and include a sanctuary building with separate social halls, a school building with 20 classrooms, auditorium-gymnasium, and kitchen.

The school building will house an integrated academic school, currently being established under the state Board of Education by the Committee for Comunity Educational Development, headed by Paul Parks.

The gift follows months of quiet discussion between the Jewish group and Miss Elma Lewis, a Negro drama and dance teacher who has taught in Roxbury for more than 15 years.

At yesterday's ceremony, Miss Lewis said that the action "will give the American public an idea of how we must proceed and just what we must do for each other."

Miss Lewis hopes to develop a complex in which the fine arts will be taught.

'Little Beauty Here'

"Children in this area see little beauty where they are," Miss Lewis said, "because there isn't any in the streets. Anything that they learn from me will be 500 per cent better than the best."

"There is a very serious cultural gap in the black community," Miss Lewis continued. "When we came to this country we were forbidden to keep the culture that was ours, but we were given nothing to replace it."

Miss Lewis has arranged with Perry T. Rathbone, director of the Museum of Fine Arts, to bring to the new cultural center various exhibits and displays, beginning with an exhibition by black artists and black subjects

"I believe that a program of this type, where the museum extends itself into the community, is the first of its type in the nation," Mr. Rathbone said.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has also taken an interest in the Roxbury community and the new cultural center. The orchestra has scheduled three concerts for Franklin Park this summer. Also, a number of members of the orchestra have volunteered to teach at the cultural center, free of charge.

Mr. Parks, president of the CCED, said that the new school program at the center has already been given a grant by the Ford Foundation, and is confident that more money will be coming from the foundation.

"We've been fighting the school committee for a long time," Mr. Parks said, "and we thought that it was time to step back and look at the system. I don't think that under the current system we really know how to teach children. We seem to be building in the concept of racism at an early age."

'Black Is Beautiful'

"When we are through, children are going to feel that being black is beautiful," Mr. Parks said.

According to Miss Lewis, the center's most pressing need is money.

"We need endowments, not capital," she said. "Members of the community can endow a chair in our 1,500-seat theater for $500, or a chiar in the 800-seat auditorium for $300.

"We need about $6 or $7 million in endowments to be self-sustaining," she said.

In commenting on the Jewish community's gift, Miss Lewis said, "America is not a place, its a dream, and it was dreamt by black people as well as white. Black people are hostile because they haven't gotten their share."

TEMPLE MISHKAN TEFILA, at Seaver Street and Elm Hill Avenue, Roxbury, is now the property of the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts Inc. for the cultural and educational improvement of area residents.

111

RECORDINGS

BEETHOVEN PIANO CONCERTO NO 3.

NEWS
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 225,425

FEB 9 1968 New England Newsclip

The Record Cabinet

By MILTON BERLINER

I may have already mentioned the RCA Victor recording of Mozart's Delightful Opera, "Il Re Pastore," marvelously sung by Reri Grist, Lucia Popp, Arlene Saunders, Nicol a Monti and Luigi Alva, with Dennis Vaughan conducting, in inspired fashion the excellent Orchestra of Naples. But it is well worth calling attention again to this exceptional recording.

Also highly recommended new opera releases: Angel's "L'Elisir d'Amore" with Mirella Freni, Nicolai Gedda, Mario Sereni, Renato Capecchi and Angela Arena, and Molinari-Pradelli conducting the Rome Opera House Orchestra and Chorus; the RCA Victor recording of Handel's "Julius Caesare" with Maureen Forrester, Beverly Wolff, Norman Treigle, Beverly Sills, Spiro Malas, Dominic Cossa, Michael Devlin, William Beck and Julius Rudel conducting the New York City Opera Orchestra and Chorus.

* * *

Among recently received RCA Victor Stereo 8 magnetic tape cartridges are three in the field of serious music that are quite appealing: (1) the Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony performance of the Beethoven Concerto No. 3 with Artur Rubinstein as soloist; (2) Andre Previn and the London Symphony in the British composer William Walton's Symphony No. 1 plus the first symphony of Denmark's Carl Nielsen; (3) Violinist Jascha Heifetz with the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch in both the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor and the Prokofieff G Minor Concerto. The loud click marking the switching from one to the other of the four channels in each cartridge takes a little getting use to, but aside from that the three are excellent.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

OCT 1967

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 3 in C minor, Op. 37; Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2947, $4.79, or Stereo, LSC-2947, $5.79.

Brendel, Wallberg	Vox S-511370
A. Fischer, Fricsay	Hel. S-25001
Fleisher, Szell	Epic BC-1138
Gould, Bernstein	Col. MS-6096
Krauss, Rivoli	Mon. S-2092
Schnabel, Dobrowen	Ang. COLH-3

(8)AT first I thought this was going to be homogenized and impersonal. It is not. What gave rise to this fear was the bland "sf" at measure 6. Then, too, the drum rhythm at measure 10 is buried by the timpanist's very soft playing. However, as the orchestral exposition unfolds it becomes clear that Leinsdorf is deliberately seeking to play down the drama. This is not to say that he is lyric in his outlook, as Bernstein is in his recording. Leinsdorf's is merely a romantic (and very lush) view of the work; i.e., he enjoys wallowing in favorite spots. Rubinstein's entry brings more liveliness, but his approach also is highly personal. This shows nicely in the cadenza, which is within the proper framework but has two striking differences. The first comes where Beethoven changes the tempo to Presto. Instead of playing forte, as written, Rubinstein plays softly and crescendoes until he reaches forte six measures later. Further on he doubles a scale passage, which is fine while it lasts but seems incongruous as it leads into a trill and then a double trill. Traditionally the second movement is either contemplative or classically cool. Rubinstein's is neither. It is very individual (the phrasing particularly so), and Leinsdorf follows suit. The bassoons have a slightly French nasality about them (cf. measures 40-49). The only place that bothers me in this movement is near the end (p. 68 in Eulenburg). Though no tempo for this specified section is indicated, it seems to me that these measures must be taken slowly. This can be accomplished also by taking Beethoven's Larghetto marking at face value and choosing a slow tempo for the whole movement. Rubinstein does select a slow tempo, but speeds up as he goes along. Thus, though the passage work at this point may be very fleet, it is quite out of place. The finale, however, is delightfully exuberant. Leinsdorf and Rubinstein breathe life into nearly every measure, and the soloist's expressivity is kept within reasonable bounds. The change to Presto at the end comes a little later than it should, but this coda is still very good. Leinsdorf carefully brings forth the winds' line from 423 through 435, and this is a joy. By then, too, Leinsdorf's "sf's" have plenty of vitality.

The sound quality throughout is better than that of some other recent BSO releases. The winds are clearer, though two instruments are still occasionally too far back: trumpet and oboe. The latter's absence is regrettable at measures 439-40 in the finale, where the rising figure is scored for French horns, bassoons, and oboes. Without the pungent oboes these four chords are too soft. In the first movement, the chords which punctuate the piano's scales at measures 250-51 are virtually inaudible. But the bass is clearer than it has been sometimes (e.g., the marvelous feeling from the low A flats in cellos and basses at measures 376-380 in the finale). The highs are also sharper (especially when only timpani, brass, and woodwinds are playing).

Such an individual performance as this really must be heard by any prospective purchaser. The approach is definitely unorthodox, but much of it is quite successful and satisfying. If one is looking for more traditional work I would suggest Brendel, Annie Fischer, or Krauss. For me, the more profound accounts are by Schnabel and Fleisher. The Gould-Bernstein performance is a lyrical one but not without its taut moments. —M.N.K.

TAPE RECORDING
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 23,000

JAN 1968

Beethoven

Piano Concerto No. 3 in c. Arthur Rubinstein, Boston Symphony Orch. cond. Leinsdorf. RCA Victor R8S-1084, 8-track cartridge, $6.95.

Music	★★★★
Performance	★★★★
Recording	★★★★

Tape cartridge manufacturers have not dealt kindly with the classical tape buyer. The record buyer can choose from among 22 performances of this concerto. If you own a reel-to-reel recorder, there are four versions to choose from. But if you're an eight-track cartridge owner, this recording is it. Not that that's so bad—Rubinstein is a master of this music, and he receives warm support from Erich Leinsdorf and the Bostonians. Here is a lyrically beautiful performance which stands out even among those 22 versions on record. To top it off, there is the spacious sound of Symphony Hall typical of recent BSO recordings. Highly recommended.

The only demurrer—and it seems a small thing when you consider what the classical music lover has to choose from in cartridges—is the splitting of the first movement over two tracks, with that annoying click in the middle. Nevertheless, Victor has held the breaks to a minimum by assigning the Largo and Rondo to their own separate tracks rather than evening off the playing times of each track. Sound on our RCA Stereo 8 Player was as good as an equivalent-priced record playback system. —R.A.

Boston Pops

Stan Getz & Arthur Fiedler At Tanglewood. Includes: Three Ballads for Stan; the Girl from Ipanema; A Song After Sundown; Where Do You Go?; Love Is For the Very Young; Tanglewood Concerto. Getz, Boston Pops cond. Fiedler. RCA Victor R85-1082 8-track cartridge $6.95.

Music	★★★★
Performance	★★★★
Recording	★★★

Recorded live at Tanglewood, Mass., this tape has the usual technical shortcomings. The acoustics are a bit dead, and the intrusion of audience sounds can be a bit of a nuisance. Additionally, RCA's engineers have given Getz a larger-than-life perspective so that he occasionally overpowers the orchestra. These shortcomings notwithstanding, this is an attractive tape. The major work, Eddie Sauter's Tanglewood Concerto, is engaging from beginning to end. Since the demise of the Sauter-Finnegan orchestra, little has been done with "Third Stream" jazz—a merging of classical and jazz idioms—but this tape may well mark its re-emergence. Alec Wilder also has written two shorter works for Getz, the three-part "Ballads for Stan" and "Where Do You Go?". All are attractive additions to Getz's already wide range of accomplishments. —M.E.

111

RECORDINGS

BEETHOVEN PIANO CONCERTO NO 3.

NEWS
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 225,425

FEB 9 1968 New England Newsclip

The Record Cabinet

By MILTON BERLINER

I may have already mentioned the RCA Victor recording of Mozart's Delightful Opera, "Il Re Pastore," marvelously sung by Reri Grist, Lucia Popp, Arlene Saunders, Nicol a Monti and Luigi Alva, with Dennis Vaughan conducting, in inspired fashion the excellent Orchestra of Naples. But it is well worth calling attention again to this exceptional recording.

Also highly recommended new opera releases: Angel's "L'Elisir d'Amore" with Mirella Freni, Nicolai Gedda, Mario Sereni, Renato Capecchi and Angela Arena, and Molinari-Pradelli conducting the Rome Opera House Orchestra and Chorus; the RCA Victor recording of Handel's "Julius Caesare" with Maureen Forrester, Beverly Wolff, Norman Treigle, Beverly Sills, Spiro Malas, Dominic Cossa, Michael Devlin, William Beck and Julius Rudel conducting the New York City Opera Orchestra and Chorus.

* * *

Among recently received RCA Victor Stereo 8 magnetic tape cartridges are three in the field of serious music that are quite appealing: (1) the Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony performance of the Beethoven Concerto No. 3 with Artur Rubinstein as soloist; (2) Andre Previn and the London Symphony in the British composer William Walton's Symphony No. 1 plus the first symphony of Denmark's Carl Nielsen; (3) Violinist Jascha Heifetz with the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch in both the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor and the Prokofieff G Minor Concerto. The loud click marking the switching from one to the other of the four channels in each cartridge takes a little getting use to, but aside from that the three are excellent.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

OCT 1967

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 3 in C minor, Op. 37; Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2947, $4.79, or Stereo, LSC-2947, $5.79.

Brendel, Wallberg	Vox S-511370
A. Fischer, Fricsay	Hel. S-25001
Fleisher, Szell	Epic BC-1138
Gould, Bernstein	Col. MS-6096
Krauss, Rivoli	Mon. S-2092
Schnabel, Dobrowen	Ang. COLH-3

(S)AT first I thought this was going to be homogenized and impersonal. It is not. What gave rise to this fear was the bland "sf" at measure 6. Then, too, the drum rhythm at measure 10 is buried by the timpanist's very soft playing. However, as the orchestral exposition unfolds it becomes clear that Leinsdorf is deliberately seeking to play down the drama. This is not to say that he is lyric in his outlook, as Bernstein is in his recording. Leinsdorf's is merely a romantic (and very lush) view of the work; i.e., he enjoys wallowing in favorite spots. Rubinstein's entry brings more liveliness, but his approach also is highly personal. This shows nicely in the cadenza, which is within the proper framework but has two striking differences. The first comes where Beethoven changes the tempo to Presto. Instead of playing forte, as written, Rubinstein plays softly and crescendoes until he reaches forte six measures later. Further on he doubles a scale passage, which is fine while it lasts but seems incongruous as it leads into a trill and then a double trill. Traditionally the second movement is either contemplative or classically cool. Rubinstein's is neither. It is very individual (the phrasing particularly so), and Leinsdorf follows suit. The bassoons have a slightly French nasality about them (cf. measures 40-49). The only place that bothers me in this movement is near the end (p. 68 in Eulenburg). Though no tempo for this specified section is indicated, it seems to me that these measures must be taken slowly. This can be accomplished also by taking Beethoven's Larghetto marking at face value and choosing a slow tempo for the whole movement. Rubinstein does select a slow tempo, but speeds up as he goes along. Thus, though the passage work at this point may be very fleet, it is quite out of place. The finale, however, is delightfully exuberant. Leinsdorf and Rubinstein breathe life into nearly every measure, and the soloist's expressivity is kept within reasonable bounds. The change to Presto at the end comes a little later than it should, but this coda is still very good. Leinsdorf carefully brings forth the winds' line from 423 through 435, and this is a joy. By then, too, Leinsdorf's "sf's" have plenty of vitality.

The sound quality throughout is better than that of some other recent BSO releases. The winds are clearer, though two instruments are still occasionally too far back: trumpet and oboe. The latter's absence is regrettable at measures 439-40 in the finale, where the rising figure is scored for French horns, bassoons, and oboes. Without the pungent oboes these four chords are too soft. In the first movement, the chords which punctuate the piano's scales at measures 250-51 are virtually inaudible. But the bass is clearer than it has been sometimes (e.g., the marvelous feeling from the low A flats in cellos and basses at measures 376-380 in the finale). The highs are also sharper (especially when only timpani, brass, and woodwinds are playing).

Such an individual performance as this really must be heard by any prospective purchaser. The approach is definitely unorthodox, but much of it is quite successful and satisfying. If one is looking for more traditional work I would suggest Brendel, Annie Fischer, or Krauss. For me, the more profound accounts are by Schnabel and Fleisher. The Gould-Bernstein performance is a lyrical one but not without its taut moments. —M.N.K.

TAPE RECORDING
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 23,000

JAN 1968

Beethoven

Piano Concerto No. 3 in c. Arthur Rubinstein, Boston Symphony Orch. cond. Leinsdorf. RCA Victor R8S-1084, 8-track cartridge, $6.95.

Music	★★★★
Performance	★★★★
Recording	★★★★

Tape cartridge manufacturers have not dealt kindly with the classical tape buyer. The record buyer can choose from among 22 performances of this concerto. If you own a reel-to-reel recorder, there are four versions to choose from. But if you're an eight-track cartridge owner, this recording is it. Not that that's so bad—Rubinstein is a master of this music, and he receives warm support from Erich Leinsdorf and the Bostonians. Here is a lyrically beautiful performance which stands out even among those 22 versions on record. To top it off, there is the spacious sound of Symphony Hall typical of recent BSO recordings. Highly recommended.

The only demurrer—and it seems a small thing when you consider what the classical music lover has to choose from in cartridges—is the splitting of the first movement over two tracks, with that annoying click in the middle. Nevertheless, Victor has held the breaks to a minimum by assigning the Largo and Rondo to their own separate tracks rather than evening off the playing times of each track. Sound on our RCA Stereo 8 Player was as good as an equivalent-priced record playback system. —R.A.

Boston Pops

Stan Getz & Arthur Fiedler At Tanglewood. Includes: Three Ballads for Stan; the Girl from Ipanema; A Song After Sundown; Where Do You Go?; Love Is For the Very Young; Tanglewood Concerto. Getz, Boston Pops cond. Fiedler. RCA Victor R8S-1082 8-track cartridge $6.95.

Music	★★★★
Performance	★★★★
Recording	★★★

Recorded live at Tanglewood, Mass., this tape has the usual technical shortcomings. The acoustics are a bit dead, and the intrusion of audience sounds can be a bit of a nuisance. Additionally, RCA's engineers have given Getz a larger-than-life perspective so that he occasionally overpowers the orchestra. These shortcomings notwithstanding, this is an attractive tape. The major work, Eddie Sauter's Tanglewood Concerto, is engaging from beginning to end. Since the demise of the Sauter-Finnegan orchestra, little has been done with "Third Stream" jazz—a merging of classical and jazz idioms—but this tape may well mark its re-emergence. Alec Wilder also has written two shorter works for Getz, the three-part "Ballads for Stan" and "Where Do You Go?". All are attractive additions to Getz's already wide range of accomplishments. —M.E.

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY NO 7

112

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 137,868
NOV 11 1967

Leinsdorf Begins Project Beethoven

Erich Leinsdorf

By Mark A. Stuart

IN 1970 Ludwig van Beethoven will be 200 years old. If you don't believe he's still alive listen to the Boston Symphony play his monumental Seventh Symphony (RCA-Victor LSC 2969).

This is the first in the Project Beethoven series launched by RCA-Victor and Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston. To mark the master's 200th anniversary, Leinsdorf plans to record all the major orchestral works of Beethoven over a 3-year period. How does that grab you?

Leinsdorf remarks that the Seventh was first "unleashed" publicly during a concert at the University of Vienna Dec. 8, 1813. That word "unleashed" is the most apt phrase to use for this piece of action. It strains to be free from the opening notes and bursts its bounds as you begin to rise in your seat almost with trepidation. I can imagine what it must sound like to one hearing it for the first time—hearing it for the 101st is still a shattering experience.

The full impact of Beethoven's own orchestration comes across in this recording because of a new placement of the orchestra itself and because of new microphone techniques. Leinsdorf has restored also every repeat in the work. Usually these are left out because some consider them inconsequential, but not Leinsdorf. He wants the whole ball of wax.

Everybody has his own interpretation of what Beethoven was trying to portray in the Seventh. Robert Schumann detected in the second movement the marriage ceremony of a village couple. Karl Marx saw the whole symphony as a story of Moorish knighthood, of all things. One quack conceived an entire plan of revolt, something that should have been for Marx but wasn't. Richard Wagner waxed almost hysterial in his posturing on the meaning of the symphony. He saw it as the apotheosis of the dance, a Dionysian orgy.

It was Romain Rolland who said of Wagner's rantings that yes, he thought Beethoven was inebriated, but a man intoxicated with poetry and genius, one who said to himself: "Yes, I am the Bacchus who crushes delicious nectar for mankind. It is I who give the divine frenzy to mankind."

From all this you can understand why so many have called the Seventh the most beautiful symphony in the world. It has, as Lawrence Gilman wrote:

"Beethoven patterned after Nature in setting his rhythms to a varying pace. This music is full at times of the ungovernable ecstasy of some pristine and magically recovered spring, the sudden laughter of dryads in immemorial woods, the exquisite gaiety of the vernal Earth; or it has at other times the grave pace of some commemorative ritual, evoking an elegiacal and mournful beauty, as if veils were dropped one by one on a great ceremony."

Them's heady words, brother, and not lightly writ.

Beethoven himself was infuriated by all this blather about his music and what it meant. He protested. All expositions, he felt, should be confined to characterization of the composition in general terms which could easily and correctly done by any educated musician.

But the old man was wrong. This is music too beautiful to be left to musicians or music writers. They would bury it under such wordy messages as would make the master whirl and swirl in his grave. This is music for people to listen to and dream whatever dreams their private fancies conjure.

NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, October 1, 1967

Recordings

Three of Beethoven's Seventh

By JOAN SIMMONS

That a piece of music is more than merely the written score is never more obvious than in three new recordings of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.

The interpretations of this particular symphony are more profuse than most of Beethoven's works. There are those who claim it is a celebration of Napoleon's defeats, a rustic wedding, an "apotheosis of the dance" (Wagner) or that it isn't about anything except the exuberance of creating music.

The one sure point of agreement is the mastery of rhythm encompassed in this work which is absent from all of Beethoven's earlier compositions. Whether it is merely the use of rhythm or a series of four essays about rhythm again reverts the question to what the symphony is all about if indeed it is about anything.

Of the three new releases two are new and the third a second printing of a recording made about 15 years ago. All are first class orchestras led by one firmly established conductor, one promising aspirant and one cut off in the early realization of his genius.

The first is Erich Leinsdorf leading his own Boston Symphony Orchestra for RCA Victor (2969 - LM mono, and LSC stereo,). The second is Claudio Abbado with the Vienna Philharmonic on London (CS 6510 stereo, CM 9510 mono). And the last is Guido Cantelli conducting the Philharmonia Orchestra on Angel Seraphim (60038).

To characterize each of the three interpretations in a word can be misleading but in general concept Leinsdorf is vibrant while Abbado is gently lyrical and Cantelli is insistent.

Leinsdorf subscribes to the "apotheosis of the dance" theory first expounded by Wagner. Here the distinctive rhythms are followed with a graceful sweep of motion reminiscent of the dance through the various moods and paces.

Leinsdorf is also, as of late, returning to the use of music as first transcribed by Beethoven rather than later and generally accepted versions. Last summer he was led to present the original "Fidelio" at Tanglewood and in this new Seventh Symphony recording insists upon the repeats of the major expository sections which Beethoven demanded. These repetitions are usually omitted because of the length of the work and the feeling that the repetitions were not vital to the concept of the symphony. Leinsdorf disagrees.

Abbado is a young Italian who has already won several international awards for his conducting skills beginning with the first Koussevitsky Prize in 1958 and has appeared with some of the leading world orchestras.

In his approach to the Symphony No. 7, Abbado leans toward the rustic proponents of the work although not claiming any truely programmatic meaning for the composition. His version is softer with gentle emotion missing from the other two recordings with the dance interpretation carried to the characterizations of such strains as the Scottish song, an Irish jig and a reel. It is light hearted in its exuberance, and of course accents its rhythm.

Cantelli, killed in a plane crash in 1957, was a protege of Toscanini and at the time of his death the principal conductor of La Scala, still only in the first realization of his prime.

In this recording, first released not long before his death, Cantelli drives the Philharmonia Orchestra to a powerful and insistent presentation of the rhythmic creativity which he envisions as the only authentic voice of the music.

This approach is most in keeping with the traditional concept of Beethoven's powerful symphonies—numbers 3, 5, 7 and 9—while Abbado sees it as somewhat of a sequal to the pastoral Sixth and Leinsdorf sees in it mayriad meanings from both extremes.

There is no faulting the quality of any of the recordings. If one is to be termed best such a designation is dependent upon individual preference and taste. All three present a broad variety of listening material.

While the Cantelli symphony stands alone, Leinsdorf compliments it with the "Coriolanus" Overture and Abbado selects the "Prometheus" Overture.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
FEB 25 1968
New England

Beethoven and Boston Symphony a Fine Match

THE CLASSICAL SIDE

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony make up the latest entrant to the list under Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in the current Schwann catalogue — a list which now totals 27, including as many as eleven issues of the complete nine symphonies.

The RCA Vicor disc (LSC 2969) reveals Leinsdorf in his familiar character as a linear craftsman, treating the material as it relates to the large, overall contex. Thus the rhythum of the first movement is a lightly-propelling force, not an insistent, pounding tattoo.

It is less driving than soaring or floating and avoids emphasizing aspects which might become tiresome in the repeated sections of the score (Leinsdorf takes them all, making the symphony nearly ten minutes longer than its usual duration).

IN SPITE of his making the final notes of the Allegretto's main theme distinctly staccato (causing a slight feeling) the reading has a comfortable lyric appeal — less stirring or cataclysmic than more emotion-charged renditions by, say, Bernstein, but yet solidly conceived and well performed. The recording, too, is clear-voiced.

Bernard Haitink is a man to consider. The conductor of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra is demonstrating a fine affinity for romantic scores, especially those of more far-flung proportions.

His new recording of Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony in D minor is almost certainly at the top of its class (Philips PHS 900162).

HAITINK IS capable of strong passions in the Bruckner, but he escapes impressions of harshness or abandon; he does it with a gentle insistence in tempo and rhythm, at the same time building intrinsic meaning with attention to dynamic flowing lines. Philips' recording is in full range and decent balance throughout, which is something of an achievement with Bruckner's sizeable, sometimes heavy-sounding orchestras.

That contraband recording on Everest of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 13 by the Moscow Philharmonic under Kiril Kondrashin has been released. It is contraband because it was made from a radio broadcast in apparent violation of the agreement between the USSR's Melodiya and Angel Records. More about it next week.

13

LAFAYETTE, IND.
JOURNAL AND COURIER
D. 43,500

NOV 1 1 196

Listening On Records

By FRANK ARGANBRIGHT
Journal and Courier Staff Writer

KATE SMITH is remarkable. She sounds the same as she did at her peak in the 1930s and early '40s.

She's not afraid to try the new songs either. And when Kate sings them with her strong smooth voice, she makes you sit up and take notice.

On her latest RCA Victor album, "Something Special," Kate continues her best singing. As Dean Martin says, "Kate Smith is an American institution." She sings a new song from the movie "Doctor Dolittle" called "I Think I Like You" with a spark in that voice.

KATE SMITH

Some of her other offerings on this new disc are "Born Free," "If You Leave Me Now," "Misty Blue," "Love Me Forever" and "If You're Not There." Kate does something many newer singers can't do—hold you spellbound.

Lana Cantrell comes up with a pleasant bit of vocalizing on a new RCA Victor album, "Another Shade of Land." Chuck Sagle did the clever arranging and conducting. Lana sings "Love Is Stronger Far Than We" impressively. "When You Wish Upon a Star," a sort of oldie, also is done quite well. "Two for the Road" comes up with a smile in her voice. Another oldie is "On the Good Ship Lollipop" which doesn't sound like Shirley Temple's version.

"How Sweet She Is" is the title of a new ABC album by Sheila MacRae. I must say that Sheila comes through better when you can see her. She doesn't have a terrific singing voice. Sid Feller arrangements help a lot. Anyway, Sheila comes through fairly good on "Love Letters in the Sand," "Hold Me" and "Give Me Your Kisses." She seems out of her element as a singer on most of the other songs on the disc.

If you like a little fun with good laughs, listen to "Rally 'Round the Flagg" with Fannie Flagg on an RCA Victor stereo LP. This gal does a beautiful interpretation of Lady Bird Johnson, the First Lady and her beautification ideas. Her inflections and topics on "Mrs. Johnson Speaks" is really side-splitting. It's funny without offending anyone. Her chatter on "Baseball" is hilarious too. Typical woman talk. Miss Flagg has a real style of humor, and her writers, Deanne Barkley and Arnie Kogen deserve a lot of credit. She does an excellent "Telephone Operator" skit as well as a "Susie Sweetwater Society Wedding." Her "Susie Sweetwater Theater Review" also is tops. Fannie Flagg is more than funny, she's great.

"Stan Getz Voices," a Verve LP, is a very enjoyable album to hear. It is a real change for Getz. From 20 to 40 voices sing wordless harmonic backgrounds. Getz and his golden sax always are in the foreground. Frankly, I would rather hear Getz and his small group of musicians, but with the added voices, it becomes somewhat unique. There are some excellent cuts on this disc—"I Didn't Know What Time It Was" and "Zigeuner Song." There are other fairly good items such as "Nica's Dream," "I Want To Live," "Midnight Samba" and "Darling Joe."

David Bowie looks like most other 19-year-old singers, long hair etc. On a new Deram stereo LP, I sampled some of Bowie's work and was somewhat surprised. Sometimes, one can't judge from looks. He really doesn't have a bad voice. Bowie seems to have some good musical background. Of course, he's from London. David sings very well though as is proven on his versions of "Sell Me a Coat," "Love You Till Tuesday," "Little Bombadier," "Come and Buy My Toys" and "She's Got Medals."

★ ★ ★

Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt conducts the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in a studied and sometimes brilliant performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 on a new London stereo album.

Composed in 1806 during one of the composer's contented periods of life, the symphony seems to reflect this feeling. There's a bit of humor and pleasantness throughout the work. There's plenty of energy dispensed in the final movement, and the orchestra keeps up with the tempo well. The orchestra performs Beethoven's "The Consecration of the House" overture on the second side. There's a majestic hymn-like march with lots of fanfare. It is a well performed item.

Toscanini conducts the NBC Symphony Orchestra in a very fine performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique) on an RCA Victrola album. This is another in a series of new releases of Toscanini performances, and it is well worth the price. The maestro seemed to have a way with Tchaikovsky as evidenced in this performance.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 comes up for a brilliant performance by the Boston Symphony, which seldom can do wrong, on an RCA Victor stereo LP. Erich Leinsdorf seems to have the knack for drawing the best from the orchestra, especially on Beethoven. The music is clean, fluid sounding and shapely as performed by the Bostonians under Leinsdorf. The Victor stereo is just about tops. The album side is completed with a fine performance of "Coriolan Overture," another of Beethoven's interesting overtures.

SIGHT AND SOUND
MARKETING
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1967

BEETHOVEN: Coriolan Overture; Symphony No. 7. Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orch. RCA Victor LSC 2969 (S), LM 2969 (M). Sound: well engineered; the BSO out of Symphony Hall, Boston, is almost uniquely recognizable. Music: Beethoven's ever-grand symphony that dances, and his ultimate overture; both are highly popular. Interpretation: fair. After an impressive take-off in the first movement of the symphony, Leinsdorf throttles down distressingly; too much air speed is lost for my comfort. And the great Coriolan moves ponderously. Competition: too strong for both works.

Rocky Mountain News
DENVER, COLO.
D. 191,124 SUN. 202,000

NOV 19 1967

BEAUTIFUL to behold, to listen to, to own is the RCA Victrola release of TOSCANINI: The Nine Symphonies of Beethoven from the company's Immortal Performances library.

The historic performances, recorded by Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra between March, 1938, and December, 1953, also include the Coriolan, Egmont, Prometheus and Consecration of the House overtures, Sepet, Op. 20 and Adagio & Scherzo, Op. 135.

Three of the performances, Consecration of the House, Prometheus and Adagio & Scherzo, were recorded in NBC studios—the others at Carnegie Hall.

Spotlighted in this first complete edition of eight discs in one volume besides the conductor are Eileen Farrell, soprano; Nan Merriman, mezzo-soprano; Jan Peerce, tenor; Norman Scott, bass and the Robert Shaw Chorale with Robert Shaw, director.

It takes six hours and 12 minutes to hear the volume.

Lilly

Overshadowed at present, but with a dazzling onrush of creative energy, Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra launch their project Beethoven with the RCA Victor release, BEETHOVEN: SYMPHONY NO. 7.

All of the major orchestral works of Beethoven will be recorded in stereo by the conductor and orchestra within the next three years in anticipation of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth in 1970.

Paul Lilly

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 231,000

OCT 19 1967

Beethoven: Symphony No. 7—Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC2969]. More than a dozen years ago Leinsdorf made a much admired budget-priced recording of the Beethoven 7th for Columbia's now defunct Entré label [RL6622—mono only]. It didn't have quite the white heat of Toscanini's version, but it had lots of spirit and style of its own. Leinsdorf's new recording has the same qualities—plus fine stereo sound and some of the crispest playing the Boston Symphony has ever put on records. Competitively speaking, Karajan's more volatile performance [either DGG 188806 or RCA Victor LSC 2536] comes closer to the old Toscanini, and thus will be preferred by some (including myself). But the new Leinsdorf is certain to become the favorite of many others. (R.H.)

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,050

JAN 24 1968 New England Newsclip

Concert Music

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—No one will be surprised that Joan Sutherland has recorded yet another Bellini opera. This one is Bellini's next to last, "Beatrice di Tenda," which in the 20th century opera house is no more viable than a long deceased mackarel. But it is viable enough when Miss Sutherland's dealing with the heroine's vocal lines.

It is as though the master had only her voice in mind and only her voice is capable of giving full values to his florid outpourings. No wonder Miss Sutherland has recorded so much Bellini and it is safe to predict she'll keep at it until she has done all 10 Bellini operas—provided her public's interest holds out.

It should. It's very pleasant to hear her hurtling around the Bellini trapeses even though the opera is lesser and inferior Bellini. The recording was made in a London studio, with a supporting cast well chosen for ability to be stylistically correct in an outmoded operatic form.

Te orchestra was the London Symphony with Richard Bonynge conducting (London-1384).

Yt one could wish Miss Sutherland would exercise her vocalisms more with operatic music of other centuries. Yet specialization is the fashion, perhaps imposed by impresarios. Take young Lucia Popp who in Europe and in New York last year dazzled with her expertise with Mozart. Here is her recital record. One side is devoted to Mozart. The other to Handel. Both she projects with warmth, feeling and shimmering soprano notes. She could be any prima donna's lover's sweetheart (Angel-36442).

An argument for a new recording of Beethoven's 7th Symphony is that usually it is "interpreted" in performance and by now there are as many interpretations as there are conductors. The new recording is by the Boston Symphony. Its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, justifies the argument. His interpretation is so straightforward it seems to be no interpretation at all, as though this was the 7th straight from its source, without intermediary (RCA Victor-2969).

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

DEC 1967

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 7, in A, Op. 92; Coriolan Overture, Op. 62

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2969 or LM 2969, $5.79.

A psychologist friend of mine once cited Beethoven as an obsessive-compulsive and used the finale of the Seventh Symphony to prove his point. The insistent hammering away at a single motif there admittedly makes a convincing point. Leinsdorf (with his equally obsessive propensity for literalness and order) appears determined to "normalize" the gruff, unruly composer and he nearly succeeds! In their icy way, these are remarkably accurate performances: Leinsdorf gives you the score, the whole score, and nothing but the score. Every instrumental strand has been scrupulously accounted for—but the listener himself will have to draw his own musical conclusions. Every last repeat has been meticulously observed—but where are the color and variety that would justify hearing the material played more than once? There is no annoying editorializing here, no irrational display of subjectivity, no silly old-fashioned lingering for expressive effect. The difference between fortissimo and pianissimo is purely one of decibels, not emotion. It's an okay approach if you like Beethoven cool. I don't.

Big, booming Boston recording, full of truculent reverberation but notably deficient in tonal shimmer. H.G.

13

JOURNAL AND COURIER
D. 43,[illegible]

NOV 1 [illegible]

Listening On Records

By FRANK ARGANBRIGHT
Journal and Courier Staff Writer

KATE SMITH is remarkable. She sounds the same as she did at her peak in the 1930s and early '40s.

She's not afraid to try the new songs either. And when Kate sings them with her strong smooth voice, she makes you sit up and take notice.

On her latest RCA Victor album, "Something Special," Kate continues her best singing. As Dean Martin says, "Kate Smith is an American institution." She sings a new song from the movie "Doctor Dolittle" called "I Think I Like You" with a spark in that voice.

KATE SMITH

Some of her other offerings on this new disc are "Born Free," "If You Leave Me Now," "Misty Blue," "Love Me Forever" and "If You're Not There." Kate does something many newer singers can't do—hold you spellbound.

Lana Cantrell comes up with a pleasant bit of vocalizing on a new RCA Victor album, "Another Shade of Land." Chuck Sagle did the clever arranging and conducting. Lana sings "Love Is Stronger Far Than We" impressively. "When You Wish Upon a Star," a sort of oldie, also is done quite well. "Two for the Road" comes up with a smile in her voice. Another oldie is "On the Good Ship Lollipop" which doesn't sound like Shirley Temple's version.

"How Sweet She Is" is the title of a new ABC album by Sheila MacRae. I must say that Sheila comes through better when you can see her. She doesn't have a terrific singing voice. Sid Feller arrangements help a lot. Anyway, Sheila comes through fairly good on "Love Letters in the Sand," "Hold Me" and "Give Me Your Kisses." She seems out of her element as a singer on most of the other songs on the disc.

If you like a little fun with good laughs, listen to "Rally 'Round the Flagg" with Fannie Flagg on an RCA Victor stereo LP. This gal does a beautiful interpretation of Lady Bird Johnson, the First Lady and her beautification ideas. Her inflections and topics on "Mrs. Johnson Speaks" is really side-splitting. It's funny without offending anyone. Her chatter on "Baseball" is hilarious too. Typical woman talk. Miss Flagg has a real style of humor, and her writers, Deanne Barkley and Arnie Kogen deserve lot of credit. She does an excellent "Telephone Operator" skit as well as a "Susie Sweetwater Society Wedding." Her "Susie Sweetwater Theater Review" also is tops. Fannie Flagg is more than funny, she's great.

"Stan Getz Voices," a Verve LP, is a very enjoyable album to hear. It is a real change for Getz. From 20 to 40 voices sing wordless harmonic backgrounds. Getz and his golden sax always are in the foreground. Frankly, I would rather hear Getz and his small group of musicians, but with the added voices, it becomes somewhat unique. There are some excellent cuts on this disc—"I Didn't Know What Time It Was" and "Zigeuner Song." There are other fairly good items such as "Nica's Dream," "I Want To Live," "Midnight Samba" and "Darling Joe."

David Bowie looks like most other 19-year-old singers, long hair etc. On a new Deram stereo LP, I sampled some of Bowie's work and was somewhat surprised. Sometimes, one can't judge from looks. He really doesn't have a bad voice. Bowie seems to have some good musical background. Of course, he's from London. David sings very well though as is proven on his versions of "Sell Me a Coat," "Love You Till Tuesday," "Little Bombadier," "Come and Buy My Toys" and "She's Got Medals."

★ ★ ★

Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt conducts the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in a studied and sometimes brilliant performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 on a new London stereo album.

Composed in 1806 during one of the composer's contented periods of life, the symphony seems to reflect this feeling. There's a bit of humor and pleasantness throughout the work. There's plenty of energy dispensed in the final movement, and the orchestra keeps up with the tempo well. The orchestra performs Beethoven's "The Consecration of the House" overture on the second side. There's a majestic hymn-like march with lots of fanfare. It is a well performed item.

Toscanini conducts the NBC Symphony Orchestra in a very fine performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique) on an RCA Victrola album. This is another in a series of new releases of Toscanini performances, and it is well worth the price. The maestro seemed to have a way with Tchaikovsky as evidenced in this performance.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 comes up for a brilliant performance by the Boston Symphony, which seldom can do wrong, on an RCA Victor stereo LP. Erich Leinsdorf seems to have the knack for drawing the best from the orchestra, especially on Beethoven. The music is clean, fluid sounding and shapely as performed by the Bostonians under Leinsdorf. The Victor stereo is just about tops. The album side is completed with a fine performance of "Coriolan Overture," another of Beethoven's interesting overtures.

SIGHT AND SOUND
MARKETING
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1967

BEETHOVEN: Coriolan Overture; Symphony No. 7. Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orch. RCA Victor LSC 2969 (S), LM 2969 (M). Sound: well engineered; the BSO out of Symphony Hall, Boston, is almost uniquely recognizable. Music: Beethoven's ever-grand symphony that dances, and his ultimate overture; both are highly popular. Interpretation: fair. After an impressive take-off in the first movement of the symphony, Leinsdorf throttles down distressingly; too much air speed is lost for my comfort. And the great Coriolan moves ponderously. Competition: too strong for both works.

Rocky Mountain News
DENVER, COLO.
D. 191,104 SUN. 202,000

NOV 19 1967

BEAUTIFUL to behold, to listen to, to own is the RCA Victrola release of TOSCANINI: The Nine Symphonies of Beethoven from the company's Immortal Performances library.

The historic performances, recorded by Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra between March, 1938, and December, 1953, also include the Coriolan, Egmont, Prometheus and Consecration of the House overtures, Sepet, Op. 20 and Adagio & Scherzo, Op. 135.

Three of the performances, Consecration of the House, Prometheus and Adagio & Scherzo, were recorded in NBC studios—the others at Carnegie Hall.

Lilly

Spotlighted in this first complete edition of eight discs in one volume besides the conductor are Eileen Farrell, soprano; Nan Merriman, mezzo-soprano; Jan Peerce, tenor; Norman Scott, bass and the Robert Shaw Chorale with Robert Shaw, director.

It takes six hours and 12 minutes to hear the volume.

Overshadowed at present, but with a dazzling onrush of creative energy, Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra launch their project Beethoven with the RCA Victor release, BEETHOVEN: SYMPHONY NO. 7.

All of the major orchestral works of Beethoven will be recorded in stereo by the conductor and orchestra within the next three years in anticipation of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth in 1970.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
V. 251,000

OCT 19 1967

Beethoven: Symphony No. 7—Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC2969]. More than a dozen years ago Leinsdorf made a much admired budget-priced recording of the Beethoven 7th for Columbia's now defunct Entré label [RL6622—mono only]. It didn't have quite the white heat of Toscanini's version, but it had lots of spirit and style of its own. Leinsdorf's new recording has the same qualities—plus fine stereo sound and some of the crispest playing the Boston Symphony has ever put on records. Competitively speaking, Karajan's more volatile performance [either DGG 188806 or RCA Victor LSC 2536] comes closer to the old Toscanini, and thus will be preferred by some (including myself). But the new Leinsdorf is certain to become the favorite of many others. (R.H.)

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,050

JAN 24 1968

New England Newsclip

Concert Music

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—No one will be surprised that Joan Sutherland has recorded yet another Bellini opera. This one is Bellini's next to last, "Beatrice di Tenda," which in the 20th century opera house is no more viable than a long deceased mackarel. But it is viable enough when Miss Sutherland's dealing with the heroine's vocal lines.

It is as though the master had only her voice in mind and only her voice is capable of giving full values to his florid outpourings. No wonder Miss Sutherland has recorded so much Bellini and it is safe to predict she'll keep at it until she has done all 10 Bellini operas—provided her public's interest holds out.

It should. It's very pleasant to hear her hurtling around the Bellini trapeses even though the opera is lesser and inferior Bellini. The recording was made in a London studio, with a supporting cast well chosen for ability to be stylistically correct in an outmoded operatic form.

Te orchestra was the London Symphony with Richard Bonynge conducting (London-1384).

Yt one could wish Miss Sutherland would exercise her vocalisms more with operatic music of other centuries. Yet specialization is the fashion, perhaps imposed by impresarios. Take young Lucia Popp who in Europe and in New York last year dazzled with her expertise with Mozart. Here is her recital record. One side is devoted to Mozart. The other to Handel. Both she projects with warmth, feeling and shimmering soprano notes. She could be any prima donna's lover's sweetheart (Angel-36442).

An argument for a new recording of Beethoven's 7th Symphony is that usually it is "interpreted" in performance and by now there are as many interpretations as there are conductors. The new recording is by the Boston Symphony. Its conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, justifies the argument. His interpretation is so straightforward it seems to be no interpretation at all, as though this was the 7th straight from its source, without intermediary (RCA Victor-2969).

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 150,000

DEC 1967

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 7, in A, Op. 92; Coriolan Overture, Op. 62

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA VICTOR LSC 2969 or LM 2969, $5.79.

A psychologist friend of mine once cited Beethoven as an obsessive-compulsive and used the finale of the Seventh Symphony to prove his point. The insistent hammering away at a single motif there admittedly makes a convincing point. Leinsdorf (with his equally obsessive propensity for literalness and order) appears determined to "normalize" the gruff, unruly composer and he nearly succeeds! In their icy way, these are remarkably accurate performances: Leinsdorf gives you the score, the whole score, and nothing but the score. Every instrumental strand has been scrupulously accounted for—but the listener himself will have to draw his own musical conclusions. Every last repeat has been meticulously observed—but where are the color and variety that would justify hearing the material played more than once? There is no annoying editorializing here, no irrational display of subjectivity, no silly old-fashioned lingering for expressive effect. The difference between fortissimo and pianissimo is purely one of decibels, not emotion. It's an okay approach if you like Beethoven cool. I don't.

Big, booming Boston recording, full of truculent reverberation but notably deficient in tonal shimmer. H.G.

MAHLER · SYMPHONY NO 3

114

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

OCT 1967

THIS IS A WINNER on many points. My incidental reservations should be taken in the context of how significant they may be to the individual reader, and also in the light of other Mahler symphony cycles now in progress. If you like the "Dynagroove" Mahler sound in the first place, be apprised that this is one of the "grooviest". It is a resplendent sound, I should think, on almost any sort of equipment, though it may require some adjustment on more sensitive components. It gave me, for example, some of the most persistent (though isolated) tracking problems I have had since I reviewed the "Dynagroove" Mahler First back in May, 1963.

Again, there is simply loads of bass response—which is a good thing, because I had to reduce my bass considerably in order to minimize an annoying, fluctuating kind of bass hum. (Maybe a bit of Dolby might have helped here?) The brass is very prominent and sonorous, perhaps in reaction to some recent complaints; however, the brass/string balance is exemplary—a tribute to both conductor and producer. Some of the percussion sound is not quite commensurate—note, e.g., the discrepancy between the bass drum and the somewhat weaker timp sound. The two harps are handled beautifully. I shall mention the singers later, since they are heard for less than 13 of the symphony's 91 minutes.

Generally speaking, Leinsdorf's attitude toward Mahler seems to be more that of a professional arbiter than of a passionate advocate like Walter or Bernstein. Nevertheless, in this case professionalism per se is not to be sneezed at. Walter never recorded the gigantic, six-movement Third Symphony at all, and Bernstein recorded it the very first time he had ever conducted it. The Bernstein/Columbia is a marvelous, astonishing tour de force which I dearly love, but in many details it cannot help but give way to such thoroughly studied-out presentations as Haitink/Philips, and now Leinsdorf/RCA Victor, have given the work.

Shirley Verrett

The first movement offers the widest variations in interpretation. It will be noticed, I think, on even the most casual exploration, that Leinsdorf stands relatively aloof from the wilder goings-on in this fantastic movement. Neither he nor Haitink, for instance, digs into the Gesindel ("rabble") episode of the development section (cues 43 to 55) so furiously or so excitingly as Bernstein. I might add, by the way, that none of the three seems to understand the cue (49) calling for the bass-drum and cymbal to be "struck as one". Do we actually need a jazz conductor or jazz drummer for this?! Leinsdorf's offstage snare-drum solo is really distant. His march tempi are generally good, but the passage with the first big trombone solo beginning at cue 13 is much too fast. This should of course be taken at exactly the same funereal beat as at figure 2 (Schwer und dumpf), regardless of the fact that the bar-lengths in the later passage fluctuate between duple and triple measure. Bernstein maintains a steady 84 quarters a minute in both passages, whereas Leinsdorf increases his speed at the latter point from 88 to 104, as if to cover the same number of longer bars in the same time.

Still, the heavy chordal ostinato repeated throughout the schwer und dumpf music is played with the greatest degree of incisiveness under Leinsdorf. And the final "beast into beauty" trombone solo, with the unexpected cello cadence (60 to

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3 in D minor; Shirley Verrett (mezzo-soprano), New England Conservatory Chorus, Boston Boychoir, Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor set LM-7046, four sides, or Stereo LSC-7046, $11.58. (91 mins.)

Bernstein, Lipton, N. Y. Phil. (99')...Col. ®675
Haitink, Forrester, Concertgeb. (94')..Phi. ®996

RECORDS

Mahler's 'Youth' Symphony Comes Of Age

The longest symphony in the repertoire —Mahler's Third in D Minor (occasionally called the "Youth") — can now readily be bought in three stereo editions. Phillips recently issued a performance by contralto Maureen Forrester, various choral groups and the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Bernard Haitink. RCA Victor has just released a new version by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with choruses and mezzo-soprano Shirley Verritt. This breaks the six-year monopoly in the Schwann catalogue of the Columbia edition under Leonard Bernstein, with Martha Lipton as soloist. That set, in turn, is being reissued as part of a limited edition of the first nine Mahler Symphonies. And, finally, a fourth stereo-mono version will be considered, although never released in this country: that of the Moscow Philharmonic under Kryie Kondrashin on the Soviet MK label.

The music itself is remarkable for more than its length. It is a distillation of the hedonic spirit, almost blinding in its riotous color, ranging over the whole of nature in its evocative breadth, a veritable anthology of the prolific world view of the young and still idealistic Mahler. Its six movements are entitled "Pan Awakes; Summer Marches In" (an amazing essay in orchestral darkness and light, lasting over half an hour); "What the Flowers in the Field Tell Me" (a menuetto which is like a sound painting of a van Gogh painting); "What the Beasts of the Field Tell Me" (perhaps the finest scherzo Mahler ever wrote, containing a haunting posthorn solo which—alas—is always recorded by trumpet); "What the Night Tells Me" (a sombre song for contralto based on text by Nietzsche); "What the Morning Bells Tell Me" (a joyous and whimsical outpouring for boys' and women's choirs, along with the soloist); and "What Love Tells Me" (a rapturous slow movement that is Mahler's last unambivalent fling with the 19th century).

Capable Achievement

Haitink's performance is a very capable achievement. The rhythm is always firm and steady, the phrases are shaped with finesse, the line is sustained and sure. Details come through effortlessly, partly due to the rich yet transparent acoustic of the great Concertgebouw. The engineering is lovely, with a fine silvery sheen on top and a surprising (for domestic Phillips pressings) freedom from distortion in peak passages. Forrester's solo singing is the best the work has had on disc, and the Amsterdam group definitely surpasses their American rivals in matters of discipline as well as tonal beauty. Yet, something is missing . . . one senses the orchestra's latent virtuosity, which Haitink somehow lacks the temperament to summon forth. (An earlier van Beinum performance — circulated privately via the "tape underground" — shows these same players, especially the brass, attacking the music like men possessed). It is as if Haitink carried his control and good taste to excess, turning the horrendous trombone glissandos in the first movement into gentlemanly runs, and ignoring or minimizing many subtle shifts in tempi and dynamics elsewhere in the score.

Leinsdorf's performance wins its points primarily in the scherzo, where the sardonic and ethereal moods are exceptionally well contrasted, and in the menuetto, where the tendency of other versions to either poke along or trip all over themselves are avoided. These strengths are, on balance, outweighed by many serious shortcomings, including gross miscalculations of tempi which distort the structure of the two end movements, an awkward choice of side-break placement in the first movement, a Sammy Kaye-like vibrato from the first trumpet, undistinguished singing, and many moments of untidy rhythm and ensemble.

Russian Version

What, then, of the earlier editions? Kondrashin may not be part of the mainstream Mahlerian tradition, but that could account for his reading having a straight-forwardness, sweetness, and guileless freshness that I find irresistible despite the Moscow orchestra's respectably second-rate playing, the relatively murky sonics, or the quaint fact that the vocal portions are sung in Russian! Furthermore, contralto V. Lenko has a gorgeous voice, and I've never heard the choral movement delivered with such breath-taking vitality. Of all versions, this one makes the most effective use of the stereo medium, with its left-right division of the violins (so essential to the final slow movement), its imaginative differentiation of the Chorus, and the wide spread of the brass. A pity it is such a hard version to come by in this country, and one hopes Melodya-Angel will see fit to remedy that situation!

Bernstein's rendition is an interesting mixture of personal idiosyncrasy and fidelity to the score. In countless instances, where his colleagues slosh over a dynamic mark here, a slight quickening or holding back there, even a caution not to drag or speed, Bernstein plays as written, with tremendous dramatic effect. This is most true in the first and fourth movements, which receive here their ultimately eloquent presentations. The finale is also broad, noble and deeply felt but occasionally the slow tempo is not sustained rhythmically and the orchestra plays too loud in the beginning. I find nothing to justify his cloyingly mannered treatment of the menuetto (where Bernstein even misreads the "l'istesso tempo" indication and forces the violins into a sloppy mess) and still cannot accept his so so ambling treatment of the Scherzo. Columbia's sound, at least on the original issue, is somewhat harsh on the high end, but has the best bass drum sound of any recording!

In conclusion, the final recommendation seems like a tossup between Bernstein and Haitink. If no one set is perfect, that is not surprising since the world in toto is imperfect and, as Mahler said, so very truthfully, his symphonies encompass all the world. Meanwhile, will somebody care to record this piece again encompassing a real posthorn?

—Abram Chipman

SUNDAY REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 119,550

OCT 29 1967

New England Newsclip

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

OCT 1967

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3. Verrett; Boston Boys Choir; New England Conservatory Cho.; Boston Sym. Orch., Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM-7046 (M); LSC-7046 (S).

These records (and this review) are a tribute to the magnificence of the BSO, as instrumentalists and as an ensemble. If the performance were conducted with the same drive and intensity with which it is played, it might well have become the greatest Mahler recording ever. Unfortunately, it is not. In the first movement Mr. Leinsdorf seemingly confuses intensity with speed—at Nos. 49, 66, and just before 74 there are terrific accelerandos not in any way indicated in the score. However, in the third and last movements a firm and understanding guiding hand is clearly felt. Both come off magnificently—in the case of the finale, a rare occurrence on records. Miss Verrett's clipped phrasing in place of the indicated cres.-decres. throughout the 4th movement is disappointing. But the orchestra plays beautifully, and RCA enhances everything with splendid recorded sound.—Turok.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

MAY 1968

~~For the most part the Mahler~~ symphonies have fared a bit better than Bruckner's on tape, although as yet we have only three examples from the Bernstein/Columbia series. We still lack any reel representation of the Sixth, and the first tape edition of the Third, by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf, is generally unsatisfying. To be sure, there are moments of true poetry in Shirley Verrett's mezzo solo, considerable appeal in the singing of the Boston Boychoir and New England Conservatory Chorus, and a high degree of dramatic effectiveness in the dark, broadspread Dynagroove stereoism; but these attractions fail to offset the deficiencies of the over-all interpretative approach. And matters are not helped by the inclusion of a sluggish, overly soulful reading of Beethoven's Coriolan Overture at the beginning of the reel (RCA Victor TR3 5016, 3¾-ips, double-play, 101 min., $10.95).

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3 in D minor. BEETHOVEN: Coriolan Overture. Shirley Verrett, mezzo-soprano; New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Boychoir (all in Mahler); Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor TR3 5016, 3¾ ips. Sound: the golden glories of the great "BSO" out of Boston's Symphony Hall are well engineered save, I suspect, a tendency to squeeze the dynamics overly. For the big Mahler score, surely we could enjoy a larger spread between soft and loud passages than that given us here. Music: Beethoven's eight-minute crusher of an overture couples well with Mahler's ninety-minute excursion into what could be called "paeantheism": an extended tribute to nature's energy, the summer, flowers, animals, the night and the morning—and love, for what is indeed a poignant peroration. Interpretations: "Coriolan," more clearly recorded than on disc, still moves too weightily for this taste. The Mahler's another story, a very good job, indeed. Miss Verrett does well by her solo role. Competition: none on tape.

SIGHT AND SOUND
MARKETING
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 1968

MAHLER SYMPHONY NO 3

114

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

OCT 1967

THIS IS A WINNER on many points. My incidental reservations should be taken in the context of how significant they may be to the individual reader, and also in the light of other Mahler symphony cycles now in progress. If you like the "Dynagroove" Mahler sound in the first place, be apprised that this is one of the "grooviest". It is a resplendent sound, I should think, on almost any sort of equipment, though it may require some adjustment on more sensitive components. It gave me, for example, some of the most persistent (though isolated) tracking problems I have had since I reviewed the "Dynagroove" Mahler First back in May, 1963.

Again, there is simply loads of bass response—which is a good thing, because I had to reduce my bass considerably in order to minimize an annoying, fluctuating kind of bass hum. (Maybe a bit of Dolby might have helped here?) The brass is very prominent and sonorous, perhaps in reaction to some recent complaints; however, the brass/string balance is exemplary—a tribute to both conductor and producer. Some of the percussion sound is not quite commensurate—note, e.g., the discrepancy between the bass drum and the somewhat weaker timp sound. The two harps are handled beautifully. I shall mention the singers later, since they are heard for less than 13 of the symphony's 91 minutes.

Generally speaking, Leinsdorf's attitude toward Mahler seems to be more that of a professional arbiter than of a passionate advocate like Walter or Bernstein. Nevertheless, in this case professionalism per se is not to be sneezed at. Walter never recorded the gigantic, six-movement Third Symphony at all, and Bernstein recorded it the very first time he had ever conducted it. The Bernstein/Columbia is a marvelous, astonishing tour de force which I dearly love, but in many details it cannot help but give way to such thoroughly studied-out presentations as Haitink/Philips, and now Leinsdorf/RCA Victor, have given the work.

Shirley Verrett

The first movement offers the widest variations in interpretation. It will be noticed, I think, on even the most casual exploration, that Leinsdorf stands relatively aloof from the wilder goings-on in this fantastic movement. Neither he nor Haitink, for instance, digs into the Gesindel ("rabble") episode of the development section (cues 43 to 55) so furiously or so excitingly as Bernstein. I might add, by the way, that none of the three seems to understand the cue (49) calling for the bass-drum and cymbal to be "struck as one". Do we actually need a jazz conductor or jazz drummer for this?! Leinsdorf's offstage snare-drum solo is really distant. His march tempi are generally good, but the passage with the first big trombone solo beginning at cue 13 is much too fast. This should of course be taken at exactly the same funereal beat as at figure 2 (Schwer und dumpf), regardless of the fact that the bar-lengths in the later passage fluctuate between duple and triple measure. Bernstein maintains a steady 84 quarters a minute in both passages, whereas Leinsdorf increases his speed at the latter point from 88 to 104, as if to cover the same number of longer bars in the same time.

Still, the heavy chordal ostinato repeated throughout the schwer und dumpf music is played with the greatest degree of incisiveness under Leinsdorf. And the final "beast into beauty" trombone solo, with the unexpected cello cadence (60 to

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3 in D minor; Shirley Verrett (mezzo-soprano), New England Conservatory Chorus, Boston Boychoir, Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor set LM-7046, four sides, or Stereo LSC-7046, $11.58. (91 mins.)

Bernstein, Lipton, N. Y. Phil. (99')...Col. ®675
Haitink, Forrester, Concertgeb. (94')..Phi. ®996

RECORDS

Mahler's 'Youth' Symphony Comes Of Age

The longest symphony in the repertoire —Mahler's Third in D Minor (occasionally called the "Youth") — can now readily be bought in three stereo editions. Phillips recently issued a performance by contralto Maureen Forrester, various choral groups and the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam under Bernard Haitink. RCA Victor has just released a new version by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with choruses and mezzo-soprano Shirley Verritt. This breaks the six-year monopoly in the Schwann catalogue of the Columbia edition under Leonard Bernstein, with Martha Lipton as soloist. That set, in turn, is being reissued as part of a limited edition of the first nine Mahler Symphonies. And, finally, a fourth stereo-mono version will be considered, although never released in this country: that of the Moscow Philharmonic under Kryie Kondrashin on the Soviet MK label.

The music itself is remarkable for more than its length. It is a distillation of the hedonic spirit, almost blinding in its riotous color, ranging over the whole of nature in its evocative breadth, a veritable anthology of the prolific world view of the young and still idealistic Mahler. Its six movements are entitled "Pan Awakes; Summer Marches In" (an amazing essay in orchestral darkness and light, lasting over half an hour); "What the Flowers in the Field Tell Me" (a menuetto which is like a sound painting of a van Gogh painting); "What the Beasts of the Field Tell Me" (perhaps the finest scherzo Mahler ever wrote, containing a haunting posthorn solo which—alas—is always recorded by trumpet); "What the Night Tells Me" (a sombre song for contralto based on text by Nietzsche); "What the Morning Bells Tell Me" (a joyous and whimsical outpouring for boys' and women's choirs, along with the soloist); and "What Love Tells Me" (a rapturous slow movement that is Mahler's last unambivalent fling with the 19th century).

Capable Achievement

Haitink's performance is a very capable achievement. The rhythm is always firm and steady, the phrases are shaped with finesse, the line is sustained and sure. Details come through effortlessly, partly due to the rich yet transparent acoustic of the great Concertgebouw. The engineering is lovely, with a fine silvery sheen on top and a surprising (for domestic Phillips pressings) freedom from distortion in peak passages. Forrester's solo singing is the best the work has had on disc, and the Amsterdam group definitely surpasses their American rivals in matters of discipline as well as tonal beauty. Yet, something is missing . . . one senses the orchestra's latent virtuosity, which Haitink somehow lacks the temperament to summon forth. (An earlier van Beinum performance — circulated privately via the "tape underground" — shows these same players, especially the brass, attacking the music like men possessed). It is as if Haitink carried his control and good taste to excess, turning the horrendous trombone glissandos in the first movement into gentlemanly runs, and ignoring or minimizing many subtle shifts in tempi and dynamics elsewhere in the score.

Leinsdorf's performance wins its points primarily in the scherzo, where the sardonic and ethereal moods are exceptionally well contrasted, and in the menuetto, where the tendency of other versions to either poke along or trip all over themselves are avoided. These strengths are, on balance, outweighed by many serious shortcomings, including gross miscalculations of tempi which distort the structure of the two end movements, an awkward choice of side-break placement in the first movement, a Sammy Kaye-like vibrato from the first trumpet, undistinguished singing, and many moments of untidy rhythm and ensemble.

Russian Version

What, then, of the earlier editions? Kondrashin may not be part of the mainstream Mahlerian tradition, but that could account for his reading having a straight-forwardness, sweetness, and guileless freshness that I find irresistible despite the Moscow orchestra's respectably second-rate playing, the relatively murky sonics, or the quaint fact that the vocal portions are sung in Russian! Furthermore, contralto V. Lenko has a gorgeous voice, and I've never heard the choral movement delivered with such breath-taking vitality. Of all versions, this one makes the most effective use of the stereo medium, with its left-right division of the violins (so essential to the final slow movement), its imaginative differentiation of the Chorus, and the wide spread of the brass. A pity it is such a hard version to come by in this country, and one hopes Melodya-Angel will see fit to remedy that situation!

Bernstein's rendition is an interesting mixture of personal idiosyncrasy and fidelity to the score. In countless instances, where his colleagues slosh over a dynamic mark here, a slight quickening or holding back there, even a caution not to drag or speed, Bernstein plays as written, with tremendous dramatic effect. This is most true in the first and fourth movements, which receive here their ultimately eloquent presentations. The finale is also broad, noble and deeply felt but occasionally the slow tempo is not sustained rhythmically and the orchestra plays too loud in the beginning. I find nothing to justify his cloyingly mannered treatment of the menuetto (where Bernstein even misreads the "l'istesso tempo" indication and forces the violins into a sloppy mess) and still cannot accept his so so ambling treatment of the Scherzo. Columbia's sound, at least on the original issue, is somewhat harsh on the high end, but has the best bass drum sound of any recording!

In conclusion, the final recommendation seems like a tossup between Bernstein and Haitink. If no one set is perfect, that is not surprising since the world in toto is imperfect and, as Mahler said, so very truthfully, his symphonies encompass all the world. Meanwhile, will somebody care to record this piece again encompassing a real posthorn?

—Abram Chipman

SUNDAY REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 119,550

OCT 29 1967

New England Newsette

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

OCT 1967

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3. Verrett; Boston Boys Choir; New England Conservatory Cho.; Boston Sym. Orch., Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM-7046 (M); LSC-7046 (S).

These records (and this review) are a tribute to the magnificence of the BSO, as instrumentalists and as an ensemble. If the performance were conducted with the same drive and intensity with which it is played, it might well have become the greatest Mahler recording ever. Unfortunately, it is not. In the first movement Mr. Leinsdorf seemingly confuses intensity with speed—at Nos. 49, 66, and just before 74 there are terrific accelerandos not in any way indicated in the score. However, in the third and last movements a firm and understanding guiding hand is clearly felt. Both come off magnificently—in the case of the finale, a rare occurrence on records. Miss Verrett's clipped phrasing in place of the indicated cres.-decres. throughout the 4th movement is disappointing. But the orchestra plays beautifully, and RCA enhances everything with splendid recorded sound.—Turok.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

MAY 1968

For the most part the Mahler symphonies have fared a bit better than Bruckner's on tape, although as yet we have only three examples from the Bernstein/Columbia series. We still lack any reel representation of the Sixth, and the first tape edition of the Third, by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf, is generally unsatisfying. To be sure, there are moments of true poetry in Shirley Verrett's mezzo solo, considerable appeal in the singing of the Boston Boychoir and New England Conservatory Chorus, and a high degree of dramatic effectiveness in the dark, broadspread Dynagroove stereoism; but these attractions fail to offset the deficiencies of the over-all interpretative approach. And matters are not helped by the inclusion of a sluggish, overly soulful reading of Beethoven's Coriolan Overture at the beginning of the reel (RCA Victor TR3 5016, 3¾-ips, double-play, 101 min., $10.95).

SIGHT AND SOUND
MARKETING
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 1968

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3 in D minor. BEETHOVEN: Coriolan Overture. Shirley Verrett, mezzo-soprano; New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Boychoir (all in Mahler); Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor TR3 5016, 3¾ ips. Sound: the golden glories of the great "BSO" out of Boston's Symphony Hall are well engineered save, I suspect, a tendency to squeeze the dynamics overly. For the big Mahler score, surely we could enjoy a larger spread between soft and loud passages than that given us here. Music: Beethoven's eight-minute crusher of an overture couples well with Mahler's ninety-minute excursion into what could be called "paeantheism": an extended tribute to nature's energy, the summer, flowers, animals, the night and the morning—and love, for what is indeed a poignant peroration. Interpretations: "Coriolan," more clearly recorded than on disc, still moves too weightily for this taste. The Mahler's another story, a very good job, indeed. Miss Verrett does well by her solo role. Competition: none on tape.

115

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

SEP 10 1967

Recordings: Boston Symphony Adds Stunning Third Symphony to Mahler Series

SHIRLEY VERRETT

By JOAN SIMMONS

Gustav Mahler is receiving considerable exposure via the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and it's hard to imagine a more satisfactory means for the composer's works to be conveyed to the public.

In recent months, the BSO has recorded the German master's First, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies with considerable artistic and financial success, the latter somewhat surprising considering Mahler's relatively low standing among the concert-hall exposed composers.

Now, Leinsdorf and his BSO have come out with a stunning reading of Mahler's massive Symphony No. 3 in D minor with mezo-soprano Shirley Verritt and the combined New England Conservatory Chorus and Boston Boychoir. (RCA, LM-7046, mono, LSC-7046, stereo, two records.)

"Massive" is the word for this symphony in every respect from its thematic material (all of nature with man's love as seed and flower) to its length (six movements, ninety minutes) and to its orchestral and vocal demands (Boys' and womens' choruses, an alto soloist and a full symphony orchestra). These demands the Boston Symphony and vocal ensembles meet more than well.

Mahler's Third Symphony is a product of genius composed at a time—1895-6 when his unorthodox approach to the symphonic form was risky in terms of professional and popular acceptance of his work. Rather than the classic 'ABA" division of a symphony with the customary four movements, Mahler elected almost always to let his music feed on itself, progress through however many movements were necessary to carry out not only what he wanted his work to express but also what he felt successive movements had to be to logically follow what had gone before.

Thus in the Third, with its incredibly complex and diverse subject matter, Mahler was compelled to include no less than six movements and even planned for a seventh, an idea later dropped in favor of making the seventh the centerpiece of his Fourth Symphony.

Warning Built In . . .

Too, this symphony conforms to few of the conventional means of moving from one figure or movement to the next and the listener, be he trained or simply a music lover, is continually surprised with what comes next, so abrupt are the transitions. But there is a warning built into the work to prepare the ear for the assault—this being the titles of the six movements which serve as an outline for composer and listener alike.

It is because of the seemingly impossible variety of images and ideas built into this work that it must be heard to be fully appreciated. It cannot be described in any way to one who has not heard.

The New England Conservatory Chorus and Boston Boychoir complement the BSO's artistry well in their very difficult roles as does Miss Verrett whose work with the orchestra has been heard at Tanglewood in past years. Hers is a voice of power and great range as

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

MAR 1968

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3, in D Minor. Marjorie Thomas (alto); Tölzer Boys' Choir; Bavarian Radio Chorus and Orchestra, Rafael Kubelik cond. DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON (S) 139337/38 two discs $11.58.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3, in D Minor. Shirley Verrett (mezzo-soprano); Boston Boychoir; New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR (S) LSC 7046, (M) LM 7046* two discs $11.58.

Performance: Kubelik has the edge
Recording: Both good in different ways
Stereo Quality: Both good

With these releases we now have four currently available versions of Mahler's Third, and we shall hear undoubtedly from both Georg Solti on London and Otto Klemperer on Angel within the near future. Meanwhile, the two performances under consideration here stand at a considerable remove from both the free-wheeling emotionalism of Bernstein (Columbia) and the expansive lyricism of Haitink (Philips).

Certainly Leinsdorf conveys in his reading little of Bernstein's intense commitment, let alone rhythmic urgency, while the wonderful slow finale gets a decidedly cool and brisk treatment—fully five minutes faster than Bernstein's. The two short vocal movements come off well enough, thanks in large measure to Shirley Verrett's expressive singing of the Zarathustra Midnight Song text. The recorded sound is spacious, yet finely detailed—decidedly more clean and transparent in texture than either Columbia's or Philips'.

Rafael Kubelik seems to be trying for a middle course between Leinsdorf's discipline and the expressive emphasis of Haitink and Bernstein. He does not linger, but he does let the music breathe naturally. Though his finale is less than a minute longer than Leinsdorf's, it has more heart and intensity. The big disappointment for me was Marjorie Thomas, who sounds far more at home in her native English oratorio repertoire than in Mahler's subjective Austro-German milieu. Indeed, it is Haitink who carries the day with both vocal movements in his Philips recording. Maureen Forrester's contralto has not only expressiveness, but also the weight to support Nietzsche's message, and the boys and women under Haitink's baton come

(Continued on page 98)

Ledger-Star
NORFOLK, VIRGINIA
D. 105,148

SEP 5 1967

Records

Spirit of romanticism relives in moving music

Love . . . beauty . . . nature . . . joy . . . sorrow. In the hands of the romanticist these are descriptions of varying emotional experiences.

Often in the minds of the 20th Century scientist or musicologist they are signs of decadance or lack of self-control. For example, right after World War II, we heard Gustav Mahler described in these very terms; about the best the musicologist-instructor could say for Mahler was that he was a corruption of another romanticist, Richard Wagner.

Fortunately, the music world knows better now. We have learned that man is better than a machine, that emotions do play an important part in his existence. And Mahler champions, such as Leonard Bernstein, the late Bruno Walter and Erich Leinsdorf have performed the music and let us judge how wrong the critics are.

Leinsdorf has just recorded the Third Symphony in D minor with the Boston Symphony with the New England Conservatory Chorus and Shirley Verrett, soloist (Victor LSC-7046), and what a revelation it is! The first movement for example, is a giant; Mahler has utilized the broad symphonic sonata form, but instead of letting it act as a brake on creativity has literally let the movement evolve from a germ of a melody.

The symphony as a whole is broadly descriptive of summer; the other five movements carry out such themes as flowers and meadows, the animals, night, the morning bells and, finally, love.

Leinsdorf delivers a controlled, fine performance of the symphony.

Beethoven, especially in his late string quartets and Piano Sonata, Opus 110, was every bit the romantic, albeit a far cry from Gustav Mahler. Beethoven's romanticism was introspective, brooding—one could call it soul music.

The incomparable John Browning has recorded the Opus 110, along with Schumann's Symphonic Etudes. It has been said that Beethoven wrote this sonata for the late Dame Myra Hess, but after hearing Browning's performance, one is prone to say the composer wrote it for John Browning.

The Schumann likewise is beautifully and precisely played, though one might want a little more bravura.

Another great pianist, but one who is truly venerable, Artur Rubenstein, has joined forces with the Guarneri Quartet in the monumental Brahms Piano Quintet in F minor, Opus 34. (Victor LSC-2791) Again, we have a carefully tailored performance, one in which all five seem to be playing as one.

One of Puccini's lesser known operas is "La Rondine," but like the staples it is loaded with the melody associated with romanticism even though it was written in 1917. One never tires of such, especially when presented by the cast assembled by Victor in Rome for its recording of the score (LSC-7048).

The star of the show is unquestionably soprano Anna Moffo, but she receives excellent support from such cast members as the surprising tenor Piero de Palma; Daniele Barioni, Mario Sereni and Graziella Sciuutti. The very able conductor is Francesco Molinari-Pradelli, who is now the leading director of Italian productions at the Metropolitan Opera.

Finally, there is nothing more symbolic of the full flowering of the romantic spirit than the lieder of Schubert, Wolf, Brahms and Dvorak. Love . . . beauty . . . nature . . . joy sorrow: All these pour forth in song from these masters.

And all is beauty when these masterpieces are given the performance of Hanne-Lore Kuhse, the East Berlin soprano (Victor LSC-2967). Her voice fairly glows with the spirit of this great collection of songs. Her accompanist is Taijiro Ilmori.—F.L.C.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

NOV 1967

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3

Shirley Verrett, mezzo; New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Boychoir; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA VICTOR (D) LM 7046 or LSC 7046, $11.58 (two discs).

The best thing in this set is Shirley Verrett's noble singing. She feels both music and words intensely, and she takes the trouble to hold the last notes of phrases for their full time value. Another advance over previous Leinsdorf Mahler issues is the splendid trumpet playing. Indeed, the brass section as a whole plays very much better than it did in the Carnegie Hall performance last season.

But when that much has been said, the tale of virtues is at an end. Leinsdorf's direction lacks firmness and conviction almost throughout. His inability to hold a tempo is especially destructive in the march sections of the first movement: several times the music puts on a sudden burst of speed like a train running downhill. I have listened to these passages repeatedly in an attempt to discern some interpretative point in the proceeding, but in the end I am convinced that it is merely a deficiency of technique. Even in Miss Verrett's movement the rhythms are not always surely delineated, and Leinsdorf fails to distinguish between quarter- and half-notes at the beginning of the Knaben Wunderhorn setting.

The sound is good, but no serious

115

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

SEP 10 1967

Recordings: Boston Symphony Adds Stunning Third ... ahler Series

SHIRLEY VERRETT

By JOAN SIMMONS

Gustav Mahler is receiving considerable exposure via the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and it's hard to imagine a more satisfactory means for the composer's works to be conveyed to the public.

In recent months, the BSO has recorded the German master's First, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies with considerable artistic and financial success, the latter somewhat surprising considering Mahler's relatively low standing among the concert-hall exposed composers.

Now, Leinsdorf and his BSO have come out with a stunning reading of Mahler's massive Symphony No. 3 in D minor with mezo-soprano Shirley Verritt and the combined New England Conservatory Chorus and Boston Boychoir. (RCA, LM-7046, mono, LSC-7046, stereo, two records.)

"Massive" is the word for this symphony in every respect from its thematic material (all of nature with man's love as seed and flower) to its length (six movements, ninety minutes) and to its orchestral and vocal demands (Boys' and womens' choruses, an alto soloist and a full symphony orchestra). These demands the Boston Symphony and vocal ensembles meet more than well.

Mahler's Third Symphony is a product of genius composed at a time—1895-6 when his unorthodox approach to the symphonic form was risky in terms of professional and popular acceptance of his work. Rather than the classic 'ABA" division of a symphony with the cu[illegible] ary four movements, Mahler elected almost always to let his music feed on itself, progress through however many movements were necessary to carry out not only what he wanted his work to express but also what he felt successive movements had to be to logically follow what had gone before.

Thus in the Third, with its incredibly complex and diverse subject matter, Mahler was compelled to include no less than six movements and even planned for a seventh, an idea later dropped in favor of making the seventh the centerpiece of his Fourth Symphony.

Warning Built In

Too, this sy[illegible] forms to fe[illegible] tional [illegible] or[illegible] lover, is continually surprised with what comes next, so abrupt are the transitions. But there is a warning built into the work to prepare the ear for the assault—this being the titles of the six movements which serve as an outline for composer and listener alike.

It is because of the seemingly impossible variety of images and ideas built into this work that it must be heard to be fully appreciated. It cannot be described in any way to one who has not heard.

The New England Conservatory Chorus and Boston Boychoir complement the BSO's artistry well in their very difficult roles as does Miss Verrett whose work [illegible]ith the orchestra has been [illegible]rd at Tanglewood in past [illegible]ars. Hers is a voice of [illegible]er and great range as through with far more presence and distinctive coloration.

The recorded sound DGG has accorded Kubelik seems of the close-up, multi-miked type, which emphasizes stereo localization and brings out a wealth of details as well, especially in the lower orchestral registers. Indeed, the bass impact in the climactic moments of the Kubelik album is so substantial that some tone-control adjustment may be necessary. Special honors in the Kubelik performance go to the solo trombonist in the first movement and to the posthorn soloist in the third movement (although it is not indicated on the labels of the test pressings received for review, I suspect that a real posthorn is used here rather than the trumpet employed in most other recordings).

Taking the four presently available recorded performances as a group, I find no single clear-cut choice. I would prefer to own both the Bernstein and Haitink readings, with Kubelik as an alternate for those times when Bernstein becomes altogether too rich for the blood. D. H.

Ledger-Star
NORFOLK, VIRGINIA
D. 105,148

SEP 5 1967

Records

Spirit of romanticism relives in moving music

Love . . . beauty . . . nature . . . joy . . . sorrow. In the hands of the romanticist these are descriptions of varying emotional experiences.

Often in the minds of the 20th Century scientist or musicologist they are signs of decadance or lack of self-control. For example, right after World War II, we heard Gustav Mahler described in these very terms; about the best the musicologist-instructor could say for Mahler was that he was a corruption of another romanticist, Richard Wagner.

Fortunately, the music world knows better now. We have learned that man is better than a machine, that emotions do play an important part in his existence. And Mahler champions, such as Leonard Bernstein, the late Bruno Walter and Erich Leinsdorf have performed the music and let us judge how wrong the critics are.

Leinsdorf has just recorded the Third Symphony in D minor with the Boston Symphony with the New England Conservatory Chorus and Shirley Verrett, soloist (Victor LSC-7046), and what a revelation it is! The first movement for example, is a giant; Mahler has utilized the broad symphonic sonata form, but instead of letting it act as a brake on creativity has literally let the movement evolve from a germ of a melody.

The symphony as a whole is broadly descriptive of summer; the other five movements carry out such themes as flowers and meadows, the animals, night, the morning bells and, finally, love.

Leinsdorf delivers a controlled, fine performance of the symphony.

Beethoven, especially in his late string quartets and Piano Sonata, Opus 110, was every bit the romantic, albeit a far cry from Gustav Mahler. Beethoven's romanticism was introspective, brooding—one could call it soul music.

The incomparable John Browning has recorded the Opus 110, along with Schumann's Symphonic Etudes. It has been said that Beethoven wrote this sonata for the late Dame Myra Hess, but after hearing Browning's performance, one is prone to say the composer wrote it for John Browning.

The Schumann likewise is beautifully and precisely played, though one might want a little more bravura.

Another great pianist, but one who is truly venerable, Artur Rubenstein, has joined forces with the Guarneri Quartet in the monumental Brahms Piano Quintet in F minor, Opus 34. (Victor LSC-2791) Again, we have a carefully tailored performance, one in which all five seem to be playing as one.

One of Puccini's lesser known operas is "La Rondine," but like the staples it is loaded with the melody associated with romanticism even though it was written in 1917. One never tires of such, especially when presented by the cast assembled by Victor in Rome for its recording of the score (LSC-7048).

The star of the show is unquestionably soprano Anna Moffo, but she receives excellent support from such cast members as the surprising tenor Piero de Palma; Daniele Barioni, Mario Sereni and Graziella Sciuutti. The very able conductor is Francesco Molinari-Pradelli, who is now the leading director of Italian productions at the Metropolitan Opera.

Finally, there is nothing more symbolic of the full flowering of the romantic spirit than the lieder of Schubert, Wolf, Brahms and Dvorak. Love . . . beauty . . . nature . . . joy sorrow: All these pour forth in song from these masters.

And all is beauty when these masterpieces are given the performance of Hanne-Lore Kuhse, the East Berlin soprano (Victor LSC-2967). Her voice fairly glows with the spirit of this great collection of songs. Her accompanist is Taijiro Ilmori.—F.L.C. competition is offered to either Bernstein on Columbia or Haitink on Philips. By a narrow margin, my personal preference is for Bernstein, for reasons outlined in my discography of the Mahler symphonies (HIGH FIDELITY, September 1967). Admirers of Sir Neville Cardus will presumably enjoy his annotations for the RCA Victor set, but I found them pretentious in expression and sometimes positively offensive in their content. B.J.

115

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607

SEP 10 1967

Recordings: Boston Symphony Adds Stunning Third Symphony to Mahler Series

SHIRLEY VERRETT

By JOAN SIMMONS

Gustav Mahler is receiving considerable exposure via the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and it's hard to imagine a more satisfactory means for the composer's works to be conveyed to the public.

In recent months, the BSO has recorded the German master's First, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies with considerable artistic and financial success, the latter somewhat surprising considering Mahler's relatively low standing among the concert-hall exposed composers.

Now, Leinsdorf and his BSO have come out with a stunning reading of Mahler's massive Symphony No. 3 in D minor with mezo-soprano Shirley Verritt and the combined New England Conservatory Chorus and Boston Boychoir. (RCA, LM-7046, mono, LSC-7046, stereo, two records.)

"Massive" is the word for this symphony in every respect from its thematic material (all of nature with man's love as seed and flower) to its length (six movements, ninety minutes) and to its orchestral and vocal demands (Boys' and womens' choruses, an alto soloist and a full symphony orchestra). These demands the Boston Symphony and vocal ensembles meet more than well.

Mahler's Third Symphony is a product of genius composed at a time—1895-6 when his unorthodox approach to the symphonic form was risky in terms of professional and popular acceptance of his work. Rather than the classic 'ABA" division of a symphony with the customary four movements, Mahler elected almost always to let his music feed on itself, progress through however many movements were necessary to carry out not only what he wanted his work to express but also what he felt successive movements had to be to logically follow what had gone before.

Thus in the Third, with its incredibly complex and diverse subject matter, Mahler was compelled to include no less than six movements and even planned for a seventh, an idea later dropped in favor of making the seventh the centerpiece of his Fourth Symphony.

Warning Built In . . .

Too, this symphony conforms to few of the conventional means of moving from one figure or movement to the next and the listener, be he trained or simply a music lover, is continually surprised with what comes next, so abrupt are the transitions. But there is a warning built into the work to prepare the ear for the assault—this being the titles of the six movements which serve as an outline for composer and listener alike.

It is because of the seemingly impossible variety of images and ideas built into this work that it must be heard to be fully appreciated. It cannot be described in any way to one who has not heard.

The New England Conservatory Chorus and Boston Boychoir complement the BSO's artistry well in their very difficult roles as does Miss Verrett whose work with the orchestra has been heard at Tanglewood in past years. Hers is a voice of power and great range as

Ledger-Star
NORFOLK, VIRGINIA
D. 105 148

SEP 5 1967

Records

Spirit of romanticism relives in moving music

Love . . . beauty . . . nature . . . joy . . . sorrow. In the hands of the romanticist these are descriptions of varying emotional experiences.

Often in the minds of the 20th Century scientist or musicologist they are signs of decadance or lack of self-control. For example, right after World War II, we heard Gustav Mahler described in these very terms; about the best the musicologist-instructor could say for Mahler was that he was a corruption of another romanticist, Richard Wagner.

Fortunately, the music world knows better now. We have learned that man is better than a machine, that emotions do play an important part in his existence. And Mahler champions, such as Leonard Bernstein, the late Bruno Walter and Erich Leinsdorf have performed the music and let us judge how wrong the critics are.

Leinsdorf has just recorded the Third Symphony in D minor with the Boston Symphony with the New England Conservatory Chorus and Shirley Verrett, soloist (Victor LSC-7046), and what a revelation it is! The first movement for example, is a giant; Mahler has utilized the broad symphonic sonata form, but instead of letting it act as a brake on creativity has literally let the movement evolve from a germ of a melody.

The symphony as a whole is broadly descriptive of summer; the other five movements carry out such themes as flowers and meadows, the animals, night, the morning bells and, finally, love.

Leinsdorf delivers a controlled, fine performance of the symphony.

Beethoven, especially in his late string quartets and Piano Sonata, Opus 110, was every bit the romantic, albeit a far cry from Gustav Mahler. Beethoven's romanticism was introspective, brooding—one could call it soul music.

The incomparable John Browning has recorded the Opus 110, along with Schumann's Symphonic Etudes. It has been said that Beethoven wrote this sonata for the late Dame Myra Hess, but after hearing Browning's performance, one is prone to say the composer wrote it for John Browning.

The Schumann likewise is beautifully and precisely played, though one might want a little more bravura.

Another great pianist, but one who is truly venerable, Artur Rubenstein, has joined forces with the Guarneri Quartet in the monumental Brahms Piano Quintet in F minor, Opus 34. (Victor LSC-2791) Again, we have a carefully tailored performance, one in which all five seem to be playing as one.

One of Puccini's lesser known operas is "La Rondine," but like the staples it is loaded with the melody associated with romanticism even though it was written in 1917. One never tires of such, especially when presented by the cast assembled by Victor in Rome for its recording of the score (LSC-7048).

The star of the show is unquestionably soprano Anna Moffo, but she receives excellent support from such cast members as the surprising tenor Piero de Palma; Daniele Barioni, Mario Sereni and Graziella Sciuutti. The very able conductor is Francesco Molinari-Pradelli, who is now the leading director of Italian productions at the Metropolitan Opera.

Finally, there is nothing more symbolic of the full flowering of the romantic spirit than the lieder of Schubert, Wolf, Brahms and Dvorak. Love . . . beauty . . . nature . . . joy sorrow: All these pour forth in song from these masters.

And all is beauty when these masterpieces are given the performance of Hanne-Lore Kuhse, the East Berlin soprano (Victor LSC-2967). Her voice fairly glows with the spirit of this great collection of songs. Her accompanist is Taijiro Ilmori.—F.L.C.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 138,000

NOV 1967

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3

Shirley Verrett, mezzo; New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Boychoir; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA VICTOR ⓓ LM 7046 or LSC 7046, $11.58 (two discs).

The best thing in this set is Shirley Verrett's noble singing. She feels both music and words intensely, and she takes the trouble to hold the last notes of phrases for their full time value. Another advance over previous Leinsdorf Mahler issues is the splendid trumpet playing. Indeed, the brass section as a whole plays very much better than it did in the Carnegie Hall performance last season.

But when that much has been said, the tale of virtues is at an end. Leinsdorf's direction lacks firmness and conviction almost throughout. His inability to hold a tempo is especially destructive in the march sections of the first movement: several times the music puts on a sudden burst of speed like a train running downhill. I have listened to these passages repeatedly in an attempt to discern some interpretative point in the proceeding, but in the end I am convinced that it is merely a deficiency of technique. Even in Miss Verrett's movement the rhythms are not always surely delineated, and Leinsdorf fails to distinguish between quarter- and half-notes at the beginning of the Knaben Wunderhorn setting.

The sound is good, but no serious

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

MAR 1968

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3, in D Minor. Marjorie Thomas (alto); Tölzer Boys' Choir; Bavarian Radio Chorus and Orchestra, Rafael Kubelik cond. DEUTSCHE GRAMMOPHON Ⓢ 139337/38 two discs $11.58.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 3, in D Minor. Shirley Verrett (mezzo-soprano); Boston Boychoir; New England Conservatory Chorus; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR Ⓢ LSC 7046, Ⓜ LM 7046* two discs $11.58.

Performance: Kubelik has the edge
Recording: Both good in different ways
Stereo Quality: Both good

With these releases we now have four currently available versions of Mahler's Third, and we shall hear undoubtedly from both Georg Solti on London and Otto Klemperer on Angel within the near future. Meanwhile, the two performances under consideration here stand at a considerable remove from both the free-wheeling emotionalism of Bernstein (Columbia) and the expansive lyricism of Haitink (Philips).

Certainly Leinsdorf conveys in his reading little of Bernstein's intense commitment, let alone rhythmic urgency, while the wonderful slow finale gets a decidedly cool and brisk treatment—fully five minutes faster than Bernstein's. The two short vocal movements come off well enough, thanks in large measure to Shirley Verrett's expressive singing of the Zarathustra Midnight Song text. The recorded sound is spacious, yet finely detailed—decidedly more clean and transparent in texture than either Columbia's or Philips'.

Rafael Kubelik seems to be trying for a middle course between Leinsdorf's discipline and the expressive emphasis of Haitink and Bernstein. He does not linger, but he does let the music breathe naturally. Though his finale is less than a minute longer than Leinsdorf's, it has more heart and intensity. The big disappointment for me was Marjorie Thomas, who sounds far more at home in her native English oratorio repertoire than in Mahler's subjective Austro-German milieu. Indeed, it is Haitink who carries the day with both vocal movements in his Philips recording. Maureen Forrester's contralto has not only expressiveness, but also the weight to support Nietzsche's message, and the boys and women under Haitink's baton come

(Continued on page 98)

ALBERTO GINASTERA.. PIANO CONCERTO

116

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

MAR 16 1968

2 GINASTERA WORKS ON RCA BY LEINSDORF

BOSTON — RCA recorded two Ginastera works with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall on Wednesday (6). Joao Carlos Martins, who has been performing the "Piano Concerto" with the orchestra, was the soloist in that work. The other Ginastera piece was "Variaciones Concertantes." Richard Mohr was a&r procer.

Ginastera's new opera "Bomarzo" will have its New York premiere at a benefit performance of the New York City Opera on Thursday (14) at Lincoln Center, Julius Rudel, who conucted the work's world premiere with the Washington Opera Society, will conduct. Ginastera's "Don Rodrigo" had its U. S. premiere of the 1966 opening performance of the New York City Opera Co. at its new home at the New York State Theater.

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 13,000

MAR 30 1968

Latin American

RCA Cuts Ginastera Concerto in Boston

The Piano Concerto of composer Alberto Ginastera was recorded last week in Boston's Symphony Hall by Brazilian pianist Joao Carlos Martins with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, for RCA's Red Seal label.

The album will be a special release and will be in record stores the first week of April coincidental to performances in Lincoln Center of Ginastera's new opera, "Bomarzo," which was given its New York premiere on March 14 by the New York City Opera.

Announcement was made by Roger Hall, Manager, Red Seal A and R, who said: "Mr. Ginastera has emerged as one of the most exciting composers on the contemporary scene. Two of his operas, "Bomarzo" and "Don Rodrigo" currently are in the repertory of the New York City Opera, and this concerto recently was greeted with enthusiasm in a Philharmonic Hall performance. At that time, we decided it was an important work of which a major recording should be available to the public. We at once conferred with Maestro Leinsdorf, who agreed to postpone his vacation until after the recording sessions were completed."

Another Ginastera composition, "Variaciones Concertantes," also was recorded for inclusion in the album. This work is not currently available on disks.

Richard Mohr produced the album for Red Seal.

PROFOVIEV · VIOLIN CONCERTO NO 2.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

OCT 1967

PROKOFIEV: Violin Concerto No. 2, in G Minor, Op. 63. SIBELIUS: Violin Concerto, in D Minor, Op. 47. Itzhak Perlman (violin); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR Ⓢ LSC 2962, Ⓜ LM 2962* $5.79.

Performance: Rich and glossy
Recording: Lush and detailed
Stereo Quality: Excellent

PROKOFIEV: Violin Concerto No. 2, in G Minor, Op. 63. SZYMANOWSKI: Violin Concerto No. 2, Op. 61. Ladislav Jasek (violin); Prague Symphony Orchestra, Martin Turnovsky cond. ARTIA Ⓢ ALPS 713* $5.98, Ⓜ ALP 713 $4.98.

Performance: Virile
Recording: Good enough

PROKOFIEV: Violin Concerto No. 2, in G Minor, Op. 63. SIBELIUS: Violin Concerto in D Minor, Op. 47. BEETHOVEN: Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 61. TCHAIKOVSKY: Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 35. Henryk Szeryng (violin); London Symphony Orchestra, Gennady and Ricci, but he more than holds his own, capturing with sweet yet penetrating tone the work's lyricism and brilliance.

(Continued on page 150)

In the even more virtuosic and rhapsodic Sibelius score, Heifetz, Szeryng, Oistrakh, and Ferras are Perlman's main competitors; and here I would say that the fantastic Heifetz reading is still tops for excitement, while Perlman and Christian Ferras come out neck-and-neck in terms of lyrical impulse. Incidentally, the Perlman disc is the only one currently available singly that offers the Sibelius and Prokofiev works back-to-back.

leaves little to be desired, though the recorded sound is somewhat brash and overreverberant at times.

The formidable violinistic prowess and polished musicianship of Henryk Szeryng need no further praise here. His previous recordings amply demonstrate his unerring intonation and flair for sustaining effortlessly the longest and most elaborately ornamented melodic lines. Szeryng and the Soviet conductor, Rozhdestvensky, take a broadly lyrical view of the Sibelius Concerto, as opposed to the somewhat more closely knit treatment of Perlman and Leinsdorf. The performance is a fine one on these terms, though the Mercury disc shows considerable sonic deterioration toward the end of its thirty-minute length, at least on my review copy. The Prokofiev performance is transparent and elegantly lyrical, though the sonics are

A telling asset of the Perlman-Leinsdorf disc is the gorgeous recorded sound. As against the Heifetz performances, which tend to give the orchestra something of a back seat, Perlman's violin emerges from the very midst of the orchestra without, however, being overwhelmed at any point. Leinsdorf's excellent orchestral accompaniments are recorded with more wealth of detail than I have every heard before in either the Prokofiev or Sibelius concertos—the percussion in the Prokofiev is a striking instance in point. From a sonic standpoint, all other recordings seem thin and pale alongside this one.

The name of Czech violinist Ladislav Jasek is a new one to me. In contrast to the penetrating sweetness of Perlman's tone and the polished brilliance of Szeryng's, Mr. Jasek's is robust and assertive, at least on this record. His reading of the Prokofiev concerto is exuberant, but the performance as a whole is not in the top class. What does lend the Artia disc special interest is the Second Violin Concerto of Karel Szymanowski (1882-1937), second only to Chopin among traditional Polish composers. Written two years before the Prokofiev G Minor, this was Szymanowski's last major work, and shows his late preoccupation with the musical idiom of the Tatra mountain folk. Szymanowski, in short, pursued a course similar to that of Bartók and Janáček in seeking an integration of regional idioms with the mainstream of the great classical tradition. The one-movement Second Violin Concerto shows this late manner in full bloom: the music is gorgeously sensual and rhapsodic, yet intensely virile in utterance and dynamic in rhythm. Mr. Jasek's big tone and exuberant musical ways are better suited to Szymanowski than to Prokofiev. The orchestral accompaniment under Martin Turnovsky's baton not quite up to those of the Perlman-Leinsdorf collaboration.

The Beethoven performance has Szeryng repeating, on a somewhat less inspired level, the essentials of his excellent reading done some fifteen years ago, with the late Jacques Thibaud conducting, and recently released on the Monitor label. Let it be said, however, that the orchestral accompaniment by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt here is of exceptional distinction and power, stressing the rugged strength of the score and providing a most effective foil for the almost wholly lyrical solo violin line. (This, by the way, is the only one of the discs in the three-record package that is available separately.) The recorded sound seems to have more bite and presence than is heard in the Sibelius and Prokofiev performances.

For me the most satisfying thing in the whole Mercury package is the Tchaikovsky Concerto, which, more often than not, I find rather tiresome. Here, however, Szeryng and Antal Dorati deliver a performance that teems with zest and youthful song, abetted by big and brilliant recorded sound. I hope it will be made available separately, too.

D. H.

PUCCINI: Madama Butterfly (see Best of the Month, page 109)

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

AUG 1967

Itzhak Pearlman:

A most auspicious debut

ⓈTHIS is the first recording by the young Israeli violinist Itzhak Perlman, and a most auspicious debut it is. A heady pairing has been chosen for the occasion: two works of incredible lushness and technical exigency in which this 21-year-old bucks the competition of Heifetz, Kogan, Milstein, Oistrakh, Ricci, Szeryng, and Francescatti—in short, most of the living grand masters of the violin. These recorded performances indicate that in this music, at least, he belongs in their company. This is playing of effortless beauty, large and smooth in tone, intensely communicative. Each score is presented in its most attractive light, and with no small thanks due Leinsdorf, whose ascetic style is surely welcome in music which teeters on the brink of the maudlin. RCA Victor's reproduction is excellent in all respects.

—H.G.

PROKOFIEV: Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 63; SIBELIUS: Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 47; Itzhak Perlman (violin); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2962 or Stereo LSC-2962, $5.79.

ALBERTO GINASTERA.. PIANO CONCERTO

116

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

MAR 16 1968

2 GINASTERA WORKS ON RCA BY LEINSDORF

BOSTON — RCA recorded two Ginastera works with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall on Wednesday (6). Joao Carlos Martins, who has been performing the "Piano Concerto" with the orchestra, was the soloist in that work. The other Ginastera piece was "Variaciones Concertantes." Richard Mohr was a&r procer.

Ginastera's new opera "Bomarzo" will have its New York premiere at a benefit performance of the New York City Opera on Thursday (14) at Lincoln Center, Julius Rudel, who conucted the work's world premiere with the Washington Opera Society, will conduct. Ginastera's "Don Rodrigo" had its U. S. premiere of the 1966 opening performance of the New York City Opera Co. at its new home at the New York State Theater.

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 13,000

MAR 30 1968

Latin American

RCA Cuts Ginastera Concerto in Boston

The Piano Concerto of composer Alberto Ginastera was recorded last week in Boston's Symphony Hall by Brazilian pianist Joao Carlos Martins with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, for RCA's Red Seal label.

The album will be a special release and will be in record stores the first week of April coincidental to performances in Lincoln Center of Ginastera's new opera, "Bomarzo," which was given its New York premiere on March 14 by the New York City Opera.

Announcement was made by Roger Hall, Manager, Red Seal A and R, who said: "Mr. Ginastera has emerged as one of the most exciting composers on the contemporary scene. Two of his operas, "Bomarzo" and "Don Rodrigo" currently are in the repertory of the New York City Opera, and this concerto recently was greeted with enthusiasm in a Philharmonic Hall performance. At that time, we decided it was an important work of which a major recording should be available to the public. We at once conferred with Maestro Leinsdorf, who agreed to postpone his vacation until after the recording sessions were completed."

Another Ginastera composition, "Variaciones Concertantes," also was recorded for inclusion in the album. This work is not currently available on disks.

Richard Mohr produced the album for Red Seal.

PROFOVIEV · VIOLIN CONCERTO NO 2.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

AUG 1967

Itzhak Pearlman:

A most auspicious debut

Ⓢ THIS is the first recording by the young Israeli violinist Itzhak Perlman, and a most auspicious debut it is. A heady pairing has been chosen for the occasion: two works of incredible lushness and technical exigency in which this 21-year-old bucks the competition of Heifetz, Kogan, Milstein, Oistrakh, Ricci, Szeryng, and Francescatti—in short, most of the living grand masters of the violin. These recorded performances indicate that in this music, at least, he belongs in their company. This is playing of effortless beauty, large and smooth in tone, intensely communicative. Each score is presented in its most attractive light, and with no small thanks due Leinsdorf, whose ascetic style is surely welcome in music which teeters on the brink of the maudlin. RCA Victor's reproduction is excellent in all respects. —H.G.

PROKOFIEV: Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Op. 63; SIBELIUS: Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 47; Itzhak Perlman (violin); Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LM-2962 or Stereo LSC-2962, $5.79.

Rozhdestvensky, Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt, Antal Dorati cond. MERCURY Ⓢ SR 3-9017, Ⓜ OL 3-117 three discs $17.37.

Performance: Brilliant and polished
Recording: Good
Stereo Quality: Good

The disc debut of the young Israeli violinist Itzhak Perlman is perhaps of foremost interest in the group of violin concertos under consideration here. Though crippled with polio and forced to play from a chair, Perlman won the coveted Leventritt Award in 1964 at the age of eighteen, and has since played with half a dozen major American orchestras. The present recording of the Prokofiev G Minor and Sibelius D Minor concertos came out of his appearances with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf this past season.

In addition to the two other versions of the Prokofiev concerto reviewed here, Perlman has recorded competition from such seasoned virtuosos as Heifetz, Stern, Milstein, and Ricci, but he more than holds his own, capturing with sweet yet penetrating tone the work's lyricism and brilliance.

In the even more virtuosic and rhapsodic Sibelius score, Heifetz, Szeryng, Oistrakh, and Ferras are Perlman's main competitors; and here I would say that the fantastic Heifetz reading is still tops for excitement, while Perlman and Christian Ferras come out neck-and-neck in terms of lyrical impulse. Incidentally, the Perlman disc is the only one currently available singly that offers the Sibelius and Prokofiev works back-to-back.

leaves little to be desired, though the recorded sound is somewhat brash and overreverberant at times.

The formidable violinistic prowess and polished musicianship of Henryk Szeryng need no further praise here. His previous recordings amply demonstrate his unerring intonation and flair for sustaining effortlessly the longest and most elaborately ornamented melodic lines. Szeryng and the Soviet conductor, Rozhdestvensky, take a broadly lyrical view of the Sibelius Concerto, as opposed to the somewhat more closely knit treatment of Perlman and Leinsdorf. The performance is a fine one on these terms, though the Mercury disc shows considerable sonic deterioration toward the end of its thirty-minute length, at least on my review copy. The Prokofiev performance is transparent and elegantly lyrical, though the sonics are

A telling asset of the Perlman-Leinsdorf disc is the gorgeous recorded sound. As against the Heifetz performances, which tend to give the orchestra something of a back seat, Perlman's violin emerges from the very midst of the orchestra without, however, being overwhelmed at any point. Leinsdorf's excellent orchestral accompaniments are recorded with more wealth of detail than I have every heard before in either the Prokofiev or Sibelius concertos—the percussion in the Prokofiev is a striking instance in point. From a sonic standpoint, all other recordings seem thin and pale alongside this one.

The name of Czech violinist Ladislav Jasek is a new one to me. In contrast to the penetrating sweetness of Perlman's tone and the polished brilliance of Szeryng's, Mr. Jasek's is robust and assertive, at least on this record. His reading of the Prokofiev concerto is exuberant, but the performance as a whole is not in the top class. What does lend the Artia disc special interest is the Second Violin Concerto of Karel Szymanowski (1882-1937), second only to Chopin among traditional Polish composers. Written two years before the Prokofiev G Minor, this was Szymanowski's last major work, and shows his late preoccupation with the musical idiom of the Tatra mountain folk. Szymanowski, in short, pursued a course similar to that of Bartók and Janáček in seeking an integration of regional idioms with the mainstream of the great classical tradition. The one-movement Second Violin Concerto shows this late manner in full bloom: the music is gorgeously sensual and rhapsodic, yet intensely virile in utterance and dynamic in rhythm. Mr. Jasek's big tone and exuberant musical ways are better suited to Szymanowski than to Prokofiev. The orchestral accompaniment under Martin Turnovsky's baton not quite up to those of the Perlman-Leinsdorf collaboration.

The Beethoven performance has Szeryng repeating, on a somewhat less inspired level, the essentials of his excellent reading done some fifteen years ago, with the late Jacques Thibaud conducting, and recently released on the Monitor label. Let it be said, however, that the orchestral accompaniment by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt here is of exceptional distinction and power, stressing the rugged strength of the score and providing a most effective foil for the almost wholly lyrical solo violin line. (This, by the way, is the only one of the discs in the three-record package that is available separately.) The recorded sound seems to have more bite and presence than is heard in the Sibelius and Prokofiev performances.

For me the most satisfying thing in the whole Mercury package is the Tchaikovsky Concerto, which, more often than not, I find rather tiresome. Here, however, Szeryng and Antal Dorati deliver a performance that teems with zest and youthful song, abetted by big and brilliant recorded sound. I hope it will be made available separately, too.

D. H.

PUCCINI: Madama Butterfly (see Best of the Month, page 109)

17

BRAHMS · PIANO CONCERTO NO 1

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

OCT 1967

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1, in D Minor, Op. 15; Piano Concerto No. 2, in B-flat, Op. 83. Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. (in the D Minor); RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra, Josef Krips cond. (in the B-flat). RCA VICTOR ⓢ TR3 5001 $10.95.

Performance: Good
Recording: Muffled
Stereo Quality: Close
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 94'04"

You get a lot for your money here: over an hour and a half of Rubinstein playing both Brahms concertos with more than adequate orchestral partnership. But you should also consider what you don't get. For one thing, there is no great sense of deep musical involvement—it is all very well done, but right across the top of the music without the larger inflections that Brahms seems always to demand. And the tape sound is dull and lifeless; an entire range of upper frequencies seems to have been lost somewhere along the line. The Boston recording is close-up; the studio job has a little more space around it. One hears reasonably well what is going on in both cases, but both recordings have an equally bad case of the muffles, producing an oppressive aural effect. E. S.

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

GERSHWIN: An American in Paris; "I Got Rhythm" Variations; Rhapsody in Blue; Cuban Overture; Concerto in F. Earl Wild (piano); Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler cond. RCA VICTOR ⓢ TR3 5006 $10.95.

MAURICE SEYMOUR

EARL WILD
Glittering piano for Rhapsody in Blue

Performance: Light and bright
Recording: Bright and reverberant
Stereo Quality: Fair
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 87'30"

All of the "serious Gershwin" with orchestra is included here, except for the Second Rhapsody. There is no other tape of the "I Got Rhythm" Variations, and to my surprise, none of the Concerto either. However, Leonard Bernstein offers formidable rivalry in his Columbia taping of the Rhapsody in Blue and American in Paris.

Arthur Fiedler, with Earl Wild playing glittering solo piano, turns in readings best described as light, bright, and perhaps a shade rigid. American in Paris not only comes off the best in performance here, but for me it remains the freshest and wittiest in its musical substance.

This is my first experience with RCA Victor 3¾ ips tape, and the recorded sound is well balanced and free of excessive mid-range equalization. The general miking of the Fiedler performances, however, allows a bit too much reverberation, thus obscuring unnecessarily the musical texture at climactic points of the Concerto and the Rhapsody. D. H.

THE PILOT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 149,900

OCT 14 1967

New England Newsclip

Music

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 3; Tragic Overture. Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA LSC 2936).

This is the best performance Leinsdorf has produced so far in his Brahms series, fully competitive with the top half-dozen or so (Szell, Karajan, Steinberg, Walter, Bernstein, etc.) among which one can choose according to personal taste, confident of receiving full value.

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1 in d. Rubinstein, Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA LSC 2917).

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1 (performers as above); Concerto No. 2 Rubinstein, Krips, RCA Orch. (RCA stereo tape TR3-50001).

Rubinstein's performance of No. 2, a classic for quite a few years, is coupled with an equally fine new performance of No. 1 in one of RCA's first half-speed tapes—bearing the equivalent of two discs, convenient for uninterrupted playing of long works, excellent in sound and list-priced slightly below the cost of two discs. A good investment for tape-fanciers.

The new reading of No. 1 meets and even surpasses the standards previously set by Rubinstein in records and live performances. It has my highest recommendation, along with the very different Curzon-Szell interpretation.

PROKOVIEV · ROMEO & JULIET

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1.293.800

MAR 14 1968

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Prokofieff: Music from Romeo and Juliet—Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC2994]. In his five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf has made few really exciting recordings, but those few have all been part of an outstanding series of Prokofieff's major works. For this latest in the series, Leinsdorf turns to the ballet score Romeo and Juliet, whose popularity has grown so much in recent years that it is now both a concert and ballet "standard." Thus Leinsdorf is already up against several superb LPs—the top two being by Ansermet [London CS6240] and Skrowaczewski [Mercury SR90315]. Whereas these two other conductors perform reworkings of the original ballet score as made by Prokofieff for several concert suites, Leinsdorf has gone to the ballet and adapted his own suite. It is a first-rate one, and follows the sequence of the story a bit better than do the others. Leinsdorf's performance is not always as crisp as Ansermet's nor as expressive as Skrowaczewski's, but it is indeed the most lyrically glowing. (R.H.)

Leinsdorf: own suite

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

The Blade
Toledo, O.
P. M. - circ. 182.023
Sun. - circ. 182.996

OCT-17-67

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Schumann: Piano Concerto in A minor, Opus 54; Novelettes Opus 21, Nos. 1 & 2—Chicago Symphony, Carlo Maria Giulini conducting; Artur Rubinstein, pianist. RCA-Victor IM-2997.

A wonderfully integrated, intimate collaboration between orchestra conductor, and the master pianist in a delightful, romantic rendition. No one seems to be able to perform this kind of music with the same spirit as does Rubinstein, and he found in this recording a marvelously tuned partner in the Chicago Symphony with no little credit to the guest conductor. And then those charming novelettes, played perfectly.

Moussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition; Britten: The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra—Chicago Symphony, Seiji Ozawa conducting. RCA Victor LM-2977.

Ozawa's association with the Chicagoans started in 1963 when at 27 he conducted them at the Ravinia Festival. That July 16 concert must seem historic to him now, for by August he was awarded a 3-year contract as music director of the festival, a contract that has been extended through the '69 season.

Ozawa and the Chicagoans are happy making music together, as previous recordings have proven, and so in this recording. Delightful! And a nod to Martinon who has built the Chicago Orchestra to its present degree of achievement.

Schumann: Fantasia in C, Opus 17; Brahams: Sonata in F sharp minor, Opus 2—Ludwig Olshansky, pianist. Monitor MCS (C)-2127.

A formidable and superbly engineered recording by a genuinely gifted young pianist of two works which are somehow related. Schumann's Fantasia had its beginnings in 1835, dedicated to Franz Liszt, a lifelong champion and performer of Schumann's music.

Originally the composer wanted it somehow related to a momument which was to be erected to Beethoven, but as in all of his music, Schumann's monument to his wife Clara is beautifully realized. The Brahms Sonata was published at Schuman's instigation and "respectfully dedicated to Frau Clara Schumann."

An early work in Brahms' life, it has mastery that anticipates the mature Brahms and it is played here with immense sensitivity, insight and refinement. A beautiful recording of two beautiful and not frequently heard works.

Berg: Lulu Suite; Schoenberg: Theme and Variations, Opus 43 B; Webern: Im Sommerwind; Three Pieces for Orchestra—The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting. Columbia ML-6441.

This is deeply felt, if not yet completely accepted music by three composers who broke out of the Viennese romantic tradition, although the romantic strain is clearly there and never to be denied.

These composers are the parents of the 12-tone school of music, but don't let that frighten you—in the hands of masters, the music always sounds. It's logical, intelligent, understandable even if at first it sounds strange, forbidding even. And I can't imagine any other conductor and orchestra doing a better performance of these pieces, than the Philadelphians and Ormandy, who knew Berg, and who also world-premiered the Webern orchestral pieces.

Prokofieff: Music from Romeo and Juliet—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA Victor LM-2994.

A splendorous performance of music that was at first rejected as serviceable to either Shakespeare's poignant play of the star-crossed lovers of 16th century Verona or to the ballet. Negotiations began in 1934 in Leningrad. Prokofieff wrote furiously during the summer of '35, but since the ballet was not forthcoming, he shrewdly extracted from his score several scintillating concert suites, which during his visit in 1937-38 he conducted in Chicago and Boston.

The ballet was first mounted in Brno, Czechoslovakia, in 1938, and when it finally reached the Bolshoi production in December, 1946, it was total balletic theater. It has remained an enduring favorite of both balletic and concert repertoire ever since.

17

BRAHMS · PIANO CONCERTO NO 1

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

OCT 1967

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1, in D Minor, Op. 15; Piano Concerto No. 2, in B-flat, Op. 83. Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. (in the D Minor); RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra, Josef Krips cond. (in the B-flat). RCA VICTOR ⓢ TR3 5001 $10.95.

Performance: Good
Recording: Muffled
Stereo Quality: Close
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 94'04"

You get a lot for your money here: over an hour and a half of Rubinstein playing both Brahms concertos with more than adequate orchestral partnership. But you should also consider what you don't get. For one thing, there is no great sense of deep musical involvement—it is all very well done, but right across the top of the music without the larger inflections that Brahms seems always to demand. And the tape sound is dull and lifeless; an entire range of upper frequencies seems to have been lost somewhere along the line. The Boston recording is close-up; the studio job has a little more space around it. One hears reasonably well what is going on in both cases, but both recordings have an equally bad case of the muffles, producing an oppressive aural effect. E. S.

RECORDING OF SPECIAL MERIT

GERSHWIN: An American in Paris; "I Got Rhythm" Variations; Rhapsody in Blue; Cuban Overture; Concerto in F. Earl Wild (piano); Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler cond. RCA VICTOR ⓢ TR3 5006 $10.95.

MAURICE SEYMOUR

EARL WILD
Glittering piano for Rhapsody in Blue

Performance: Light and bright
Recording: Bright and reverberant
Stereo Quality: Fair
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 87'30"

All of the "serious Gershwin" with orchestra is included here, except for the Second Rhapsody. There is no other tape of the "I Got Rhythm" Variations, and to my surprise, none of the Concerto either. However, Leonard Bernstein offers formidable rivalry in his Columbia taping of the Rhapsody in Blue and American in Paris.

Arthur Fiedler, with Earl Wild playing glittering solo piano, turns in readings best described as light, bright, and perhaps a shade rigid. American in Paris not only comes off the best in performance here, but for me it remains the freshest and wittiest in its musical substance.

This is my first experience with RCA Victor 3¾ ips tape, and the recorded sound is well balanced and free of excessive mid-range equalization. The general miking of the Fiedler performances, however, allows a bit too much reverberation, thus obscuring unnecessarily the musical texture at climactic points of the Concerto and the Rhapsody. D. H.

THE PILOT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 149,900

OCT 14 1967

New England Newsclip

Music

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 3; Tragic Overture. Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA LSC 2936).

This is the best performance Leinsdorf has produced so far in his Brahms series, fully competitive with the top half-dozen or so (Szell, Karajan, Steinberg, Walter, Bernstein, etc.) among which one can choose according to personal taste, confident of receiving full value.

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1 in d. Rubinstein, Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf (RCA LSC 2917).

BRAHMS: Piano Concerto No. 1 (performers as above); Concerto No. 2 Rubinstein, Krips, RCA Orch. (RCA stereo tape TR3-50001).

Rubinstein's performance of No. 2, a classic for quite a few years, is coupled with an equally fine new performance of No. 1 in one of RCA's first half-speed tapes—bearing the equivalent of two discs, convenient for uninterrupted playing of long works, excellent in sound and list-priced slightly below the cost of two discs. A good investment for tape-fanciers.

The new reading of No. 1 meets and even surpasses the standards previously set by Rubinstein in records and live performances. It has my highest recommendation, along with the very different Curzon-Szell interpretation.

PROKOFIEV · ROMEO & JULIET

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 1,293,800

MAR 14 1968

CLASSICAL ALBUM OF THE WEEK

Prokofieff: Music from Romeo and Juliet—Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony [RCA Victor LSC2994]. In his five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf has made few really exciting recordings, but those few have all been part of an outstanding series of Prokofieff's major works. For this latest in the series, Leinsdorf turns to the ballet score Romeo and Juliet, whose popularity has grown so much in recent years that it is now both a concert and ballet "standard." Thus Leinsdorf is already up against several superb LPs—the top two being by Ansermet [London CS6240] and Skrowaczewski [Mercury SR90315]. Whereas these two other conductors perform reworkings of the original ballet score as made by Prokofieff for several concert suites, Leinsdorf has gone to the ballet and adapted his own suite. It is a first-rate one, and follows the sequence of the story a bit better than do the others. Leinsdorf's performance is not always as crisp as Ansermet's nor as expressive as Skrowaczewski's, but it is indeed the most lyrically glowing. (R.H.)

Leinsdorf: own suite

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Schumann: Piano Concerto in A minor, Opus 54; Novelettes Opus 21, Nos. 1 & 2—Chicago Symphony, Carlo Maria Giulini conducting; Artur Rubinstein, pianist. RCA-Victor IM-2997.

A wonderfully integrated, intimate collaboration between orchestra conductor, and the master pianist in a delightful, romantic rendition. No one seems to be able to perform this kind of music with the same spirit as does Rubinstein, and he found in this recording a marvelously tuned partner in the Chicago Symphony with no little credit to the guest conductor. And then those charming novelettes, played perfectly.

Moussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition; Britten: The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra—Chicago Symphony. Seiji Ozawa conducting. RCA Victor LM-2977.

Ozawa's association with the Chicagoans started in 1963 when at 27 he conducted them at the Ravinia Festival. That July 16 concert must seem historic to him now, for by August he was awarded a 3-year contract as music director of the festival, a contract that has been extended through the '69 season.

Ozawa and the Chicagoans are happy making music together, as previous recordings have proven, and so in this recording. Delightful! And a nod to Martinon who has built the Chicago Orchestra to its present degree of achievement.

Schumann: Fantasia in C, Opus 17; Brahams: Sonata in F sharp minor, Opus 2—Ludwig Olshansky, pianist. Monitor MCS (C)-2127.

A formidable and superbly engineered recording by a genuinely gifted young pianist of two works which are somehow related. Schumann's Fantasia had its beginnings in 1835, dedicated to Franz Liszt, a lifelong champion and performer of Schumann's music.

Originally the composer wanted it somehow related to a momument which was to be erected to Beethoven, but as in all of his music, Schumann's monument to his wife Clara is beautifully realized. The Brahms Sonata was published at Schuman's instigation and "respectfully dedicated to Frau Clara Schumann."

An early work in Brahms' life, it has mastery that anticipates the mature Brahms and it is played here with immense sensitivity, insight and refinement. A beautiful recording of two beautiful and not frequently heard works.

Berg: Lulu Suite; Schoenberg: Theme and Variations, Opus 43 B; Webern: Im Sommerwind; Three Pieces for Orchestra—The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting. Columbia ML-6441.

This is deeply felt, if not yet completely accepted music by three composers who broke out of the Viennese romantic tradition, although the romantic strain is clearly there and never to be denied.

These composers are the parents of the 12-tone school of music, but don't let that frighten you—in the hands of masters, the music always sounds. It's logical, intelligent, understandable even if at first it sounds strange, forbidding even. And I can't imagine any other conductor and orchestra doing a better performance of these pieces, than the Philadelphians and Ormandy, who knew Berg, and who also world-premiered the Webern orchestral pieces.

Prokofieff: Music from Romeo and Juliet—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA Victor LM-2994.

A splendorous performance of music that was at first rejected as serviceable to either Shakespeare's poignant play of the star-crossed lovers of 16th century Verona or to the ballet. Negotiations began in 1934 in Leningrad. Prokofieff wrote furiously during the summer of '35, but since the ballet was not forthcoming, he shrewdly extracted from his score several scintillating concert suites, which during his visit in 1937-38 he conducted in Chicago and Boston.

The ballet was first mounted in Brno, Czechoslovakia, in 1938, and when it finally reached the Bolshoi production in December, 1946, it was total balletic theater. It has remained an enduring favorite of both balletic and concert repertoire ever since.

PROKOVIEV: SYMPHONY NO 3

118

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY NO 4

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

SEP 27 1967 New England Newsclip

Discology

Recordings of Bruckner

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

The ARTS

Symphony No. 0 is the designation given to an early D minor Symphony by Bruckner, first performed 28 years after his death, though composed in 1863-64 with considerable revisions in 1869. Those dates place it on both sides of the official Symphony No. 1. The "zero" is a very attractive work, with lots of Schubert and a little Wagner along with incipient Bruckner, and it has been very well recorded by the Concertgebouw Orchestra under Bernard Haitink (Philips 500-131/900-131).

The real Symphony No. 1 in C minor, is also agreeable, in some respect not so mature as the best parts of No. 0, and, of course, less grandiloquent than the later, better known works, and lacking certain features that always show up in the later symphonies, for example, the chorale themes and the big general pauses. No. 1 has been recorded by the Berlin Philharmonic under Eugen Jochum (Deutsche Grammophon 19131-139131), who scatters the form by slowing down drastically for the second theme groups in the first and last movement—a pity for the performance is otherwise very good, and it is the only one available.

Jochum has a similar performance of the C minor Symphony, No. 2, another attractive work, this time with the Orchestra of the Bavarian Radio (Deutsche Grammophon 139132).

★

All the Bruckner symphonies are, in a sense, re-experiencing of the Beethoven 9th, and the Third declares its allegiance more literally than the others. It is a work of great strength, and with many charms. George Szell's recording with the Cleveland Orchestra (Columbia 6297-6897) unfortunately uses the weaker 1890 edition; conducting and playing are very good, though the performance is sometimes a bit rigid.

There are several recent records of the Symphony No. 4. Istvan Kertesz conducts the London Smphony in an excellent performance in a brisk and tight style (London 9480-6480). The performance by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony is generally logy, and dully recorded besides (RCA Victor 2915). Jochum's Berlin Philharmonic performance is eloquent at its best, but often fussy and uconcentrated: he uses Bruckner's original score, but here, as in many of his Bruckner interpretations, it often seems that he is still wedded to the spirit of the Wagnerian revisions he played and heard in his youth.

His version takes three sides, the fourth being filled out in a valuable way by five of Bruckner's motets, of which the late "Virga Jesse" and "Ecce sacerdos magnus" are especially impressive. In these Jochum conducts the chorus of the Bavarian Radio in performance that are beautiful, unless too reverent (Deutsche Grammophon 19134-5/139134-5, 2 records).

Jochum's performance of the relatively unfamiliar and highly interesting and adventurous Symphony No. 6 in A is quite straightforward and effective (Deutsche Grammophon 19136-139136), and for its greater energy and better sound is preferable to the performance, also a good one, by Heinz Bongartz and the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra (Philips World Series PHC 9048).

★

There are four new recordings of the Symphony No. 7. Two are of little consequence: that by Georg Solti and the Vienna Philharmonic for its glossy vulgarity, though the filler "Siegfried Idyll" is interesting as a demonstration "in nuce" of what is wrong with Solti's Wagner (London 7216-2216, 2 records); and that by Max Rudolf and the Cincinnati Symphony for its rough sound, certain awkward discontinuities, and prosaic atmosphere (Decca 10139/710139).

Haitink with the Concertgebouw gives a strong, steady, simple performance, that can be recommended. The fourth side has an excellent performance of the splendid "Te Deum," with the Netherlands Radio Chorus, and a good solo quartet, Ely Ameling, Anna Reynolds, Horst Hoffmann, Guus Hoekman (Philips 2-598/2-998, 2 records).

Jochum with the Berlin Philharmonic takes his usual liberties, achieves altogether one of the most moving performances ever recorded, though not really of the Bruckner 7th. The album is filled out with three notets, one an especially beautiful setting of the hymn, "Vexilla regis"; also the 150th Psalm, with Maria Stader as soprano soloist (Deutsche Grammophon 19137-8/139137-8).

Jochum's performance of the first movement of the Symphony No. 9 seems thoroughly confused (beginning with an inability, shared by many conductors, to get the rhythm of the first 18 bars right); the Scherzo goes well, and the final Adagio is spacious and eloquent.

The Berlin Philharmonic plays very well, and for the filler Jochum has a performance of the "Te Deum" that is more exciting than Haitink's, though this is achieved by characteristic over-emphasis. Soloists are Stader, Sieglinde Wagner, Ernst Haefeiger, Peter Lagger (Deutsche Grammophon 19117-8/139117-8).

HI-FI BUYERS GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.

FALL-WINTER 1967

☆ Prokofiev: Symphony No. 3. Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor LSC-2934. $5.79. How like a scientist Erich Leinsdorf dissects the structure of a piece of music! He does it objectively, analytically, and thoroughly. In the barbaric, colorful Scythian Suite and Third Symphony of Serge Prokofiev, this treatment robs the music of its passion and power.

To bare their bones is not enough, even with the superlative orchestral playing and brilliant recording that grace this disc.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 180,833 SUN. 186,074

NOV 15 1967

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Bruckner: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic")—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA-Victor LM-2915.

Now that Mehlar is enjoying a renaissance, this Bruckner recording is a happy introduction to the unsophisticated, virile, broad-chested music of his, as yet, underestimated Austrian. Bruckner speaks in his own way, not vehemently, not sarcastically but always with authority, sturdiness, faith. The Bostonians sound at their best.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

SEP 1967

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 3; Scythian Suite (Ala and Lolly). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR Ⓢ LSC 2934, Ⓜ LM 2934* $5.79.

Performance: Spectacular
Recording: Brilliant
Stereo Quality: Excellent

Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3 (1929) is a parallel in his catalog to Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler." Just as the musical materials for the latter were drawn from an opera, so the Prokofiev Third is derived from the opera The Flaming Angel (1922-1925), which, after apparently conclusive rejection, was withdrawn by the composer in 1927. Within two years, however, its materials were recast in the form of the Third Symphony, which was given its first performance in 1929 by Monteux in Paris.

(Continued on page 104)

Whereas the Hindemith work is so successful a reworking of older materials that the symphony is widely regarded to be his masterpiece (I am startled to observe that this once so popular contemporary work is now represented in the Schwann catalog by only two recordings!), the Russian composer's Third, compared to his more characteristic work in the form, might give rise to some suspicion if one were unaware of its origins. The normally concise formal plans give way here to shapes that are less cleanly defined, although not of significantly more pronounced subtlety or complexity. While I'm certain that it all works on paper, the score seems to require some explanation for its continuity other than a purely analytical one. Obviously, it is its relationship to the dramatic events of the opera.

This apart, it's an uncommonly interesting and powerful work. It broods relentlessly, reaches climaxes of hair-raising power, and its musical ideas—even if Prokofiev hasn't quite succeeded in casting them into classical forms—are as compelling as any to be found in the composer's work.

The grinding, assaulting, and powerful Scythian Suite (1914) is, if not ubiquitous in public performance or recording, a rather better known commodity, if for no other reason than its having been the work that established Prokofiev as a new enfant terrible and, in that day, a rival to Stravinsky's position as high man on the totem pole of Russian neo-primitivism. For all of its precocity and (I do not say this disparagingly) entertainment value, one sees it today rather as a precursor of the more normal, neo-Romantic direction that Prokofiev's music would ultimately take. As a rival to Le Sacre du printemps, it is nowhere.

Although neither of these works is extensively represented on recordings (Abravanel's Third and Dorati's Scythian are the only likely competition) it is no victory by default that Leinsdorf has won here. His performances are spectacular. A conductor of a somewhat Central-European intellectual bent, he is doing a complete Prokofiev series for RCA Victor that shows him to be a little suppressive of the outsized neo-Romanticism of the later works, but considerably happier with the challenge of a work like the Third or the Sixth—neither of which yields its secrets easily.

Every so often, the tasteless enthusiasm with which RCA Victor promotes its own product—aided and abetted by its usually distinguished roster of annotators—rubs me so sharply the wrong way that I find myself lengthening (and sometimes dulling the enthusiastic tone of) a review in complaint. I suppose that Louis Biancolli is entitled to his opinion that Prokofiev is "a master of masters" (nothing in his remarks suggests that his meaning is limited even to "contemporary masters"), even though I have never heard even a remote suggestion of this made by any other informed observer. But where facts are involved, if Victor's annotators can't cool it a little, their editors might get a-hold of themselves. ". . . The Flaming Angel is now established as a modern masterpiece, and the Third Symphony has found its way into the world repertory of classics." Baloney! The facts: the only opera composed since World War I even suspected of being so "established" (by the common consent that the word implies) is Berg's Wozzeck, and the majority of those who subscribe to the world's opera houses would give you a fierce argument about that; and the only Prokofiev symphonies for which such a claim might reasonably be made are the "Classical" Symphony and the Fifth; the Third is infrequently enough performed to be regarded (when it is) as a revival item.

Victor's recorded sound is superb, and the stereo treatment generates excitement of its own.

W. F.

PROKOVIEV: SYMPHONY NO 3

118

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY no 4

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

SEP 27 1967

New England Newsclip

Discology

Recordings of Bruckner

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

The ARTS

Symphony No. 0 is the designation given to an early D minor Symphony by Bruckner, first performed 28 years after his death, though composed in 1863-64 with considerable revisions in 1869. Those dates place it on both sides of the official Symphony No. 1. The "zero" is a very attractive work, with lots of Schubert and a little Wagner along with incipient Bruckner, and it has been very well recorded by the Concertgebouw Orchestra under Bernard Haitink (Philips 500-131/900-131).

The real Symphony No. 1 in C minor, is also agreeable, in some respect not so mature as the best parts of No. 0, and, of course, less grandiloquent than the later, better known works, and lacking certain features that always show up in the later symphonies, for example, the chorale themes and the big general pauses. No. 1 has been recorded by the Berlin Philharmonic under Eugen Jochum (Deutsche Grammophon 19131-139131), who scatters the form by slowing down drastically for the second theme groups in the first and last movement—a pity for the performance is otherwise very good, and it is the only one available.

Jochum has a similar performance of the C minor Symphony, No. 2, another attractive work, this time with the Orchestra of the Bavarian Radio (Deutsche Grammophon 139132).

★

All the Bruckner symphonies are, in a sense, reexperiencing of the Beethoven 9th, and the Third declares its allegiance more literally than the others. It is a work of great strength, and with many charms. George Szell's recording with the Cleveland Orchestra (Columbia 6297-6897) unfortunately uses the weaker 1890 edition; conducting and playing are very good, though the performance is sometimes a bit rigid.

There are several recent records of the Symphony No. 4. Istvan Kertesz conducts the London Smphony in an excellent performance in a brisk and tight style (London 9480-6480). The performance by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony is generally logy, and dully recorded besides (RCA Victor 2915). Jochum's Berlin Philharmonic performance is eloquent at its best, but often fussy and uconcentrated: he uses Bruckner's original score, but here, as in many of his Bruckner interpretations, it often seems that he is still wedded to the spirit of the Wagnerian revisions he played and heard in his youth.

His version takes three sides, the fourth being filled out in a valuable way by five of Bruckner's motets, of which the late "Virga Jesse" and "Ecce sacerdos magnus" are especially impressive. In these Jochum conducts the chorus of the Bavarian Radio in performance that are beautiful, unless too reverent (Deutsche Grammophon 19134-5/139134-5, 2 records).

Jochum's performance of the relatively unfamiliar and highly interesting and adventurous Symphony No. 6 in A is quite straightforward and effective (Deutsche Grammophon 19136-139136), and for its greater energy and better sound is preferable to the performance, also a good one, by Heinz Bongartz and the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra (Philips World Series PHC 9048).

★

There are four new recordings of the Symphony No. 7. Two are of little consequence: that by Georg Solti and the Vienna Philharmonic for its glossy vulgarity, though the filler "Siegfried Idyll" is interesting as a demonstration "in nuce" of what is wrong with Solti's Wagner (London 7216-2216, 2 records); and that by Max Rudolf and the Cincinnati Symphony for its rough sound, certain awkward discontinuities, and prosaic atmosphere (Decca 10139/710139).

Haitink with the Concertgebouw gives a strong, steady, simple performance, that can be recommended. The fourth side has an excellent performance of the splendid "Te Deum," with the Netherlands Radio Chorus, and a good solo quartet, Ely Ameling, Anna Reynolds, Horst Hoffmann, Guus Hoekman (Philips 2-598/2-998, 2 records).

Jochum with the Berlin Philharmonic takes his usual liberties, achieves altogether one of the most moving performances ever recorded, though not really of the Bruckner 7th. The album is filled out with three notets, one an especially beautiful setting of the hymn, "Vexilla regis"; also the 150th Psalm, with Maria Stader as soprano soloist (Deutsche Grammophon 19137-8/139137-8).

Jochum's performance of the first movement of the Symphony No. 9 seems thoroughly confused (beginning with an inability, shared by many conductors, to get the rhythm of the first 18 bars right); the Scherzo goes well, and the final Adagio is spacious and eloquent.

The Berlin Philharmonic plays very well, and for the filler Jochum has a performance of the "Te Deum" that is more exciting than Haitink's, though this is achieved by characteristic over-emphasis. Soloists are Stader, Sieglinde Wagner, Ernst Haefeiger, Peter Lagger (Deutsche Grammophon 19117-8/139117-8).

HI-FI BUYER'S GUIDE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
FALL-WINTER 1967

☆ Prokofiev: Symphony No. 3. Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor LSC-2934. $5.79. How like a scientist Erich Leinsdorf dissects the structure of a piece of music! He does it objectively, analytically, and thoroughly. In the barbaric, colorful Scythian Suite and Third Symphony of Serge Prokofiev, this treatment robs the music of its passion and power.

To bare their bones is not enough, even with the superlative orchestral playing and brilliant recording that grace this disc.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 180,833 SUN. 186,074

NOV 15 1967

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Bruckner: Symphony No. 4 in E flat ("Romantic")—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA-Victor LM-2915.

Now that Mehlar is enjoying a renaissance, this Bruckner recording is a happy introduction to the unsophisticated, virile, broad-chested music of his, as yet, underestimated Austrian. Bruckner speaks in his own way, not vehemently, not sarcastically but always with authority, sturdiness, faith. The Bostonians sound at their best.

HI FI STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400

SEP 1967

PROKOFIEV: Symphony No. 3; Scythian Suite (Ala and Lolly). Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA VICTOR (S) LSC 2934, (M) LM 2934* $5.79.

Performance: Spectacular
Recording: Brilliant
Stereo Quality: Excellent

Prokofiev's Symphony No. 3 (1929) is a parallel in his catalog to Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler." Just as the musical materials for the latter were drawn from an opera, so the Prokofiev Third is derived from the opera The Flaming Angel (1922-1925), which, after apparently conclusive rejection, was withdrawn by the composer in 1927. Within two years, however, its materials were recast in the form of the Third Symphony, which was given its first performance in 1929 by Monteux in Paris.

(Continued on page 104)

Whereas the Hindemith work is so successful a reworking of older materials that the symphony is widely regarded to be his masterpiece (I am startled to observe that this once so popular contemporary work is now represented in the Schwann catalog by only two recordings!), the Russian composer's Third, compared to his more characteristic work in the form, might give rise to some suspicion if one were unaware of its origins. The normally concise formal plans give way here to shapes that are less cleanly defined, although not of significantly more pronounced subtlety or complexity. While I'm certain that it all works on paper, the score seems to require some explanation for its continuity other than a purely analytical one. Obviously, it is its relationship to the dramatic events of the opera.

This apart, it's an uncommonly interesting and powerful work. It broods relentlessly, reaches climaxes of hair-raising power, and its musical ideas—even if Prokofiev hasn't quite succeeded in casting them into classical forms—are as compelling as any to be found in the composer's work.

The grinding, assaulting, and powerful Scythian Suite (1914) is, if not ubiquitous in public performance or recording, a rather better known commodity, if for no other reason than its having been the work that established Prokofiev as a new enfant terrible and, in that day, a rival to Stravinsky's position as high man on the totem pole of Russian neo-primitivism. For all of its precocity and (I do not say this disparagingly) entertainment value, one sees it today rather as a precursor of the more normal, neo-Romantic direction that Prokofiev's music would ultimately take. As a rival to Le Sacre du printemps, it is nowhere.

Although neither of these works is extensively represented on recordings (Abravanel's Third and Dorati's Scythian are the only likely competition) it is no victory by default that Leinsdorf has won here. His performances are spectacular. A conductor of a somewhat Central-European intellectual bent, he is doing a complete Prokofiev series for RCA Victor that shows him to be a little suppressive of the outsized neo-Romanticism of the later works, but considerably happier with the challenge of a work like the Third or the Sixth—neither of which yields its secrets easily.

Every so often, the tasteless enthusiasm with which RCA Victor promotes its own product—aided and abetted by its usually distinguished roster of annotators—rubs me so sharply the wrong way that I find myself lengthening (and sometimes dulling the enthusiastic tone of) a review in complaint. I suppose that Louis Biancolli is entitled to his opinion that Prokofiev is "a master of masters" (nothing in his remarks suggests that his meaning is limited even to "contemporary masters"), even though I have never heard even a remote suggestion of this made by any other informed observer. But where facts are involved, if Victor's annotators can't cool it a little, their editors might get a-hold of themselves. ". . . The Flaming Angel is now established as a modern masterpiece, and the Third Symphony has found its way into the world repertory of classics." Baloney! The facts: the only opera composed since World War I even suspected of being so "established" (by the common consent that the word implies) is Berg's Wozzeck, and the majority of those who subscribe to the world's opera houses would give you a fierce argument about that; and the only Prokofiev symphonies for which such a claim might reasonably be made are the "Classical" Symphony and the Fifth; the Third is infrequently enough performed to be regarded (when it is) as a revival item.

Victor's recorded sound is superb, and the stereo treatment generates excitement of its own.

W. F.

119

ELIOT CARTER - PIANO CONCERTO

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 400,124

APR 2 1968

On Records

3 Modern Composers On New Victor Releases

By Ron Eyer

Continuing a recent policy by major record companies of issuing a wide selection of contemporary music on commercial labels (a policy which they freely admit may be of questionable financial value to them), Victor lately has released two recordings by the Boston Symphony under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf of music by Irving Fine, including his Symphony 1962, "Toccata Concertante," and "Serious Song for String Orchestra"; Elliott Carter's Piano Concerto, with Jacob Lateiner as soloist, and Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As."

Erich Leinsdorf

In mentioning the recording company's largess, it should be noted, however, that the disk containing the Carter and the Colgrass works were made possible by grants from two foundations and the National Council on the Arts. Nevertheless, Victor deserves a round of applause from all those interested in the music of modern composers for having processed, promoted and distributed the record. They apparently did the Irving Fine on their own, although the recording was made under the auspices of Brandeis University.

Carter, whose acrid concerto may be as hard going for the listener as it certainly was for the heroic pianist, is a well-known quantity. His ultra-dissonant, deeply involuted music is no easier to fathom at first hearing than were his Variations for Orchestra of his string quartets. He is a frankly cerebral composer, although instrumental color, rhythmic movement and sheer noise make his music difficult to ignore.

Fine and Colgrass are not so well known. Fine, born in 1914, died in 1962, just as he was hitting his stride, it appears, with the symphony, which was completed in the year of his death. Fine was unlike many composers of his generation in that he was not an all-out atonalist, an all-out serialist, not at all embarrassed to admit his ties to the past. respect for the traditions of his art, and he was not all embarrassed to admit his ties to the past. He could juggle tonalities and intervalic relationships with the best—or the worst—of them, but he seemed never to forget that music is essentially a form of communication, so that there always is an appeal, either to the heart or to the mind, in the music he wrote. The average listener, no doubt, will find his "Serious Song," which he calls a "Lament for String Orchestra," the most immediately accessible of the works on the present record.

Colgrass, a native of Chicago, is a percussion player and he probably is best known hereabouts for his score for Gerald Arpino's ballet "Sea Shadow," which is in the repertoire of the City Center Joffrey Ballet. "As Quiet As" is based on a compilation by Constance Fauci of fourth-graders' completions of the sentence that begins: "Let's be as quiet as . . ." Colgrass chose seven of the youngsters' answers, including "A leaf turning color," "An ant walking," "Children sleeping" and "Time passing." A Beethoven sonatina appears briefly in the last two. As might be expected of a percussionist, Colgrass' music, as represented here, is mainly coloristic. He has a fine ear for the atmospheric effects orchestral instruments can make, individually and in combination. An you don't have to concentrate very hard to visualize the child-like images he is envisioning.

* * *

Of rather special interest in current releases is a recording from Seraphim of the young Italian piano wizard, Maurizio Pollini, of Chopin's Piano Concerto No. 1. Pollini is not only a tremendous technician but a sensitive poet of his instrument. He will be heard here next season in a Long Island concert series.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, March 24, 1968

Recordings

The Word on Carter's Concerto: 'Original'

By JOAN SIMMONS

The world premiere of Elliot Carter's Piano Concerto performed by Jacob Lateiner and the Boston Symphony Orchestra has now been released by RCA Victor (LM, LSC-3001, mono and stereo, one record).

The recording was made from the two live performances presented in Symphony Hall in January of 1967 under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf and sponsored by grants from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc., the Steinway Foundation and the National Council on the Arts.

The financial support is necessary because the recording will never carry its own weight in sales. It isn't anticipated to attract wide popular attention and following. In fact if it were not for the recording the concerto would have come close to extinction following the two Boston performances.

The concerto is a highly experimental work which was commissioned by Lateiner and dedicated to Stravinsky.

The word most frequently used to describe Carter's talent is original, and that is perhaps one of the most appropriate means of describing his concerto. It develops along lines quite distinct from those of the traditional concerto.

COMPOSER ELLIOT CARTER
Begins one place, ends in another . . .

There are only two movements, rather than four, and these develop forward in a steady line with no reiteration of theme or recapitulation of the beginning in the conclusion. It begins in one place and ends in another.

The relationship of soloist and orchestra is also changed and they are combined with the intervening voice of a concertino. Rather than complementing one another, soloist and orchestra begin more or less as one and develop separately.

Lateiner's performance of the work is assured and controlled while the music itself presents a challenge to the listener, almost daring acceptance or rejection, but not passivity.

Incidentally, the structure of the concerto makes the choice of jacket design particularly peculiar as it is a photo of a 1953 sculpture by Seymour Lipton which most resembles a snail in line and contour, curving about and back onto itself in a sort of self-completion without having developed upon the original line or having proceeded past the point of origin.

More likely some passages of the concerto could be compared to the line of progress of a snail rather than the design of its chasis.

Second Challenge

A second challenge, this one to the imagination, is presented by Michael Colgrass' "As Quiet As," . . . "dedicated to children with love and with hope."

"As Quiet As" . . . A Leaf Turning Color . . . An Uninhibited Creek . . . etc." is as charming as the title indicates and in sharp contrast to the Carter Piano Concerto. It rounds out the Carter recording.

"As Quiet As" was first performed in 1966 at Tanglewood under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

ORGAN RECITALS

120

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
CIRC. 79,350

NOV 13 1967 New England News

Hub Symphony Organist Gives Local Workshop

Berj Zamkochian, the organist of the Boston Symphomy Ochestra, conducted an organ workshop Sunday for the Springfield Chapter of the American Guild of Oranists at the Old First Church.

Zamkochian appeared under emphasis on the role of the contemporary church organist. He demonstrated various techniques on the Old First Church organ as he covered practice methods, hymn-playing, improvisation technique, and repertory.

Charles Page, minister of music at Old First Church said that about 50 people attended the workshop.

'amkochian appeared under the co-sponsorship of the organists' guild and the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. Tuesday he will appear with the symphony at the Municipal Auditorium for an organ concert.

Zamkochian and the symphony will present the Poulenc "Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani," and the Saint Saens Third (Organ) Symphony

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

NOV 15 1967 New England Newsclip

Zamkochian, Hub Symphony Slated At Assumption Prep

WORCESTER — Berj Zamkochian and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a concert for organ and orchestra at 8:30 p.m. Sunday in Herbert Memorial Auditorium at Assumption Preparatory School.

The concert, which will include a world premiere of the newest work by Rochester composer, William Ferris, "Concerto for Organ and Stringed Orchestra," is sponsored by the D'Alzon Club of Assumption Prep.

Zamkochian, organist for the Boston Symphony, will be featured as soloist and conductor for the concert. He recently returned from his second appearance in the Soviet Union, and is the only American organist ever to appear in that country.

Ferris, who will be present for the premiere, is the organist and choirmaster of Bishop Fulton J. Sheen's Sacred Heart Cathedral in Rochester.

The young composer already has had more than a dozen works published in the United States.

A champagne reception will follow in the lobby of the Hebert Memorial Auditorium.

The concert is one in a series in the performing arts presented by the D'Alzon Club. On Dec. 17, the group will present the Worcester Orchestra, under the direction of Harry Levenson, in a Christmas concert.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

OCT 22 1967 New England Newsclip

SONYA HAMILTON, creator of the "Meet the Arts" series for Channel 2's "21-Inch Classroom," will be guest speaker at the opening Youth Concert on Nov. 4 at Symphony Hall, presented by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Harry Ellis Dickson.

BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN, organist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first American organist to tour the Soviet Union, will present works of contemporary Russian composers at his recital at the Methuen Memorial Music Hall on Wednesday at 8:30 p.m.

NEWS (e)
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
CIRC. 6,800

OCT 10 1967 New England Newsclip

Zamkochian To Play at Music Hall

METHUEN — Berj Zamkochian, organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a recital at Methuen Music Hall Oct. 25.

Zamkochian, one of the nation's outstanding organists, is a former pupil of Everett Titcomb, Amesbury-born long-time organist and choirmaster at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Boston.

Organ concerts from the Music Hall are heard every Saturday at 5:30 p.m. from Radio Station WCRB—FM, Boston.

ORGAN RECITALS

120

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
CIRC. 79,350

NOV 13 1967

Hub Symphony Organist Gives Local Workshop

Berj Zamkochian, the organist of the Boston Symphomy Ochestra, conducted an organ workshop Sunday for the Springfield Chapter of the American Guild of Oranists at the Old First Church.

Zamkochian appeared under emphasis on the role of the contemporary church organist. He demonstrated various techniques on the Old First Church organ as he covered practice methods, hymn-playing, improvisation technique, and repertory.

Charles Page, minister of music at Old First Church said that about 50 people attended the workshop.

'amkochian appeared under the co-sponsorship of the organists' guild and the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. Tuesday he will appear with the symphony at the Municipal Auditorium for an organ concert.

Zamkochian and the symphony will present the Poulenc "Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani," and the Saint Saens Third (Organ) Symphony

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850

NOV 15 1967

Zamkochian, Hub Symphony Slated At Assumption Prep

WORCESTER — Berj Zamkochian and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a concert for organ and orchestra at 8:30 p.m. Sunday in Herbert Memorial Auditorium at Assumption Preparatory School.

The concert, which will include a world premiere of the newest work by Rochester composer, William Ferris, "Concerto for Organ and Stringed Orchestra," is sponsored by the D'Alzon Club of Assumption Prep.

Zamkochian, organist for the Boston Symphony, will be featured as soloist and conductor for the concert. He recently returned from his second appearance in the Soviet Union, and is the only American organist ever to appear in that country.

Ferris, who will be present for the premiere, is the organist and choirmaster of Bishop Fulton J. Sheen's Sacred Heart Cathedral in Rochester.

The young composer already has had more than a dozen works published in the United States.

A champagne reception will follow in the lobby of the Hebert Memorial Auditorium.

The concert is one in a series in the performing arts presented by the D'Alzon Club. On Dec. 17, the group will present the Worcester Orchestra, under the direction of Harry Levenson, in a Christmas concert.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000

OCT 22 1967

SONYA HAMILTON, creator of the "Meet the Arts" series for Channel 2's "21-Inch Classroom," will be guest speaker at the opening Youth Concert on Nov. 4 at Symphony Hall, presented by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Harry Ellis Dickson.

BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN, organist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the first American organist to tour the Soviet Union, will present works of contemporary Russian composers at his recital at the Methuen Memorial Music Hall on Wednesday at 8:30 p.m.

NEWS (e)
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
CIRC. 5,800

OCT 10 1967

Zamkochian To Play at Music Hall

METHUEN — Berj Zamkochian, organist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a recital at Methuen Music Hall Oct. 25.

Zamkochian, one of the nation's outstanding organists, is a former pupil of Everett Titcomb, Amesbury-born long-time organist and choirmaster at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Boston.

Organ concerts from the Music Hall are heard every Saturday at 5:30 p.m. from Radio Station WCRB—FM, Boston.

121

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

SEP 30 1967 New England Newsclip

GALA PARTY

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

A Valhalla Party Completes Opening Day of Symphony

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY-GOERS who braved the rain deserted Symphony Hall for the Prudential Tower yesterday, after the first concert of the 87th season. A Valhalla Party, complete with helmeted Valkyries, lured them to the 49th floor, although rain and fog obliterated the view from this eyrie in the clouds.

To borrow a Madison Avenue phrase, the party was a "kick-off" for the Community Division of the $5.5 million fund for the Boston Symphony, of which a total of $2.8 has already been raised.

The Valhalla theme was chosen for this party because the afternoon program had featured Wagner's music. To show how music taste has changed in 85 years, copies of a Symphony program of 1882 were handed out with a review in which Georg Henschel was severely criticized for including selections from Wagner in what was called "Mr. Henschel's first pronounced failure of the season."

Erich Leinsdorf Arrives

Not so yesterday. When Erich Leinsdorf arrived with Mrs. Leinsdorf, loud praises were sung for the afternoon's concert. And Symphony's own version of what Valhalla looks like included rock crags and golden columns, an eerie green light, and potted trees that were surreptitiously used as ash trays.

Nine tall Valyries with long golden braids wore costumes borrowed from the Metropolitan Opera and greeted the guests as they arrived. Shaking hands solemnly with one of the Valkyries was Harold D. Hodgkinson, and when another of them was greeted with "Hi, Leslie!" we realized she was Mrs. Edward Sherman.

Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. was chairman of the Valkyrie group, and others were Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. O. Kelley Anderson, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Peter Smith, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. Albert Creighton Jr., and Mrs. Grenville Clark Jr.

At one end of the Surrealistic rock garden was an equally Surrealistic ash tree and stuck into it was Wotan's sword. The blade of the sword bore upon it the lucky number and the holder of the corresponding number won a trip to "Valhalla". The trip, in this case, was an all-expense weekend for two at Tanglewood for the 1968 season.

Adding to the Wagnerian atmosphere of Valhalla and the Rhine were a large swan made of ice, and Rhine wine-on-the-rocks. The wine was given for the occasion by the West German Consul Edgar von Schmidt-Pauli, whose wife was among the hostesses.

A Serious Note Introduced

A serious note was introduced when Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's Board of Trustees, and Philip K. Allen, general chairman of the fund, spoke in behalf of the goal of $5.5 million. Mr. Cabot introduced Howard K. Holladay and Leonard Kaplan, co-chairman of the Community Division, who have already enlisted a team of more than 240 volunteers who will be active during the autumn months.

Co-chairmen of this party in the sky were Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, who dreamed up the Golden Trumpet Ball two years ago, and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld. "Isn't Fran fabulous!" was heared on all sides, and "Isn't this exciting!" seemed to be the consensus

Ruby Newman, without whose music no Boston party is complete, was much amused by the costumes of the Valkyries and said so in no uncertain tones. But the ladies just laughed and liked it.

Raincoats, umbrellas and overshoes were much in evidence, but there were many of the new square-toed, low-heeled shoes and bright shifts. Among those enjoying the party were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Hans Estin, Mrs. Thomas B. Gannett, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Richard Thompson, Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky and Mrs. Reginald Foster.

Others at the party were Mrs. Ralph Hornblower, Alden McIntyre, Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Jennings, Mrs. Henry S. Fessenden, Mrs. Sheldon Wardwell, Mrs. David Wilder, Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. Nicholas Danforth, Mrs. Arthur Wellmann, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. John Eliot, Mrs. Talbot Baker and Mrs. Charles Bartlett.

Tonight, before the Saturday Symphony, there will be a Gold Rush Party at the same place, and the Valkyries will have vanished to make room for the Forty-Niners. See you there.

★ ★ ★

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,100

OCT 8 1967 New England Newsclip

Spirit of '49 Reigns

A '49ER MOTIF COMPLETE WITH GOLD NUGGETS featured a gala party last week that launched the community phase of the fund drive for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord (right), shown with Mrs. Henry Laughlin, Jr., of Beverly, a hostess, was co-chairman of the Gold Rush extravaganza. The New England Merchants National Bank donated its 49th floor for the benefit.

(Sunday Advertiser Photo by Ray Lussier)

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 67,662

OCT 21 1967

MAESTRO — Erich Leinsdorf, the renowned masestro, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 80th consecutive season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The gala Boston-Brooklyn anniversary concert will be played in the Academy's newly refurbished Opera House, Thursday evening, Oct. 19 at 8:30.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN DAY NEWS
Saturday, October 21, 1967

THE GREAT MAESTRO, Erich Leinsdorf, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 80th consecutive season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The gala Boston-Brooklyn anniversary concert will be held in the Academy's newly refurbished Opera House on Thurs., Oct. 19, 8:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony on Tap For 80th Academy Year

Eighty cultural seasons ago, in the 1888-89 season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of conductor Wilhelm Gericke, played the first concert at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

At 8 o'clock on Mon. evening, Apr. 1, 1889, conductor Gericke raised his baton to lead the orchestra in Goldmark's Overture "Panthesilia" Opus 31, the first piece on that historic program. Other works included Liszt's song, "The Loreley" and Beethoven's "Crugantino'S Song" sung by soloists Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel. Fuch's "Serenade for Strings" and Beethoven's 7th Symphony completed the evening which was described by one member of the press as "a dazzler, with a glittering array of leading figures of society as well as music lovers."

This year, on Thurs. evening, Oct. 19 at 8:30, the renowned orchestra will play excerpts from Beethoven's Prometheus and Wagner's Meistersinger and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6. Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the anniversary concert at the Academy.

The Oct. 19th gala is the first of five programs in the Academy Orchestra Series which will be played this season in the refurbished golden Opera House. Known throughout the world for its unsurpassed acoustics and sight lines, this famous house has been re-glamourized for the new season of music and dance with new carpeting and seats, gold in color to complement the Italian Renaissance decor.

Other concerts in the Series will include the Pittsburgh Symphony on Nov. 9 with William Steinberg conducting. On Jan. 18 Max Rudolf will lead the Cincinnati Symphony and then Boston will return for the final two concerts. Seiji Ozawa will be guest conductor on Feb. 1 and Erich Leinsdorf on Apr. 4.

Regarding the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf said, "Whatever came up, the musical necessity had its way. From having seen musical organizations abroad and in this country, this is rare. As I don't know all musical organizations I cannot in fairness say it is unique, but I have a suspicion it is unique. I am going to do my very best to keep it that way."

For further information regarding the Academy Orchestra Series and the initial concert by one of the most unique and important musical organizations, call ST 3-6700.

121

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

SEP 30 1967 New England Newsclip

GALA PARTY

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

A Valhalla Party Completes Opening Day of Symphony

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY-GOERS who braved the rain deserted Symphony Hall for the Prudential Tower yesterday, after the first concert of the 87th season. A Valhalla Party, complete with helmeted Valkyries, lured them to the 49th floor, although rain and fog obliterated the view from this eyrie in the clouds.

To borrow a Madison Avenue phrase, the party was a "kick-off" for the Community Division of the $5.5 million fund for the Boston Symphony, of which a total of $2.8 has already been raised.

The Valhalla theme was chosen for this party because the afternoon program had featured Wagner's music. To show how music taste has changed in 85 years, copies of a Symphony program of 1882 were handed out with a review in which Georg Henschel was severely criticized for including selections from Wagner in what was called "Mr. Henschel's first pronounced failure of the season."

Erich Leinsdorf Arrives

Not so yesterday. When Erich Leinsdorf arrived with Mrs. Leinsdorf, loud praises were sung for the afternoon's concert. And Symphony's own version of what Valhalla looks like included rock crags and golden columns, an eerie green light, and potted trees that were surreptitiously used as ash trays.

Nine tall Valyries with long golden braids wore costumes borrowed from the Metropolitan Opera and greeted the guests as they arrived. Shaking hands solemnly with one of the Valkyries was Harold D. Hodgkinson, and when another of them was greeted with "Hi, Leslie!" we realized she was Mrs. Edward Sherman.

Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. was chairman of the Valkyrie group, and others were Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. O. Kelley Anderson, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. Peter Smith, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. Albert Creighton Jr., and Mrs. Grenville Clark Jr.

At one end of the Surrealistic rock garden was an equally Surrealistic ash tree and stuck into it was Wotan's sword. The blade of the sword bore upon it the lucky number and the holder of the corresponding number won a trip to "Valhalla". The trip, in this case, was an all-expense weekend for two at Tanglewood for the 1968 season.

Adding to the Wagnerian atmosphere of Valhalla and the Rhine were a large swan made of ice, and Rhine wine-on-the-rocks. The wine was given for the occasion by the West German Consul Edgar von Schmidt-Pauli, whose wife was among the hostesses.

A Serious Note Introduced

A serious note was introduced when Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's Board of Trustees, and Philip K. Allen, general chairman of the fund, spoke in behalf of the goal of $5.5 million. Mr. Cabot introduced Howard K. Holladay and Leonard Kaplan, co-chairman of the Community Division, who have already enlisted a team of more than 240 volunteers who will be active during the autumn months.

Co-chairmen of this party in the sky were Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, who dreamed up the Golden Trumpet Ball two years ago, and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld. "Isn't Fran fabulous!" was heared on all sides, and "Isn't this exciting!" seemed to be the consensus

Ruby Newman, without whose music no Boston party is complete, was much amused by the costumes of the Valkyries and said so in no uncertain tones. But the ladies just laughed and liked it.

Raincoats, umbrellas and overshoes were much in evidence, but there were many of the new square-toed, low-heeled shoes and bright shifts. Among those enjoying the party were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Hans Estin, Mrs. Thomas B. Gannett, Mrs. Robert Kistner, Mrs. Richard Thompson, Mrs. Veevold Strekalovsky and Mrs. Reginald Foster.

Others at the party were Mrs. Ralph Hornblower, Alden McIntyre, Mr. and Mrs. C. Morton Jennings, Mrs. Henry S. Fessenden, Mrs. Sheldon Wardwell, Mrs. David Wilder, Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. Nicholas Danforth, Mrs. Arthur Wellmann, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. John Eliot, Mrs. Talbot Baker and Mrs. Charles Bartlett.

Tonight, before the Saturday Symphony, there will be a Gold Rush Party at the same place, and the Valkyries will have vanished to make room for the Forty-Niners. See you there.

★ ★ ★

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400

OCT 8 1967 New England Newsclip

Spirit of '49 Reigns

A '49ER MOTIF COMPLETE WITH GOLD NUGGETS featured a gala party last week that launched the community phase of the fund drive for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord (right), shown with Mrs. Henry Laughlin, Jr., of Beverly, a hostess, was co-chairman of the Gold Rush extravaganza. The New England Merchants National Bank donated its 49th floor for the benefit.

(Sunday Advertiser Photo by Ray Lussier)

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 67,662

OCT 21 1967 Buffalo

MAESTRO — Erich Leinsdorf, the renowned masestro, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 80th consecutive season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The gala Boston-Brooklyn anniversary concert will be played in the Academy's newly refurbished Opera House, Thursday evening, Oct. 19 at 8:30.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE
Saturday, October 21, 1967

THE GREAT MAESTRO, Erich Leinsdorf, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 80th consecutive season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The gala Boston-Brooklyn anniversary concert will be held in the Academy's newly refurbished Opera House on Thurs., Oct. 19, 8:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony on Tap For 80th Academy Year

Eighty cultural seasons ago, in the 1888-89 season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of conductor Wilhelm Gericke, played the first concert at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

At 8 o'clock on Mon. evening, Apr. 1, 1889, conductor Gericke raised his baton to lead the orchestra in Goldmark's Overture "Panthesilia" Opus 31, the first piece on that historic program. Other works included Liszt's song, "The Loreley" and Beethoven's "Cruganti no'S Song" sung by soloists Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel. Fuch's "Serenade for Strings" and Beethoven's 7th Symphony completed the evening which was described by one member of the press as "a dazzler, with a scintering array of leading figures of society as well as music lovers."

This year, on Thurs. evening, Oct. 19 at 8:30, the renowned orchestra will play excerpts from Beethoven's Prometheus and Wagner's Meistersinger and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6. Erich Leinsdorf, the conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the anniversary concert at the Academy.

The Oct. 19th gala is the first of five programs in the Academy Orchestra Series which will be played this season in the refurbished golden Opera House. Known throughout the world for its unsurpassed acoustics and sight lines, this famous house has been re-glamourized for the new season of music and dance with new carpeting and seats, gold in color to complement the Italian Renaissance decor.

Other concerts in the Series will include the Pittsburgh Symphony on Nov. 9 with William Steinberg conducting. On Jan. 18 Max Rudolf will lead the Cincinnati Symphony and then Boston will return for the final two concerts. Seiji Ozawa will be guest conductor on Feb. 1 and Erich Leinsdorf on Apr. 4.

Regarding the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf said, "Whatever came up, the musical necessity had its way. From having seen musical organizations abroad and in this country, this is rare. As I don't know all musical organizations I cannot in fairness say it is unique, but I have a suspicion it is unique. I am going to do my very best to keep it that way."

For further information regarding the Academy Orchestra Series and the initial concert by one of the most unique and important musical organizations, call ST 3-6700.

FUNDS

122

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

SEP 26 1967 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It is a hard task that has been set for the supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is to decide which of the two "must attend" parties, being given for the Fund for the Boston Symphony at the end of this week, to attend.

The decision really comes down to whether they want to see the Valkyries, the beautiful maidens who will be the hostesses at Friday afternoons party on the 49th Floor of the Prudential Tower, or whether they would prefer the Barbary Coast beauties who will be on hand at the same place for the Gold Rush party on Saturday evening. Many people — and it is suspected the gentlemen may be among them — are deciding to attend both affairs so as not to miss anything.

The Saturday Gold Rush party has a great appeal for many New Englanders as many of their ancestors caught the gold rush fever in 1849-1850 and sailed for the west in New England built ships. History relates that 657 vessels arrived in San Francisco in a 13-day period in December 1850, among them the brig Androscoggin from Boston and other ships from Newburyport, Salem, Providence, Portland and Bangor.

Barbary Coast beauties who will be greeting guests will include Mrs. Philip K. Allen of Andover, Mrs. Neil Ayer of South Hamilton, Mrs. John Dane of Brookline, Mrs. William T. Glidden of Manchester, Mrs. Henry A. Laughlin Jr. of Hamilton, Mrs. Drayton Phillips of South Hamilton, Mrs. John B. Reigeluth of Beverly Farms, Mrs. Warren Richardson of Prides Crossing, and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott Jr. of Hamilton.

Mrs. Harvey Bundy Jr. of Manchester and Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. of Beverly Farms are in charge of the costumes for both parties.

The Valkyries greeting the Friday afternoon Symphony goers at that party will be Mrs. Bundy, Mrs. O. Kelley Anderson of Beacon Hill, Mrs. Grenville Clark Jr. of Cambridge, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner of Manchester, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly Jr. of Manchester, Mrs. Peter Smith, Mrs. Hatch, Mrs. Albert Creighton Jr. of Manchester, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of Beverly Farms and Mrs. Edward D. Sherman of Chestnut Hill.

* * *

The Advertising Committee of the Boston Morning Musicales is working even harder than usual this year for the musical concerts to benefit the Tufts University Boston School of Occupational Therapy are celebrating their 40th season this year.

The committee will meet tomorrow at 10 a.m. at Mrs. Charles F. Vallender Jr.'s home in Wellesley, with its beautiful conservatory window that is always filled with flowers at all seasons.

Many of the ladies will be going on to the Pan American Fashion Show which will be held a short distance away at Mrs. Walter Hunnewell's estate on Washington Street at noon.

Mrs. Arthur John Lockhart of Chestnut Hill and Duxbury is chairman of the advertising committee, with Mrs. Alfred W. Willmann of Belmont, vice chairman. Among those on their committee who will be attending the meeting are Mrs. Miles Nelson Clair of West Newton, Mrs. B. Abbott Cope of Belmont, Mrs. George G. Crocker of Cohasset, Mrs. Robert F. Daley of Dedham, Mrs. Howard S. Davis of Concord, Mrs. E. Russell Greenwood of Boston, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton, Mrs. Richard K. McMullan, Mrs. Edward L. Murphy, Mrs. George O'Day of Dover, Mrs. Powell Robinson Jr. of Wellesley, Mrs. Holt Wilson and Mrs. Thomas S. Woods of Chestnut Hill. Mrs. Frank J. Ludwig of Brookline and Mrs. William Emerson Barrett of Longwood Towers will attend as ex-officio members.

The first concert of the 1967-68 season will take place on Nov. 1 at the Statler Hilton, and Susan Starr, pianist, will be the guest artist.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

SEP 19 1967 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Two of the cleverest and most unusual invitations seen in a long time are reposing in the hands of faithful symphonygoers this week. They are for the intriguing parties being held in connection with the opening of the 1967-68 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which the redoubtable Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord and Mrs. Jerome M. Rosenfeld of Chestnut Hill have dreamed up for the benefit of The Fund for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Both invitations feature mirrors placed on the inside page under a big "You're Wanted" sign. The party to be held after the Friday afternoon opening on Sept. 29 says that if you can see your face in this quiet pool of the Rhine the trustees would like you to attend a light hearted report on the Boston Symphony's search for the "Golden Treasure", otherwise known as The Fund.

For this party is a "Valhalla Party" to be held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower, which the New England Merchants Bank is generously donating for the cause, from 4 to 7 p.m.

The whole idea of the Valhalla Party came about because Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the B.S.O., decided on an all-Wagner program for the first concert, and so everyone will be in the mood to visit an eyrie in the clouds and sip Rhinewine on the Rocks—also king-sized cocktails according to the invitation.

Other delights promised to the "Siegfrieds and Brunnhildes" invited to the party include meeting the "voluptuous valkyries" at Symphony's own Septemberfest, and appetizers in the air.

All the trustees of the B.S.O. will be on hand to greet the guests near a replica of the famous ash tree into which Wotan drove his sword in Wagner's "Die Walkure."

By Sept. 30, the entire decor and atmosphere will be changed for another party for those faithful Saturday evening symhonygoers.

This time it's a Gold Rush Party, appropriately to be held on the 49th floor as the entire decor will recapture the spirit of the gold rush of 1849 and the infamous Barbary Coast.

As the guests leave the elevator at the 5:30 to 8 p.m. party they will walk through a replica of a long mine shaft complete vith heavy timbers and gold encrusted rocks. Once inside they vill meet Barbary Coast beauties, listen to banjo music — traight from Your Father's Mustache on Warrenton Street in oston — and enjoy cocktails and a light supper in plenty of me to get to symphony before the beginning of the concert.

Mrs. Fahnestock and Mrs. Rosenfeld are co-chairman of both ents, and Carl Crossman is a member of the committees for th. On the Valhalla party committee are Mrs. Hans H. tin of Manchester, Mrs. Thomas B. Gannet of Wayland, Mrs. rs Gardiner of Hamilton, Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. of erly, Mrs. George A. Parson of Louisburg Square, Nelson stedt, Mrs. Richard H. Thompson of Swampscott and Mrs. ar von Schmidt-Pauli, the wife of the German consul general oston.

On the Gold Rush party committee are Mrs. O. Kelley rson of Boston, Mrs. David Bakalar of Boston, Mrs. ey H. Bundy Jr. of Manchester, Mrs. Albert Goodhue of olehead, Arthur M. Jones of Manchester, Mrs. George L. ent of Dover, Mrs. David Wilder of Needham and Francis atch Jr. of Beverly.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Thursday, October 19, 1967

Boston Symphony Fund Effort Hits $2.8 Million

BOSTON—The Fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the Orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds.

The major campaign seeking to raise $5.5 million over the next four years is intended to strengthen the Orchestra's financial position for the coming decade as well as provide money for improvements to 67-year old Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony summer home at Tanglewood.

As part of the Fund for the Boston Symphony, the trustees of the Orchestra have established a program of commemorative gifts by which donors may express a personal interest in the Symphony and may honor a family member, musician, or friend. Significant gifts in this program of the Fund for the Boston Symphony have just been announced.

Newly established funds are the Charles Munch Fund of $1 million, for bringing outstanding conductors to Symphony Hall and the Augustus P. Thorndike Fellowship Fund, for a student at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. The Munch Fund has received gifts totaling $540,000 from Henry B. Cabot, Edward A. Taft, and Mrs. H. Melvin Young. Contributions to the Thorndike Fellowship will total $25,000 from John L. Thorndike and members of his family.

The first named chair in the Orchestra will be that of the Principal Cellist. A Gift of $100,000 has been received from Philip K. Allen and other members of the Allen family. The cellist's chair will be named for Mr. Philip R. Allen, late Trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gift opportunities in the commemorative gifts program of the Fund for the Boston Symphony range from $1 million for the Koussevitzky Music Shed at Tanglewood, through $500,000 for a named concert series or the Concertmaster's Chair, to $2,500 to name a seat in Symphony Hall. Individual concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood and each of the Orchestra's principal chairs are also an important part of the commemorative program.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

OCT 31 1967 New England Newsclip

Manchester man bequeaths public gifts of $86,000

SALEM — Public gifts totaling $86,000 were made in the will of Edward A. Taft Jr., 42, Old Neck Rd., Manchester which was allowed by Judge John A. Costello at Probate Court. He left property valued at about $575,000.

Taft was killed in a car accident in Millbury Sept. 1. He left a widow, Eleanor Crocker Taft and two minor sons, Edward A., III and David C. Taft.

Gifts of $15,000 each were made to Massachusetts General Hospital, Parish of the Advent in Boston, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. and President and Fellows of Harvard College. The latter gift is to be added to a fund established by his father for the benefit of the department of music

Another $5,000 was given to Harvard to be credited to the 25th anniversary fund of the class of 1950.

St. Mark's School in Southborough and the Free Hospital for Women in Brookline were each left $10,000. Fox Club in Cambridge was left $1,000.

Mrs. Maria D. Ritchie of Malden, who was formerly employed by the testator's mother, was given $5,000.

The rest of the estate was given to Mrs. Taft and the two children in the 17 page will made Jan. 28, 1955. Mrs. Taft was given tangible personal property and autos outright.

Charles C. Cabot of Dover and Henry R. Guild of Needham were appointed co - executors of the estate.

FUNDS

122

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

SEP 26 1967 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It is a hard task that has been set for the supporters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is to decide which of the two "must attend" parties, being given for the Fund for the Boston Symphony at the end of this week, to attend.

The decision really comes down to whether they want to see the Valkyries, the beautiful maidens who will be the hostesses at Friday afternoons party on the 49th Floor of the Prudential Tower, or whether they would prefer the Barbary Coast beauties who will be on hand at the same place for the Gold Rush party on Saturday evening. Many people — and it is suspected the gentlemen may be among them — are deciding to attend both affairs so as not to miss anything.

The Saturday Gold Rush party has a great appeal for many New Englanders as many of their ancestors caught the gold rush fever in 1849-1850 and sailed for the west in New England built ships. History relates that 657 vessels arrived in San Francisco in a 13-day period in December 1850, among them the brig Androscoggin from Boston and other ships from Newburyport, Salem, Providence, Portland and Bangor.

Barbary Coast beauties who will be greeting guests will include Mrs. Philip K. Allen of Andover, Mrs. Neil Ayer of South Hamilton, Mrs. John Dane of Brookline, Mrs. William T. Glidden of Manchester, Mrs. Henry A. Laughlin Jr. of Hamilton, Mrs. Drayton Phillips of South Hamilton, Mrs. John B. Reigeluth of Beverly Farms, Mrs. Warren Richardson of Prides Crossing, and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott Jr. of Hamilton.

Mrs. Harvey Bundy Jr. of Manchester and Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. of Beverly Farms are in charge of the costumes for both parties.

The Valkyries greeting the Friday afternoon Symphony goers at that party will be Mrs. Bundy, Mrs. O. Kelley Anderson of Beacon Hill, Mrs. Grenville Clark Jr. of Cambridge, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner of Manchester, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly Jr. of Manchester, Mrs. Peter Smith, Mrs. Hatch, Mrs. Albert Creighton Jr. of Manchester, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of Beverly Farms and Mrs. Edward D. Sherman of Chestnut Hill.

* * *

The Advertising Committee of the Boston Morning Musicales is working even harder than usual this year for the musical concerts to benefit the Tufts University Boston School of Occupational Therapy are celebrating their 40th season this year.

The committee will meet tomorrow at 10 a.m. at Mrs. Charles F. Vallender Jr.'s home in Wellesley, with its beautiful conservatory window that is always filled with flowers at all seasons.

Many of the ladies will be going on to the Pan American Fashion Show which will be held a short distance away at Mrs. Walter Hunnewell's estate on Washington Street at noon.

Mrs. Arthur John Lockhart of Chestnut Hill and Duxbury is chairman of the advertising committee, with Mrs. Alfred W. Willmann of Belmont, vice chairman. Among those on their committee who will be attending the meeting are Mrs. Miles Nelson Clair of West Newton, Mrs. B. Abbott Cope of Belmont, Mrs. George G. Crocker of Cohasset, Mrs. Robert F. Daley of Dedham, Mrs. Howard S. Davis of Concord, Mrs. E. Russell Greenwood of Boston, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton, Mrs. Richard K. McMullan, Mrs. Edward L. Murphy, Mrs. George O'Day of Dover, Mrs. Powell Robinson Jr. of Wellesley, Mrs. Holt Wilson and Mrs. Thomas S. Woods of Chestunt Hill. Mrs. Frank J. Ludwig of Brookline and Mrs. William Emerson Barrett of Longwood Towers will attend as ex-officio members.

The first concert of the 1967-68 season will take place on Nov. 1 at the Statler Hilton, and Susan Starr, pianist, will be the guest artist.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

SEP 19 1967 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

Two of the cleverest and most unusual invitations seen in a long time are reposing in the hands of faithful symphonygoers this week. They are for the intriguing parties being held in connection with the opening of the 1967-68 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which the redoubtable Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord and Mrs. Jerome M. Rosenfeld of Chestnut Hill have dreamed up for the benefit of The Fund for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Both invitations feature mirrors placed on the inside page under a big "You're Wanted" sign. The party to be held after the Friday afternoon opening on Sept. 29 says that if you can see your face in this quiet pool of the Rhine the trustees would like you to attend a light hearted report on the Boston Symphony's search for the "Golden Treasure", otherwise known as The Fund.

For this party is a "Valhalla Party" to be held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower, which the New England Merchants Bank is generously donating for the cause, from 4 to 7 p.m.

The whole idea of the Valhalla Party came about because Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the B.S.O., decided on an all-Wagner program for the first concert, and so everyone will be in the mood to visit an eyrie in the clouds and sip Rhinewine on the Rocks—also king-sized cocktails according to the invitation.

Other delights promised to the "Siegfrieds and Brunnhildes" invited to the party include meeting the "voluptuous valkyries" at Symphony's own Septemberfest, and appetizers in the air.

All the trustees of the B.S.O. will be on hand to greet the guests near a replica of the famous ash tree into which Wotan drove his sword in Wagner's "Die Walkure."

By Sept. 30, the entire decor and atmosphere will be changed for another party for those faithful Saturday evening symhonygoers.

This time it's a Gold Rush Party, appropriately to be held on the 49th floor as the entire decor will recapture the spirit of the gold rush of 1849 and the infamous Barbary Coast.

As the guests leave the elevator at the 5:30 to 8 p.m. party they will walk through a replica of a long mine shaft complete vith heavy timbers and gold encrusted rocks. Once inside they vill meet Barbary Coast beauties, listen to banjo music — traight from Your Father's Mustache on Warrenton Street in oston — and enjoy cocktails and a light supper in plenty of me to get to symphony before the beginning of the concert.

Mrs. Fahnestock and Mrs. Rosenfeld are co-chairman of both ents, and Carl Crossman is a member of the committees for th. On the Valhalla party committee are Mrs. Hans H. tin of Manchester, Mrs. Thomas B. Gannet of Wayland, Mrs. rs Gardiner of Hamilton, Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. of erly, Mrs. George A. Parson of Louisburg Square, Nelson stedt, Mrs. Richard H. Thompson of Swampscott and Mrs. ar von Schmidt-Pauli, the wife of the German consul general oston.

On the Gold Rush party committee are Mrs. O. Kelley rson of Boston, Mrs. David Bakalar of Boston, Mrs. ey H. Bundy Jr. of Manchester, Mrs. Albert Goodhue of olehead, Arthur M. Jones of Manchester, Mrs. George L. ent of Dover, Mrs. David Wilder of Needham and Francis atch Jr. of Beverly.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Thursday, October 19, 1967

Boston Symphony Fund Effort Hits $2.8 Million

BOSTON—The Fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the Orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds.

The major campaign seeking to raise $5.5 million over the next four years is intended to strengthen the Orchestra's financial position for the coming decade as well as provide money for improvements to 67-year old Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony summer home at Tanglewood.

As part of the Fund for the Boston Symphony, the trustees of the Orchestra have established a program of commemorative gifts by which donors may express a personal interest in the Symphony and may honor a family member, musician, or friend. Significant gifts in this program of the Fund for the Boston Symphony have just been announced.

Newly established funds are the Charles Munch Fund of $1 million, for bringing outstanding conductors to Symphony Hall and the Augustus P. Thorndike Fellowship Fund, for a student at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. The Munch Fund has received gifts totaling $540,000 from Henry B. Cabot, Edward A. Taft, and Mrs. H. Melvin Young. Contributions to the Thorndike Fellowship will total $25,000 from John L. Thorndike and members of his family.

The first named chair in the Orchestra will be that of the Principal Cellist. A Gift of $100,000 has been received from Philip K. Allen and other members of the Allen family. The cellist's chair will be named for Mr. Philip R. Allen, late Trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gift opportunities in the commemorative gifts program of the Fund for the Boston Symphony range from $1 million for the Koussevitzky Music Shed at Tanglewood, through $500,000 for a named concert series or the Concertmaster's Chair, to $2,500 to name a seat in Symphony Hall. Individual concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood and each of the Orchestra's principal chairs are also an important part of the commemorative program.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

OCT 31 1967 New England Newsclip

Manchester man bequeaths public gifts of $86,000

SALEM — Public gifts totaling $86,000 were made in the will of Edward A. Taft Jr., 42, Old Neck Rd., Manchester which was allowed by Judge John A. Costello at Probate Court. He left property valued at about $575,000.

Taft was killed in a car accident in Millbury Sept. 1. He left a widow, Eleanor Crocker Taft and two minor sons, Edward A., III and David C. Taft.

Gifts of $15,000 each were made to Massachusetts General Hospital, Parish of the Advent in Boston, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. and President and Fellows of Harvard College. The latter gift is to be added to a fund established by his father for the benefit of the department of music

Another $5,000 was given to Harvard to be credited to the 25th anniversary fund of the class of 1950.

St. Mark's School in Southborough and the Free Hospital for Women in Brookline were each left $10.000. Fox Club in Cambridge was left $1,000.

Mrs. Maria D. Ritchie of Malden, who was formerly employed by the testator's mother, was given $5,000.

The rest of the estate was given to Mrs. Taft and the two children in the 17 page will made Jan. 28, 1955. Mrs. Taft was given tangible personal property and autos outright.

Charles C. Cabot of Dover and Henry R. Guild of Needham were appointed co - executors of the estate.

123

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

OCT 1 1967 New England Newsclip

Symphony Show a Big Success

By MARJORIE SHERMAN

Globe Society Editor

Henry B. Cabot and his Symphony Road Company, including the "beauteous Barbary Coast Girls" played their second show of the 1967-68 season on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower Saturday night.

The settings, especially the mine shaft opening scene and the Golden Nugget Saloon are right in the Carl Crossman legend, and producer Fran (Mrs. Harris) Fahnestock has another hit on her hands.

The cast include the Symphony company's prize wit, Francis (Frankie the Trumpet) Hatch as well as narrator Cabot and the man with the satchel for the funds, Philip K. Allen.

The play, "2.8 Million, or Half Way to the Goal," is the story of the gold rush for the Ford Foundation lode, whichc pays off at the rate of one for two. Programs were special edition copies of the Sacramento Transcript of 1850, with present cast inserts among the ads for gold dust and river hotels, schooner sales and town lots and quotations from Mr. Houston's talk in the Senate on slavery.

The Banjo Band from Your Father's Moustache were as sharp as their stripes and straws, and an old-time collation, served between the acts, was almost as rich and savory as the 1850 recipe for Buffalo's Hump.

Special guests in the audience were the regular cast of the Boston Symphony together wi'h their wives.

Some of the most effective gals in show business are on the Fahnestock staff—Mrs. George L. Sargent, Mrs. Thomas Gannett, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, and Mrs. Anthony Kutten, for instance, who could take right over for the leadings ladies too. Directors include the excellent Henry A. Laughlins and Harold Hodgkinsons.

Playing the Barbary Beauties with great spirit and those ruffles that leave the mini-skirt back on hte beach where it belongs are Mrs. Neil Ayer, Mrs. William Glidden, Mrs. Warren Richardson, Mrs. Oliver Wolcott Jr., Mrs. John Dane, Mrs. John Reigeluth and Mrs. Henry A. Laughlin Jr.

Stand-by talent also included Mrs. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Haskell Cohn, Mrs. Samuel Levine, Mrs. Robert Wiese, Mrs. Miles Clair and others.

Audience notables on the Gold Rush Guest List were Robert (The General) Cutler, responsible for foundations (and half a million stakeout to date); Mrs. Frank G. (Ma.) Allen, who's right behind The General with her division of special "backers" who've dug out $425,000 so far and aim at $600,000 more.

Still others were the Henry B. Jacksons, the Cecil Roses, the Henry Keyes, the John Edsalls, the John Bradleys, Mrs. David Bakalar, the Henry Binney Jr.s, the Carl Pickhardts, the Benjamin Smiths, the Philip Walkers, the Donald Hardings, the Stanford Calderwoods, the William Levines, Dr. and Mrs. Richard Thompson, Dr. and Mrs. Arnold Abrams and Dr. and Mrs. Henry Faxon.

And for Symphony such stalwart backers as Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, the Thomas Perrys, woman trustee Mrs. James Perkins, Sandy Sis are a host more.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

OCT 30 1967 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Area Teas, Cocktail Parties Given For Subscribers to Symphony

TEAS AND COCKTAIL PARTIES galore are being given by area chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for subscribers to the Symphony. The purpose of these pleasant affairs is to interest the subscribers more deeply in the Friends' program and to enable them to meet the trustees and some of the members of the orchestra.

Following closely on the heels of the Valhalla and Gold Rush parties held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower at the end of September, the council has planned parties in Wellesley, Weston, Wayland, Andover and the North Shore areas.

Mrs. Abbot Stevens gave a cocktail party in North Andover yesterday. Philip K. Allen, a trustee, spoke to the guests of the needs and aims of the orchestra. Assisting Mrs. Stevens were Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. Alexander Z. Warren and other members of the council.

Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of Beverly Farms invited North Shore subscribers to meet Everett Firth, principal timpanist of the orchestra, at a cocktail party yesterday. Council members of the North Shore area who helped plan this party were Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson, Mrs. Raymond W. Ellis, Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy, Jr., and Mrs. Evan Shierling.

Mrs. Hollis Plimpton, Jr., of Brookline will give a Symphony party for the Brookline-Chestnut Hill subscribers on Sunday, Nov. 12. The guests of honor will be Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the orchestra, Roger Voisin, Reuben Green and Sheldon Rotenberg.

Council members assisting Mrs. Plimpton are Mrs. Robert H. Cain, area chairman, Mrs. William McCormick, Ann Sargent, Mrs. Richard A. Ehrlich, Mrs. Roger Voisin, Mrs. Sherman R. Thayer and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr.

The first party in the Wellesley area will be a tea given by Mrs. Robert Dean. The subscribers will meet Henry B. Cabot, chairman of the trustees, and Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet player of the orchestra. Wellesley Council members helping Mrs. Dean are Mrs. Robert G. Wiese, Mrs. H. Starr Ballou, Mrs. William H. Vogler, Mrs. Edward S. Stimpson and Mrs. Howard Hansen.

Earlier this month a tea was given by Mrs. C. Baker Clotworthy of Andover. Mrs Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flutist of the orchestra, was the guest of honor and delighted subscribers with descriptions of the interests and avocations of orchestra members, the Tanglewood season, and the Chamber Players' trip to Russia.

Hostesses for the guest artist reception in honor of Erich Leinsdorf, Claire Watson, Jess Thomas and Kenneth Smith were Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. William Manice, Mrs. Thomas Barrows, Mrs. John Beard and Mrs. George Emery. The reception was held in the Ancient Instruments Room of Symphony Hall and was attended by more than 200 Friends of the Tuesday series concerts.

Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot of Boston was hostess at the reception for Charles Wilson, making his debut as assistant conductor of the orchestra. Again, the Ancient Instruments Room was the scene of the party and members of the Friends of the Saturday evening concerts were invited.

* * *

Workshop, Lecture on Wedgwood

HAVE YOU ANY WEDGWOOD you'd like to have identified? Or would you just like to know more about Wedgwood? The Board of Trustees of The Society for the Preservation of New England Antiquities has invited its New England members to attend a workshop and a formal lecture on "The Pottery of Josiah Wedgwood" by John Cushion, Keeper of Ceramics at the Victoria and Albert Museum in London, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 4, at 2:30, at The Vale in Waltham. He also will give a slide lecture at 8:15 that evening, in Appleton Hall, 141 Cambridge St., Boston.

The proceeds will benefit The Vale and its greenhouses. Among the sponsors who are planning to attend the workshop and lecture are the Charles Batchelders, Mrs. George A. Clapp, Mrs. Robert D. Chellis, Miss Mary Drake and Mr. and Mrs. Frederic C. Dumaine, Jr.

Also, Miss Eleanor Fayerweather, the William B. Floyds, H. A. Crosby Forbes, the Chase Kimballs, the Bertram K. Littles, Mrs. Francis B. Lothrop, Mr. and Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman, Jr., Miss Mary Otis, Mrs. Harold T. Rand, Mrs. Edmund Rice, Mr. and Mrs. J. Clifford Ross, Mrs. Theodore Lyman Storer, Mrs. Richard Swain and Mrs. Joseph Wolfson.

* * *

Symphony Fund $2.8 Million

The Fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds.

Newly established funds are the Charles Munch Fund of $1 million, for bringing outstanding conductors to Symphony Hall and the Augustus P. Thorndike Fellowship Fund, for a student at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. The Munch Fund has received gifts totaling $540,000 from Henry B. Cabot, Edward A. Taft, and Mrs. H. Melvin Young. Contributions to the Thorndike Fellowship will total $25,000 from John L. Thorndike and members of his family.

The first named chair in the orchestra will be that of the Principal Cellist. A gift of $160,000 has been received from Philip K. Allen and other members of the Allen family. The cellist's chair will be named for Mr. Philip R. Allen, late trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gift opportunities in the commemorative gifts program of the Fund for the Boston Symphony range from $1 million for the Koussevitzky Music Shed at Tanglewood, through $500,000 for a named concert series or the Concertmaster's Chair, to $2,500 to name a seat in Symphony Hall. Individual concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood and each of the orchestra's principal chairs are also an important part of the commemorative program.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

OCT 27 1967 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

OCT 30 1967 New England

★ ★ ★

ONE party leads to another in the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who are still talking about the recent unique Valhalla and Gold Rush soirees held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower for the benefit of the B. S. O. Yesterday Mrs. Abbot Stevens gave a cocktail party in North Andover at which Philip K. Allen, trustee of the orchestra, spoke to the guests on its needs and aims. Assisting the hostess were Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. Alexander Z. Warren and other members of the Council.

On the North Shore, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of Beverly Farms had friends in for cocktails and to meet Everett Firth, principal timpanist of the orchestra. Her aides at the party included Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson, Mrs. Raymond W. Ellis, Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy, Jr., and Mrs. Evan Shierling.

The idea of the round of socials is to interest more subscribers in the "Friends" program and to enable them to meet trustees and some of the members of the orchestra.

Mrs. Robert Dean is giving the first party in the Wellesley area at which subscribers will meet Henry D. Cabot, chairman of the trustees, and Armand Ghitalla, principal trumpet of the orchestra. Wellesley Council members assisting Mrs. Dean are Mrs. Robert C. Wiese, Mrs. H. Starr Ballou, Mrs. William H. Vogler, Mrs. Edward B. Stimpson and Mrs. Howard Hansen.

On Sunday, Nov. 12, Mrs. Hollis Plimpton, Jr. of Brookline will have Brookline-Chestnut Hill subscribers at her home to honor Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, Roger Voisin, Reuben Green and Sheldon Rotenburg. In her corps of Council members helpers will be Mrs. Robert H. Cain, area chairman; Mrs. William McCormick, Miss Ann Sargent, Mrs. Richard A. Ehrlich, Mrs. Voisin, Mrs. Sherman R. Thayer and Mrs. John L. Grandin, Jr.

★ ★ ★

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

OCT 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Significant Gifts to Fund For Symphony

BOSTON — The Fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the Orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds. The major campaign seeking to raise $5.5 million over the next four years is intended to strengthen the Orchestra's financial position for the coming decade as well as provide money for improvements to 67-year old Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony summer home at Tanglewood.

As part of the Fund for the Boston Symphony, the Trustees of the Orchestra have established a program of commemorative gifts by which donors may express a personal interest in the Symphony and may honor a family member, musician, or friend. Significant gifts in this program of the Fund for the Boston Symphony have just been announced.

124

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
NOV 2 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Fund Drive Passes $2.8 Million Mark

BOSTON — The fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds.

The major campaign, seeking to raise $5.5 million over the next four years, is intended to strengthen the orchestra's financial position for the coming decade as well as provide money for improvements to 67-year-old Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony summer home at Tanglewood.

Commemorative Gifts

As part of the fund for the Boston Symphony, the trustees of the orchestra have established a program of commemorative gifts by which donors may express a personal interest in the symphony and may honor a family member, musician, or friend. Significant gifts in this program of the fund for the Boston Symphony have just been announced.

Newly established funds are the Charles Munch Fund of $1 million, for bringing outstanding conductors to Symphony Hall and the Augustus P. Thorndike Fellowship Fund for a student at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. The Munch fund has received gifts totaling $540,000 from Henry B. Cabot, Edward A. Taft, and Mrs. H. Melvin Young. Contributions to the Thorndike Fellowship will total $25,000 from John L. Thorndike and members of his family.

Cellist Chair

The first named chair in the orchestra will be that of the principal cellist. A gift of $100,000 has been received from Philip K. Allen and other members of the Allen family. The cellist's chair will be named for Mr. Philip R. Allen, late trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gift opportunities in the commemorative gifts program of the fund for the Boston Symphony range from $1 million for the Koussevitzky Music Shed at Tanglewood through $500,000 for a named concert series or the concertmaster's chair, to $2,500 to name a seat in Symphony Hall. Individual concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood and each of the orchestra's principal chairs are also an important part of the commemorative program.

N. E. HOMESTEAD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL
CIRC. 55,000
NOV 1967 New England Newsclip

GIFTS, NEW FUNDS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON,—The Fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds. The major campaign seeking to raise $5.5 million over the next four years is intended to strengthen the orchestra's financial position for the coming decade as well as provide money for improvements to 67-year old Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony summer home at Tanglewood.

Commemorative Gifts

As part of the fund for the Boston Symphony, the trustees of the orchestra have established a program of commemorative gifts by which donors may express a personal interest in the symphony and may honor a family member, musician, or friend. Significant gifts in this program of the fund for the Boston Symphony have just been announced.

Newly established funds are the Charles Munch Fund of $1 million, for bringing outstanding conductors to Symphony Hall and the Augustus P. Thorndike Fellowship Fund, for a student at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. The Munch Fund has received gifts totaling $540,000 from Henry B. Cabot, Edward A. Taft, and Mrs. H. Melvin Young. Contributions to the Thorndike Fellowship will total $25,000 from John L. Thorndike and members of his family.

The first named chair in the orchestra will be that of the principal cellist. A gift of $100,000 has been received from Philip K. Allen and other members of the Allen family. The cellist's chair will be named for Mr. Philip R. Allen, late trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gift opportunities in the commemorative gifts program of the fund for the Boston Symphony range from $1 million for the Koussevitzky Music Shed at Tanglewood, through $500,000 for a named concert series or the concertmaster's chair, to $2500 to name a seat in Symphony Hall. Individual concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood and each of the Orchestra's principal chairs are also an important part of the commemorative program.

33

THE PILOT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 149,900
DEC 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Ch. 7, Dec. 11

Marcel Marceau Mimes Benefit for BSO Fund

When WNAC-TV presents the New England premiere of "Meet Marcel Marceau" in color on Monday, December 11 from 10 to 11 p.m., it will be serving a dual purpose:

(1) To entertain Channel 7 viewers with this delightful one-man concert by the world's greatest mime

(2) To benefit the Fund for the Boston Symphony.

Friends of the Symphony are gathering for dinner parties throughout the Commonwealth. Over after-dinner coffee they will enjoy a total of ten acts plus a special tribute to Marceau's favorite stars namely Stan Laurel, Buster Keaton, Harpo Marx, and Charlie Chaplin.

"Meet Marcel Marceau" is an RKO General production made in Hollywood by KHJ-TV before a live audience of 300 in the theatre-in-the-round style. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Groucho Marx, Agnes Moorehead, Elsa Lancaster, Dick Van Dyke, Ed Begley, Margo and many more Marceau admirers.

"The Apache opens the show. It is introduced by Marceau himself, marking the first time the "wordless wonder" has ever talked to an audience about his acts. Throughout the presentation he explains his motives for having conceived a particular routine beofre performing it.

Among the others are "The Circus," "The Tightrope Walker," "The Magician," "The Kite," "The Matador," "Bip at a Society Party," "Youth, Maturity, Old Age," and "Don Juan". The finale is his recreation of his favorite stars.

Marceau keeps his audience spellbound with his matchless ability to fashion concrete reality out of nothing.

As he puts it, "One cannot exercise a love for one's art unless one has a real love for it."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
JAN 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Wellesley to Share In Professor's Will

DEDHAM — Wellesley and two other colleges will profit from nearly half of a $1 million estate left by former Prof. Louise Kingsley.

The will was allowed Wednesday in Norfolk County Probate Court in Dedham by Judge J. John Fox.

Prof. Kingsley, who died Dec. 2, provided that the money be divided equally among Wellesley, Smith and Bryn Mawr.

A bond, filed Wednesday by Atty. David H. Locke, showed her personal property valued at $1,030,000 and real estate at $70,000.

She left to a friend, Grace Hawk, with whom she lived for many years, the income of a $100,000 trust fund and her home at 29 Appleby rd. in Wellesley.

Other recipients include Eleanor Kingsley of Pamona, Calif., $25,000, and Margaret Houck of Austin, Tex., $10,000.

Miss Kingsley also bequeathed $2000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Morgan Memorial, the Cancer Fund of Boston, the United Negro College Fund of New York, Haystack Mountain School for Crafts in Deer Isle, Me., and the American Friends Service Committee of Philadelphia.

A nephew, Kingman K. Babcock of Rochester, N.Y., was left all her personal property and half of the remainder of the estate.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
6 950
JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

$30 Million McCormick Gift Goes To MIT

BOSTON (UPI) — The late Katherine Dexter McCormick of Boston bequeathed most of her $30 million estate to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), according to her will filed in probate court in Santa Barbara, Calif.

Attorney James Black made the announcement when the papers were filed Thursday.

Mrs. McCormick, the widow of Stanley McCormick of the International Harvester family, died Dec. 28 at the age of 92.

She also left $5 million each to Stanford University and the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., of New York, the attorney said.

The exact amount that MIT will receive is not known.

Mrs. McCormick as bequeathed $1 million to the Worcester Foundation of Experimental Biology of Shrewsbury and $500,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250
JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Leaves Fortune to MIT

SANTA BARBARA, Cal. (AP) — Katherine Dexter McCormick left the bulk of her $30-million estate to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a spokesman for her law firm said Thursday.

The exact figure is unknown but it is expected to exceed substantially the $5 million she left Stanford University in California and another $5 million left to the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., of New York, Atty. James Black said.

Mrs. McCormick, widow of Stanley McCormick, of International Harvester, died Dec. 28 in Boston, Mass.

Her will was filed for probate in Superior Court, Santa Barbara, where she lived before her death.

Other beneficiaries included the Santa Barbara Museum of Art, which received $25,000; her Santa Barbara home, and several expensive paintings; the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, $500,000; the Worcester Foundation of Experimental Biology of Shrewsbury, Mass., $1 million, and for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, $500,000.

Other bequests:

In Massachusetts — Boston Museum of Fine Arts, art objects and paintings, including eight by Winslow Homer; College Club, Boston, $102,500; Chilton Club, Boston, $20,000; A. D. Club, Cambridge, $1,000.

124

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 20,900

NOV 2 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Fund Drive Passes $2.8 Million Mark

BOSTON — The fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds.

The major campaign, seeking to raise $5.5 million over the next four years, is intended to strengthen the orchestra's financial position for the coming decade as well as provide money for improvements to 67-year-old Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony summer home at Tanglewood.

Commemorative Gifts

As part of the fund for the Boston Symphony, the trustees of the orchestra have established a program of commemorative gifts by which donors may express a personal interest in the symphony and may honor a family member, musician, or friend. Significant gifts in this program of the fund for the Boston Symphony have just been announced.

Newly established funds are the Charles Munch Fund of $1 million, for bringing outstanding conductors to Symphony Hall and the Augustus P. Thorndike Fellowship Fund for a student at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. The Munch fund has received gifts totaling $540,000 from Henry B. Cabot, Edward A. Taft, and Mrs. H. Melvin Young. Contributions to the Thorndike Fellowship will total $25,000 from John L. Thorndike and members of his family.

Cellist Chair

The first named chair in the orchestra will be that of the principal cellist. A gift of $100,000 has been received from Philip K. Allen and other members of the Allen family. The cellist's chair will be named for Mr. Philip R. Allen, late trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gift opportunities in the commemorative gifts program of the fund for the Boston Symphony range from $1 million for the Koussevitzky Music Shed at Tanglewood through $500,000 for a named concert series or the concertmaster's chair, to $2,500 to name a seat in Symphony Hall. Individual concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood and each of the orchestra's principal chairs are also an important part of the commemorative program.

N. E. HOMESTEAD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL
CIRC. 75,000

NOV 1967 New England Newsclip

GIFTS, NEW FUNDS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON,—The Fund for the Boston Symphony, the first capital campaign ever undertaken by the orchestra, has passed the $2.8 million mark with the announcement of several important gifts and the establishment of two new funds. The major campaign seeking to raise $5.5 million over the next four years is intended to strengthen the orchestra's financial position for the coming decade as well as provide money for improvements to 67-year old Symphony Hall and the Boston Symphony summer home at Tanglewood.

Commemorative Gifts

As part of the fund for the Boston Symphony, the trustees of the orchestra have established a program of commemorative gifts by which donors may express a personal interest in the symphony and may honor a family member, musician, or friend. Significant gifts in this program of the fund for the Boston Symphony have just been announced.

Newly established funds are the Charles Munch Fund of $1 million, for bringing outstanding conductors to Symphony Hall and the Augustus P. Thorndike Fellowship Fund, for a student at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer center for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood. The Munch Fund has received gifts totaling $540,000 from Henry B. Cabot, Edward A. Taft, and Mrs. H. Melvin Young. Contributions to the Thorndike Fellowship will total $25,000 from John L. Thorndike and members of his family.

The first named chair in the orchestra will be that of the principal cellist. A gift of $100,000 has been received from Philip K. Allen and other members of the Allen family. The cellist's chair will be named for Mr. Philip R. Allen, late trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gift opportunities in the commemorative gifts program of the fund for the Boston Symphony range from $1 million for the Koussevitzky Music Shed at Tanglewood, through $500,000 for a named concert series or the concertmaster's chair, to $2500 to name a seat in Symphony Hall. Individual concerts at Symphony Hall and Tanglewood and each of the Orchestra's principal chairs are also an important part of the commemorative program.

THE PILOT
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 149,900

DEC 9 1967 New England Newsclip

Ch. 7, Dec. 11

Marcel Marceau Mimes Benefit for BSO Fund

When WNAC-TV presents the New England premiere of "Meet Marcel Marceau" in color on Monday, December 11 from 10 to 11 p.m., it will be serving a dual purpose:

(1) To entertain Channel 7 viewers with this delightful one-man concert by the world's greatest mime.

(2) To benefit the Fund for the Boston Symphony.

Friends of the Symphony are gathering for dinner parties throughout the Commonwealth. Over after-dinner coffee they will enjoy a total of ten acts plus a special tribute to Marceau's favorite stars namely Stan Laurel, Buster Keaton, Harpo Marx, and Charlie Chaplin.

"Meet Marcel Marceau" is an RKO General production made in Hollywood by KHJ-TV before a live audience of 300 in the theatre-in-the-round style. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Groucho Marx, Agnes Moorehead, Elsa Lancaster, Dick Van Dyke, Ed Begley, Margo and many more Marceau admirers.

"The Apache opens the show. It is introduced by Marceau himself, marking the first time the "wordless wonder" has ever talked to an audience about his acts. Throughout the presentation he explains his motives for having conceived a particular routine beofre performing it.

Among the others are "The Circus," "The Tightrope Walker," "The Magician," "The Kite," "The Matador," "Bip at a Society Party," "Youth, Maturity, Old Age," and "Don Juan". The finale is his recreation of his favorite stars.

Marceau keeps his audience spellbound with his matchless ability to fashion concrete reality out of nothing.

As he puts it, "One cannot exercise a love for one's art unless one has a real love for it."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

JAN 18 1968 New England Newsclip

Wellesley to Share In Professor's Will

DEDHAM — Wellesley and two other colleges will profit from nearly half of a $1 million estate left by former Prof. Louise Kingsley.

The will was allowed Wednesday in Norfolk County Probate Court in Dedham by Judge J. John Fox.

Prof. Kingsley, who died Dec. 2, provided that the money be divided equally among Wellesley, Smith and Bryn Mawr.

A bond, filed Wednesday by Atty. David H. Locke, showed her personal property valued at $1,030,000 and real estate at $70,000.

She left to a friend, Grace Hawk, with whom she lived for many years, the income of a $100,000 trust fund and her home at 29 Appleby rd. in Wellesley.

Other recipients include Eleanor Kingsley of Pamona, Calif., $25,000, and Margaret Houck of Austin, Tex., $10,000.

Miss Kingsley also bequeathed $2000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Morgan Memorial, the Cancer Fund of Boston, the United Negro College Fund of New York, Haystack Mountain School for Crafts in Deer Isle, Me., and the American Friends Service Committee of Philadelphia.

A nephew, Kingman K. Babcock of Rochester, N.Y., was left all her personal property and half of the remainder of the estate.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 16,950

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

$30 Million McCormick Gift Goes To MIT

BOSTON (UPI) — The late Katherine Dexter McCormick of Boston bequeathed most of her $30 million estate to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), according to her will filed in probate court in Santa Barbara, Calif.

Attorney James Black made the announcement when the papers were filed Thursday.

Mrs. McCormick, the widow of Stanley McCormick of the International Harvester family, died Dec. 28 at the age of 92.

She also left $5 million each to Stanford University and the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., of New York, the attorney said.

The exact amount that MIT will receive is not known.

Mrs. McCormick as bequeathed $1 million to the Worcester Foundation of Experimental Biology of Shrewsbury and $500,000 each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

JAN 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Leaves Fortune to MIT

SANTA BARBARA, Cal. (AP) — Katherine Dexter McCormick left the bulk of her $30-million estate to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, a spokesman for her law firm said Thursday.

The exact figure is unknown but it is expected to exceed substantially the $5 million she left Stanford University in California and another $5 million left to the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., of New York, Atty. James Black said.

Mrs. McCormick, widow of Stanley McCormick, of International Harvester, died Dec. 28 in Boston, Mass.

Her will was filed for probate in Superior Court, Santa Barbara, where she lived before her death.

Other beneficiaries included the Santa Barbara Museum of Art, which received $25,000; her Santa Barbara home, and several expensive paintings; the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, $500,000; the Worcester Foundation of Experimental Biology of Shrewsbury, Mass., $1 million, and for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, $500,000.

Other bequests:

In Massachusetts — Boston Museum of Fine Arts, art objects and paintings, including eight by Winslow Homer; College Club, Boston, $102,500; Chilton Club, Boston, $20,000; A. D. Club, Cambridge, $1,000.

125

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 13 1968 New England Newsclip

U.S. Symphonies Worried About Matching Ford Grants

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has until June 30, 1971, to raise $4 million in order to receive a $2 million grant from the Ford Foundation. Since it has already raised $3.8 million in its current $5.5 million fund drive, the BSO is not worried.

Most Worried

But most of the 61 symphony orchestras that are eligible to share in Ford's $80.2 million matching-grant offer are disturbed about their ability to meet the goal. Nine of them have reached the goal in pledges, but several others haven't even gone out yet for the money.

Unexpected pressures and fears for the future have been generated as byproducts of the grants because, in the words of Stewart Warkow, manager of the American Symphony Orchestra, "The Ford grant has become the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval for orchestras. We'll get the money, by hook or by crook, because we must."

Effects Are Measured

But most of the profound effects predicted at the time of the grants' announcement already have been felt, according to orchestra managers surveyed by the New York Times. These include:

Musicians' pay has been going up steeply, sometimes directly as a result of the Ford offer.

Seasons have been lengthened.

Administrative staffs, operating budgets and costs in general have climbed.

Musical standards, especially in smaller orchestras, have begun to rise.

Improving musicians' pay and expanding seasons were among the stated aims of the Ford grants to 26 "major" and 35 "metropolitan" orchestras, and gains in musical quality were expected to follow. Several managers declared that increased salary scales have enabled them to hold good players who probably would have drifted away in search of better, more stable conditions. This is particularly true of smaller orchestras, many of which do not sign musicians to contracts, but hire them on a per-service basis.

'A Mild Panic'

A typical response came from Ken Fricker, assistant manager of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic, who said, "The caliber of our orchestra has improved extremely in the last year." He noted that salaries are 25 per cent higher this season than last.

But the Ford grants have had the important side-result of spreading a mild panic, according to several orchestra officials. "It is a make-or-break situation now," said Harold Gregory, manager of the Utah Symphony. "The metropolitan orchestras are all driving to become ranked as majors, and the fear is that if they don't make it they may die off."

In addition, orchestras that did not rank high enough to be included in the 1966 Ford program are under pressure to move up to metropolitan status or perhaps face the possibility of withering away. Competition also has begun to rage among the major orchestras. Several are aiming to break into the magic circle of excellence long occupied by the Big Five: New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland.

Ranked

When it came time to make the grants, the Ford Foundation selected recipients according to a ranking made by the American Symphony Orchestra League.

The 26 orchestras with annual operating budgets of more than $500,000 were rated as major; 35 with budgets under $500,000 were rated as metropolitan.

Thus pressure is on the orchestras not only to raise more money, but also to spend more. The league recently revised its rating system, setting the minimum budget for a major orchestra at $1-million, and announced that the American Symphony Orchestra had moved up into that category. Warkow, the manager, said his orchestra's fund drive was "being formalized," and that it would get under way early in 1968.

Most skillful so far have been nine orchestras that have already met the Ford challenge: the Minneapolis Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Indianapolis Symphony, the Dallas Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the New Orleans Philharmonic, the Columbus (Ohio) Symphony, the Louisville Orchestra and the Wichita Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Looking Back: Anniversaries Highlighted Events of Year

A NEW YEAR has begun with its good resolutions and hopes for the future. But there are always backward glances over the year just ended and it's pleaasnt to remember some of its social highlights. Anniversaries played an important part in Boston's social life in 1967. The Junior League of Boston, Inc., celebrated its 60th anniversary, the Morning Musicales marked their 40th season, the Women's Educational and Industrial Union had its 90th birthday, and the Charles Playhouse, its 10th.

047

The Museum of Fine Arts had several memorable exhibitions with dinner parties before the previews. The largest and most valuable collection of Dutch paintings ever shown in this country drew crowds to the museum and there was a fabulous dinner of Dutch foods on opening night. The art of Turkey also lured throngs to the museum and there was a dinner featuring Turkish food.

The Symphony Orchestra also staged several unusual parties in 1967. To launch its $5.5 million fund, a performance of Mozart's Toy Symphony was given at the Somerset, with Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, in an 18th century costume complete with peruke, conducting the orchestra, composed of other trustees.

In the fall, a Valhalla party, followed the next evening by a Gold Rush party, both at the top of the Prudential Building, helped to swell the orchestra's funds.

For the first time, a ball was held at the Fogg Art Museum in Cambridge. This proved to be an enchanted evening in the stone courtyard, where ladies in evening gowns danced with their black-tie escorts to Ruby Newman's music.

On the same evening, a stormy one in January, the Junior League celebrated its 60th anniversary with a dinner dance in the ballroom of the Sheraton Plaza. This was only one of the many conflicts in dates in 1967, proving that Boston desperately needs a clearing house for social events.

Another "first" was the dinner party that opened the New England Spring Flower Show at Suffolk Downs and brought out Proper Bostonians in the midst of an old fashioned snowstorm, as if to prove that New England fibers are as tough as they were 300 years ago.

In April, the beat of Latin American music was heard in the ballroom of the Sheraton Plaza, where the Pan American Society of New England gave a colorful cocktail dansant with Mexican food and gay paper flowers.

On an evening in May, fireworks and champagne at Glen Magna Farm in Danvers helped to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the Charles Playhouse. A Headdress Ball at the Wianno Club and a Tiffany Ball in Newport were summer social highlights. And still another August event was the luncheon given at the Longwood Cricket Club in honor of Hazel Hotchkiss Wightman, the First Lady of Tennis.

The Ellis Memorial Antiques Show at Horticultural Hall in October had a delightful preview party. In December, a dinner dance at the Ritz-Carlton benefitted the Leukemia Society, and another one at the Logan Tower Restaurant aided the Jesuit Seminaries of New England.

One of the "different" coming-out parties was the paper party given for Reva Seybolt by her parents, the George Seybolts of Dedham, at which the dresses and decorations were made of paper. Another was the dance for Janet Wyman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Franklin Wyman Jr. of Brookline, which had an Oriental motif.

The social calendar for 1968 is already well-filled. Friday, Jan. 12, will be a busy day with the first of four Friends Friday Luncheons at Horticultural Hall before the Symphony concert, the Opera Ball at the Somerset in the evening, for which John F. Kennedy is honorary chairman. This $75 per party will benefit the Opera Company of Boston.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Pension Fund Concert by BSO Sunday Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 143rd Pension Fund concert will be presented at Symphony Hall on Sunday, Feb. 11, at 3 p.m. with Erich Leinsdorf conducting and Jack Benny as violin soloist.

Th eorchestral portion of the program will include the overture to Rossini's "Il Signor Bruschino" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 Mr. Benny, who makes his debut with the orchestra at this concert will bring his violin on stage following intermission for a performance of "Zigeunerweisen," by Pablo de Sarasate, the first movement of Mendelsohn's Violin Concerto in E minor and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol." Mr. Benny has warned that there may be encores.

Remaining tickets for the Feb. 11 concert are on sale at the Symphony Hall box office.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 10 1968 New England Newsclip

An Opera House Is Needed, Too

To The Herald Traveler Editor:

047

As for paying out $40 million to $50 million for a stadium, how about using some of that money for a decent opera house, which we also need, or using some funds to help the struggling Symphony Orchestra—or isn't Boston interested in the finer arts? The Council on Arts and Humanities is dragging its heels with a small donation. We are not against stadiums per se, but as the State of Massachusetts is already overburdened with taxes, we feel this should be a matter of private financing.

If such large sums can be raised for a goal such as sports, then surely a portion should be available also for more cultural purposes.

RUTH I. PARSONS
L. D. HARRIS

Gloucester

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

FEB 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Art for Our Sake

THE ADAGES say otherwise. But beauty can often be more than its own reward and art does not always exist solely for no sake than its own.

The Massachusetts State Council on the Arts and Humanities put it this way in its first annual report:

"People are discovering that the arts are vitally related to the great social issues of the time—family welfare, racial justice, education, urban renewal."

Nevertheless, the Council's illuminating report found that professional performing arts organizations—from small theater companies to the renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra—find it impossible today in Massachusetts "to be self supporting and must seek outside help from business, foundations and government."

Sadly, the arts get precious little help from state government. The Legislature's attitude ranges from being suspicious to being condescending. The Council itself gets only a $25,000 allowance, compared to $60,000 in Connecticut and $50,000 plus administrative costs in Rhode Island.

The Council's excellent first report carries a message clear and strong: Massachusetts will lose its cultural advantage unless it gets more deserved financial help from the Commonwealth.

125

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 13 1968 New England Newsclip

U.S. Symphonies Worried About Matching Ford Grants

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has until June 30, 1971, to raise $4 million in order to receive a $2 million grant from the Ford Foundation. Since it has already raised $3.8 million in its current $5.5 million fund drive, the BSO is not worried.

Most Worried

But most of the 61 symphony orchestras that are eligible to share in Ford's $80.2 million matching-grant offer are disturbed about their abifity to meet the goal. Nine of them have reached the goal in pledges, but several others haven't even gone out yet for the money.

Unexpected pressures and fears for the future have been generated as byproducts of the grants because, in the words of Stewart Warkow, manager of the American Symphony Orchestra, "The Ford grant has become the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval for orchestras. We'll get the money, by hook or by crook, because we must."

Effects Are Measured

But most of the profound effects predicted at the time of the grants' announcement already have been felt, according to orchestra managers surveyed by the New York Times. These include:

Musicians' pay has been going up steeply, sometimes directly as a result of the Ford offer.

Seasons have been lengthened.

Administrative staffs, operating budgets and costs in general have climbed.

Musical standards, especially in smaller orchestras, have begun to rise.

Improving musicians' pay and expanding seasons were among the stated aims of the Ford grants to 26 "major" and 35 "metropolitan" orchestras, and gains in musical quality were expected to follow. Several managers declared that increased salary scales have enabled them to hold good players who probably would have drifted away in search of better, more stable conditions. This is particularly true of smaller orchestras, many of which do not sign musicians to contracts, but hire them on a per-service basis.

'A Mild Panic'

A typical response came from Ken Fricker, assistant manager of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic, who said, "The caliber of our orchestra has improved extremely in the last year." He noted that salaries are 25 per cent higher this season than last.

But the Ford grants have had the important side-result of spreading a mild panic, according to several orchestra officials. "It is a make-or-break situation now," said Harold Gregory, manager of the Utah Symphony. "The metropolitan orchestras are all driving to become ranked as majors, and the fear is that if they don't make it they may die off."

In addition, orchestras that did not rank high enough to be included in the 1966 Ford program are under pressure to move up to metropolitan status or perhaps face the possibility of withering away. Competition also has begun to rage among the major orchestras. Several are aiming to break into the magic circle of excellence long occupied by the Big Five: New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland.

Ranked

When it came time to make the grants, the Ford Foundation selected recipients according to a ranking made by the American Symphony Orchestra League.

The 26 orchestras with annual operating budgets of more than $500,000 were rated as major; 35 with budgets under $500,000 were rated as metropolitan.

Thus pressure is on the orchestras not only to raise more money, but also to spend more. The league recently revised its rating system, setting the minimum budget for a major orchestra at $1-million, and announced that the American Symphony Orchestra had moved up into that category. Warkow, the manager, said his orchestra's fund drive was "being formalized," and that it would get under way early in 1968.

Most skillful so far have been nine orchestras that have already met the Ford challenge: the Minneapolis Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Indianapolis Symphony, the Dallas Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra, the New Orleans Philharmonic, the Columbus (Ohio) Symphony, the Louisville Orchestra and the Wichita Symphony.

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Looking Back: Anniversaries Highlighted Events of Year

A NEW YEAR has begun with its good resolutions and hopes for the future. But there are always backward glances over the year just ended and it's pleaasnt to remember some of its social highlights. Anniversaries played an important part in Boston's social life in 1967. The Junior League of Boston, Inc., celebrated its 60th anniversary, the Morning Musicales marked their 40th season, the Women's Educational and Industrial Union had its 90th birthday, and the Charles Playhouse, its 10th.

The Museum of Fine Arts had several memorable exhibitions with dinner parties before the previews. The largest and most valuable collection of Dutch paintings ever shown in this country drew crowds to the museum and there was a fabulous dinner of Dutch foods on opening night. The art of Turkey also lured throngs to the museum and there was a dinner featuring Turkish food.

The Symphony Orchestra also staged several unusual parties in 1967. To launch its $5.5 million fund, a performance of Mozart's Toy Symphony was given at the Somerset, with Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, in an 18th century costume complete with peruke, conducting the orchestra, composed of other trustees.

In the fall, a Valhalla party, followed the next evening by a Gold Rush party, both at the top of the Prudential Building, helped to swell the orchestra's funds.

For the first time, a ball was held at the Fogg Art Museum in Cambridge. This proved to be an enchanted evening in the stone courtyard, where ladies in evening gowns danced with their black-tie escorts to Ruby Newman's music.

On the same evening, a stormy one in January, the Junior League celebrated its 60th anniversary with a dinner dance in the ballroom of the Sheraton Plaza. This was only one of the many conflicts in dates in 1967, proving that Boston desperately needs a clearing house for social events.

Another "first" was the dinner party that opened the New England Spring Flower Show at Suffolk Downs and brought out Proper Bostonians in the midst of an old fashioned snowstorm, as if to prove that New England fibers are as tough as they were 300 years ago.

In April, the beat of Latin American music was heard in the ballroom of the Sheraton Plaza, where the Pan American Society of New England gave a colorful cocktail dansant with Mexican food and gay paper flowers.

On an evening in May, fireworks and champagne at Glen Magna Farm in Danvers helped to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the Charles Playhouse. A Headdress Ball at the Wianno Club and a Tiffany Ball in Newport were summer social highlights. And still another August event was the luncheon given at the Longwood Cricket Club in honor of Hazel Hotchkiss Wightman, the First Lady of Tennis.

The Ellis Memorial Antiques Show at Horticultural Hall in October had a delightful preview party. In December, a dinner dance at the Ritz-Carlton benefitted the Leukemia Society, and another one at the Logan Tower Restaurant aided the Jesuit Seminaries of New England.

One of the "different" coming-out parties was the paper party given for Reva Seybolt by her parents, the George Seybolts of Dedham, at which the dresses and decorations were made of paper. Another was the dance for Janet Wyman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Franklin Wyman Jr. of Brookline, which had an Oriental motif.

The social calendar for 1968 is already well-filled. Friday, Jan. 12, will be a busy day with the first of four Friends Friday Luncheons at Horticultural Hall before the Symphony concert, the Opera Ball at the Somerset in the evening, for which John F. Kennedy is honorary chairman. This $75 per party will benefit the Opera Company of Boston.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 2 1968 New England Newsclip

Pension Fund Concert by BSO Sunday Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 143rd Pension Fund concert will be presented at Symphony Hall on Sunday, Feb. 11, at 3 p.m. with Erich Leinsdorf conducting and Jack Benny as violin soloist.

Th eorchestral portion of the program will include the overture to Rossini's "Il Signor Bruschino" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 Mr. Benny, who makes his debut with the orchestra at this concert will bring his violin on stage following intermission for a performance of "Zigeunerweisen," by Pablo de Sarasate, the first movement of Mendelsohn's Violin Concerto in E minor and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol." Mr. Benny has warned that there may be encores.

Remaining tickets for the Feb. 11 concert are on sale at the Symphony Hall box office.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

JAN 10 1968 New England Newsclip

An Opera House Is Needed, Too

To The Herald Traveler Editor:

As for paying out $40 million to $50 million for a stadium, how about using some of that money for a decent opera house, which we also need, or using some funds to help the struggling Symphony Orchestra—or isn't Boston interested in the finer arts? The Council on Arts and Humanities is dragging its heels with a small donation. We are not against stadiums per se, but as the State of Massachusetts is already overburdened with taxes, we feel this should be a matter of private financing.

If such large sums can be raised for a goal such as sports, then surely a portion should be available also for more cultural purposes.

RUTH I. PARSONS
L. D. HARRIS

Gloucester

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

FEB 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Art for Our Sake

THE ADAGES say otherwise. But beauty can often be more than its own reward and art does not always exist solely for no sake than its own.

The Massachusetts State Council on the Arts and Humanities put it this way in its first annual report:

"People are discovering that the arts are vitally related to the great social issues of the time—family welfare, racial justice, education, urban renewal."

Nevertheless, the Council's illuminating report found that professional performing arts organizations—from small theater companies to the renowned Boston Symphony Orchestra—find it impossible today in Massachusetts "to be self supporting and must seek outside help from business, foundations and government."

Sadly, the arts get precious little help from state government. The Legislature's attitude ranges from being suspicious to being condescending. The Council itself gets only a $25,000 allowance, compared to $60,000 in Connecticut and $50,000 plus administrative costs in Rhode Island.

The Council's excellent first report carries a message clear and strong: Massachusetts will lose its cultural advantage unless it gets more deserved financial help from the Commonwealth.

AWARDS

126

JENKINTOWN, PA.
TIMES CHRONICLE
W. 7,509

JAN 25 1968

STOKOWSKI FOR WELLESLEY . . . Three directors of Wellesley-in-Philadelphia meet to discuss plans for the alumnae club benefit at the Academy of Music Jan. 30. The Boston Symphony, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, will give a concert for the benefit of the Wellesley-in-Philadelphia Scholarship Fund. Working on arrangements are (from left) Mrs. James B. Lynch, Rydal; Mrs. George J. Hauptfuhrer, Jr., Huntingdon Valley, club president; and Mrs. D. Gerald Scott, Jenkintown, treasurer.

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 16,400

JAN 29 1968

New England Newsclip

WCRB to Sponsor Three Concerts For Scholarships

Radio station WCRB has announced a 20th anniversary series of three concerts in Symphony Hall to benefit the WCRB Scholarship Fund.

General Manager Richard L. Kaye said that in addition to the 10th Annual WCRB Night at Pops June 15 the station will present Renato Fasano, conductor, April 17 and the Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, Anshel Brusilov, conductor, Oct. 11.

The WCRB Scholarship Fund each year since 1965 has provided financial assistance for young musicians at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

Horn soloist William Lane, who received scholarship aid in 1966, was soloist at the 1967 WCRB Night at Pops. He is now first horn in the Buffalo Philharmonic. Cellist Jerome Patterson, who received scholarship aid in 1967, is now a member of the Boston Symphony.

MUSIC CLUBS MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
5 TI. A YR. 5,500

DEC 1967

James Wagner, 19, tenor from Los Angeles, and Emily Faxon, 22, violinist from Brookline, Massachusetts, are winners of NFMC Tanglewood scholarships at Berkshire Music Center, named in honor of Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Past National President. They are pictured with Erick Leinsdorf, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of Tanglewood Music Center. James will be a Junior this fall at the Eastman School of Music and Emily a Senior at Juilliard.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

OCT 1 1967

New England Newsclip

N.E. Conservatory Names 18

Eighteen faculty and administrative appointments to the New England Conservatory of Music have been announced by president-elect Gunther Schuller.

Rudolf Kolisch, pupil of Arnold Schoenberg and former leader of the Pro Arte and Kolisch string quartets, will join the chamber music department. Aldo Parisot, professor of cello at Yale, will become a visiting artist and Russell Sherman, a pupil of Edward Steuermann, will head the piano department. Lav Vrbanic, formerly of the Conservatory of Zagreb, will join the voice department.

Among administrative appointments are those of Donald Harris as assistant to the president, Harvey Phillips as executive assistant, James Whitaker as registrar, and Chester W. Williams as dean of undergraduates.

Other faculty appointments:

Music education department — Herbert Alper, formerly of the Farmingdale, L.I., schools and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Voice department — Silvio Cosca, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Stringed instruments department — Steven Geber, Henry Portnoi and William Rhein, all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Theory department — John Heiss, Ernst Oster, formerly of the Manhattan School of Music, and Victor Rosenbaum.

Academic studies department — Charles Nathanson, formerly of Brandeis University.

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5,500

OCT 1967

AT BALDWIN FELLOWSHIP PRESENTATION . . . Meeting at Tanglewood are Kimberly Kabala; Yuji Takahashi; Robert C. Cosgrove, Baldwin director of sales promotion; Robert Wallace; Jack Romann, Baldwin concert and artist manager; and Craig Shepphard . . . Messrs. Kabala, Takahashi, Wallace and Shepphard are the 1967 recipients of Wulsin Fellowships at the Berkshire Music Center, presented by Baldwin Piano & Organ Company.

Four Piano Students Get Lucien Wulsin Fellowships

Four piano students at the 1967 Berkshire Music Center were recent recipients of Wulsin Fellowships awarded by Baldwin Piano & Organ Company. This year's Wulsin Fellows are Kimberly Kabala, Craig Shepphard, Yuji Takahashi, and Robert Wallace. The annual scholarships are presented by Baldwin in memory of the late Lucien Wulsin, long-time Baldwin president. Baldwin is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center, a spokesman said.

Mr. Kabala, from Huntington Woods, Mich., is a student at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor where he studies piano with Charles Fisher. He has also studied composition and conducting with Leslie Basset and Maynard Klein.

Mr. Shepphard, from Jenkintown, Pa., is a student at the Curtis Institute of Music. He has given solo performances with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Youth Concerts and last June was a recipient of the Young Musicians Debut Awards.

Mr. Takahashi is from Japan and is a graduate of the Toho Conservatory. During the 1966-67 season he played the Ives' Fourth Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also played the American premiere of Schoenberg's Moses and Aaron. He has also studied with Yannis Xenakis.

Mr. Wallace, from Fredonia, N.Y., graduated in June from the Manhattan School of Music where he studied with Dora Zaslavsky. He has played with the 1963 MENC All-Eastern Orchestra and the "Y" Choral Society of New York City.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,000

FEB 2 1968

New England Newsclip

Arts Council Makes 4 Music Project Grants

Four state grants by the Commission on the Arts and Humanities will bring four separate programs of music to all sections of the state during the coming year. The music events made possible by the grants are:

— Continuation of the Aeolian Chamber concerts at Bowdoin during the summer months, a part of the Bowdoin summer music program.

— A series of 13 programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast on Channel 10 — ETV.

— A concert by the Portland Symphony Orchestra in Guilford, a "first" for that town, and the longest trip the full symphony has undertaken. The date is not announced.

— A jazz concert by the Paul Knoff Trio, to be presented for Colby students and Waterville residents at the Waterville Opera House Feb. 18.

Cosponsored by the college chaplain's program and the Waterville Theatre Guild, ordinarily such programs been presented on campus. With the cooperative sponsorship and assistance of a small grant-in-aid, the concert will reach a much wider audience.

AWARDS

126

JENKINTOWN, PA.
TIMES CHRONICLE
W. 7 509

JAN 25 1968

STOKOWSKI FOR WELLESLEY . . . Three directors of Wellesley-in-Philadelphia meet to discuss plans for the alumnae club benefit at the Academy of Music Jan. 30. The Boston Symphony, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, will give a concert for the benefit of the Wellesley-in-Philadelphia Scholarship Fund. Working on arrangements are (from left) Mrs. James B. Lynch, Rydal; Mrs. George J. Hauptfuhrer, Jr., Huntingdon Valley, club president; and Mrs. D. Gerald Scott, Jenkintown, treasurer.

NEWS-TRIBUNE (e)
WALTHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 16,400

JAN 29 1968

New England Newsclip

WCRB to Sponsor Three Concerts For Scholarships

Radio station WCRB has announced a 20th anniversary series of three concerts in Symphony Hall to benefit the WCRB Scholarship Fund.

General Manager Richard L. Kaye said that in addition to the 10th Annual WCRB Night at Pops June 15 the station will present Renato Fasano, conductor, April 17 and the Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia, Anshel Brusilov, conductor, Oct. 11.

The WCRB Scholarship Fund each year since 1965 has provided financial assistance for young musicians at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

Horn soloist William Lane, who received scholarship aid in 1966, was soloist at the 1967 WCRB Night at Pops. He is now first horn in the Buffalo Philharmonic. Cellist Jerome Patterson, who received scholarship aid in 1967, is now a member of the Boston Symphony.

MUSIC CLUBS MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
5 TI. A YR. 5,500

DEC 1967

James Wagner, 19, tenor from Los Angeles, and Emily Faxon, 22, violinist from Brookline, Massachusetts, are winners of NFMC Tanglewood scholarships at Berkshire Music Center, named in honor of Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Past National President. They are pictured with Erick Leinsdorf, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra and Director of Tanglewood Music Center. James will be a Junior this fall at the Eastman School of Music and Emily a Senior at Juilliard.

MUSIC TRADES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 5,500

OCT 1967

AT BALDWIN FELLOWSHIP PRESENTATION . . . Meeting at Tanglewood are Kimberly Kabala; Yuji Takahashi; Robert C. Cosgrove, Baldwin director of sales promotion; Robert Wallace; Jack Romann, Baldwin concert and artist manager; and Craig Shepphard . . . Messrs. Kabala, Takahashi, Wallace and Shepphard are the 1967 recipients of Wulsin Fellowships at the Berkshire Music Center, presented by Baldwin Piano & Organ Company.

Four Piano Students Get Lucien Wulsin Fellowships

Four piano students at the 1967 Berkshire Music Center were recent recipients of Wulsin Fellowships awarded by Baldwin Piano & Organ Company. This year's Wulsin Fellows are Kimberly Kabala, Craig Shepphard, Yuji Takahashi, and Robert Wallace. The annual scholarships are presented by Baldwin in memory of the late Lucien Wulsin, long-time Baldwin president. Baldwin is the official piano of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center, a spokesman said.

Mr. Kabala, from Huntington Woods, Mich., is a student at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor where he studies piano with Charles Fisher. He has also studied composition and conducting with Leslie Basset and Maynard Klein.

Mr. Shepphard, from Jenkintown, Pa., is a student at the Curtis Institute of Music. He has given solo performances with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Youth Concerts and last June was a recipient of the Young Musicians Debut Awards.

Mr. Takahashi is from Japan and is a graduate of the Toho Conservatory. During the 1966-67 season he played the Ives' Fourth Symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also played the American premiere of Schoenberg's Moses and Aaron. He has also studied with Yannis Xenakis.

Mr. Wallace, from Fredonia, N.Y., graduated in June from the Manhattan School of Music where he studied with Dora Zaslavsky. He has played with the 1963 MENC All-Eastern Orchestra and the "Y" Choral Society of New York City.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
[illegible] 050

OCT 1 1967

New England Newsclip

N.E. Conservatory Names 18

Eighteen faculty and administrative appointments to the New England Conservatory of Music have been announced by president-elect Gunther Schuller.

Rudolf Kolisch, pupil of Arnold Schoenberg and former leader of the Pro Arte and Kolisch string quartets, will join the chamber music department. Aldo Parisot, professor of cello at Yale, will become a visiting artist and Russell Sherman, a pupil of Edward Steuermann, will head the piano department. Lav Vrbanic, formerly of the Conservatory of Zagreb, will join the voice department.

Among administrative appointments are those of Donald Harris as assistant to the president, Harvey Phillips as executive assistant, James Whitaker as registrar, and Chester W. Williams as dean of undergraduates.

Other faculty appointments:

Music education department — Herbert Alper, formerly of the Farmingdale, L.I., schools and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Voice department — Silvio Cosca, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Stringed instruments department — Steven Geber, Henry Portnoi and William Rhein, all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Theory department — John Heiss, Ernst Oster, formerly of the Manhattan School of Music, and Victor Rosenbaum.

Academic studies department — Charles Nathanson, formerly of Brandeis University.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,000

FEB 2 1968

New England Newsclip

Arts Council Makes 4 Music Project Grants

Four state grants by the Commission on the Arts and Humanities will bring four separate programs of music to all sections of the state during the coming year. The music events made possible by the grants are:

— Continuation of the Aeolian Chamber concerts at Bowdoin during the summer months, a part of the Bowdoin summer music program.

— A series of 13 programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be broadcast on Channel 10 — ETV.

— A concert by the Portland Symphony Orchestra in Guilford, a "first" for that town, and the longest trip the full symphony has undertaken. The date is not announced.

— A jazz concert by the Paul Knoff Trio, to be presented for Colby students and Waterville residents at the Waterville Opera House Feb. 18.

Cosponsored by the college chaplain's program and the Waterville Theatre Guild, ordinarily such programs been presented on campus. With the cooperative sponsorship and assistance of a small grant-in-aid, the concert will reach a much wider audience.

121

TRUSTEE NEWS

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

DEC 23 1967 New England Newsclip

Music

Senator Kennedy New Symphony Trustee

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy has been elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Announcement was made by the Orchestra's president, Henry B. Cabot.

Mr. Kennedy, who will be the 18th member of the board will assume his duties immediately. He has been deeply interested in the Orchestra's affairs and has been prominently active in advancing the cause of music in the nation. Through his efforts as president of the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr. Foundation, he arranged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's participation at a special Symphony hall program in April ol last year for the presentation of the Foundation's International awards. Taking the role of performer, Sen. Kennedy twice appeared with the Orchestra as narrator in Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." The first occasion was a benefit for the Orcestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and the second, a year ago in Symphony hall, at the annual Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy

The newly formed Boston Philharmonic Society is expected to fulfill a most necessary musical need in the immediate area, the Commonwealth and throughout New England.

This organization will enable many music lovers to attend symphonic concerts of high professional standard. At present the situation is such that only subscribers have the opportunity of attending Boston Symphony concerts. The Philharmonic whose membership will list artists of full professional rank will offer programs featuring compositions of not only the 19th and 20th centuries, but also works of the masters of 17th and 18th centuries.

THE ORCHESTRA WILL concern itself with preparing and performing music of these periods whose scoring was for smaller groups. A permanent nucleus of about 40 players will fit the pattern perfectly, and those who attend the opening concerts in Jordan Hall at the New England Converatory of Music during March-April will possibly be treated to programs superb in taste.

Conductor for the opening group of concerts has not as yet been selected. Guest conductors will direct until a permanent music director is named by the trustees and the orchestra's membership. The trustees have also made it clear that the new orchestra will complement and not compete with existing musical resources in Boston or in any part of New England. It has been established to provide concerts for a wide audience which, until now, has been deprived of the cultural enjoyment of hearing classical masterpieces.

One of the most important developments concerned with the venture is the benefit that will be brought into the educational field. Though the educational media in music has been somewhat thoroughly explored, and to a degree, developed to a high standard, music appreciation can be advanced by means of a performing series.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

JAN 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Head Liked Editorial

To The Editor:

An editorial in your paper of Jan. 4 about Sen. Kennedy becoming a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been brought to my attention. I wish to say a word of appreciation for this understanding editorial.

HENRY B. CABOT
President,
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

JAN 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Kennedy at the Symphony

The culture kick is catching on among politicians. It is fashionable for them to associate themselves with ballet and symphony and opera and all the fine arts.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy need no longer blush when someone points to his colleague, Sen. Edward W. Brooke, as a past president of the Opera Company in Boston and as a performer at the Worcester Music Festival. For Kennedy has been elected as a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an even more prestigious post and an uncommon one for a Democratic politician in Massachusetts.

This is not window dressing for Kennedy or the symphony. He has a genuine interest in the orchestra's affairs and has not hesitated to show it. And his wife, Joan, has emerged on the concert platform with success. Similarly, Sen. Brooke is an admirer of opera and has been willing to stand up and be counted as such.

There was a time when few politicians would be caught admiring activities so far removed from what were considered to be interests of the shirt-sleeved "common man." But symphony and opera reach a far broader audience today than ever before; they are not playthings of the rich.

It is safe for a Massachusetts politician to admit out loud that he enjoys the richer aspects of cultural life. That is a good and healthy situation for our state.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

* * *

WHAT A HEYDAY the Valkyrie is having allotting various young conductors to posts in the orchestral Valhalla. The trustees of Boston and New York really don't need to convene any more. Between the SNQ and the Mrs. Grundys along the Eastern seaboard, the matter has been settled. All that is needed is for the respective chairmen to get in touch with the proper and super-competent personnel managers of the loosely-joined but tightly-confident organizations to be informed what selections to make.

The last time the Boston trustees had to face this problem was when Charles Munch resigned after filling the post of conductor 13 years. At that time there was the same gossip and curiosity, both interested and prying, and attempts to outguess the trustees. One would have thought the public was playing checkers the way it moved "men" around.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

DEC 23 1967 New England Newsclip

Sen. Ted Kennedy Elected Trustee By the BSO

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the election of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy to the orchestra's board of trustees. Senator Kennedy becomes the 18th member of the present board and will assume his duties immediately.

In recent years Senator Kennedy has demonstrated an active interest in the orchestra and its affairs. Through his efforts as president of the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr., Foundation, he arranged for the Boston Symphony's partciipation at a special Symphony Hall program in April 1966 for the presentation of the foundation's international awards.

Taking the role of performer, Senator Kennedy twice appeared with the orchestra as narrator in Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." The first occasion was a benefit for the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and the second, a year ago in Symphony Hall, was at the annual Boston Symphony pension fund concert.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

FEB 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Directory Offers Budding Artists Good Tips

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music

The hopeful young musician who wonders about his chances on the concert stage will find valuable information in Music Journal's new Music & Artists Annual Directory.

It lists a large majority of soloists who will be performing before the public, nationwide and abroad, during the 1968-1969 season.

They are handled by 64 professional managers.

By far the largest management is Columbia Artists which book Community Concerts series in Worcester, Southbridge, Fitchburg and Putnam, Conn.

Columbia has several hundred such accounts throughout the nation, and in Canada.

Sopranos Popular

The most popular attractions on the concert stage today are sopranos. There are 186 of them circulating on the concert platform, in opera, oratorio and musicals.

Next in popularity are pianists. Their professional roster comes to 163. Then comes a list of 112 tenors, followed by 98 baritones, 69 violinists, 68 mezzo-sopranos, 66 bass-baritones, 33 cellists, 17 contraltos, and eight violists.

Some fields are literally without competition.

One each of the following instrumentalists are made available by the 64 managers: Saxophone, trumpet, trombone, bassoon, xylophone, accordion, harmonica, and recorder.

Surprisingly enough, there are 102 conductors, many of them famous, who do not have regular posts and are seeking engagements through personal managements and representatives.

Local series' sponsors have long known that the "big five" box-office draws are sopranos, pianists, tenors, baritones and violinists.

BSO GUEST CONDUCTORS — Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have strong evidence that they tried to respond to Erich Liensdorf's plea for more assistance with his conducting duties.

During his first season (1962-1963) they provided him with three guest conductors — Richard Burgin, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux.

Second season, there were four guest conductors of the Boston Symphony; third season, five; fourth season, five; fifth season, six.

This season, Leinsdorf has the assistance of eight guest conductors. They are Wilson, Mester, Skrowaczewski, Stokowski, Munch, Ozawa, Ehrling and Rudel.

NEWS ITEMS — Composer Carlos Surinach apparently enjoys hearing "live" performances of his own music. In October, he attended the Worcester Music Festival when Sixten Ehrling conducted the Detroit Symphony in his "Melorhythmic Dances."

Surinach recently showed up at Bushnell Auditorium in Hartford to hear Arthur Winograd conduct the Hartford Symphony in his "Sinfonietta Flamenca."

It's exciting news to the entire musical nation that the great Russian - American pianist Vladimir Horowitz has consented to make his television debut in a recital.

The late Sergei Rachmaninoff absolutely refused to perform even on radio.

Last Thursday, at Carnegie Hall, Horowitz taped a full hour program for a special broadcast to be announced. The performance was before an audience.

Horowitz has been in semi-retirement from the concert stage for several years, although he has made recordings from the stage of Carnegie Hall.

He gave two reasons for his decision:

1. "Because it is the only way I can respond to the demands of Americans everywhere to appear in their communities in recital."

2. "Because I am convinced that television has reached a state of technical and artistic maturity which can sustain the highest standards."

Before accepting the television offer, Horowitz made test performances. Programs were taped in color at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 2 and 3.

Concerning them, Horowitz said: "I have studied the results and am satisfied that the music emerges a s the prime concern. My program will be like those I have given in recital. Furthermore, there will be no interruptions in the program."

127

TRUSTEE NEWS

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

DEC 23 1967 New England Newsclip

Music

Senator Kennedy New Symphony Trustee

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy has been elected a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Announcement was made by the Orchestra's president, Henry B. Cabot.

Mr. Kennedy, who will be the 18th member of the board will assume his duties immediately. He has been deeply interested in the Orchestra's affairs and has been prominently active in advancing the cause of music in the nation. Through his efforts as president of the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr. Foundation, he arranged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's participation at a special Symphony hall program in April ol last year for the presentation of the Foundation's International awards. Taking the role of performer, Sen. Kennedy twice appeared with the Orchestra as narrator in Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." The first occasion was a benefit for the Orcestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and the second, a year ago in Symphony hall, at the annual Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy

The newly formed Boston Philharmonic Society is expected to fulfill a most necessary musical need in the immediate area, the Commonwealth and throughout New England.

This organization will enable many music lovers to attend symphonic concerts of high professional standard. At present the situation is such that only subscribers have the opportunity of attending Boston Symphony concerts. The Philharmonic whose membership will list artists of full professional rank will offer programs featuring compositions of not only the 19th and 20th centuries, but also works of the masters of 17th and 18th centuries.

THE ORCHESTRA WILL concern itself with preparing and performing music of these periods whose scoring was for smaller groups. A permanent nucleus of about 40 players will fit the pattern perfectly, and those who attend the opening concerts in Jordan Hall at the New England Converatory of Music during March-April will possibly be treated to programs superb in taste.

Conductor for the opening group of concerts has not as yet been selected. Guest conductors will direct until a permanent music director is named by the trustees and the orchestra's membership. The trustees have also made it clear that the new orchestra will complement and not compete with existing musical resources in Boston or in any part of New England. It has been established to provide concerts for a wide audience which, until now, has been deprived of the cultural enjoyment of hearing classical masterpieces.

One of the most important developments concerned with the venture is the benefit that will be brought into the educational field. Though the educational media in music has been somewhat thoroughly explored, and to a degree, developed to a high standard, music appreciation can be advanced by means of a performing series.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

JAN 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Head Liked Editorial

To The Editor:

An editorial in your paper of Jan. 4 about Sen. Kennedy becoming a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been brought to my attention. I wish to say a word of appreciation for this understanding editorial.

HENRY B. CABOT
President,
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

JAN 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Kennedy at the Symphony

The culture kick is catching on among politicians. It is fashionable for them to associate themselves with ballet and symphony and opera and all the fine arts.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy need no longer blush when someone points to his colleague, Sen. Edward W. Brooke, as a past president of the Opera Company in Boston and as a performer at the Worcester Music Festival. For Kennedy has been elected as a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an even more prestigious post and an uncommon one for a Democratic politician in Massachusetts.

This is not window dressing for Kennedy or the symphony. He has a genuine interest in the orchestra's affairs and has not hesitated to show it. And his wife, Joan, has emerged on the concert platform with success. Similarly, Sen. Brooke is an admirer of opera and has been willing to stand up and be counted as such.

There was a time when few politicians would be caught admiring activities so far removed from what were considered to be interests of the shirt-sleeved "common man." But symphony and opera reach a far broader audience today than ever before; they are not playthings of the rich.

It is safe for a Massachusetts politician to admit out loud that he enjoys the richer aspects of cultural life. That is a good and healthy situation for our state.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 27 1968 New England Newsclip

* * *

WHAT A HEYDAY the Valkyrie is having allotting various young conductors to posts in the orchestral Valhalla. The trustees of Boston and New York really don't need to convene any more. Between the SNQ and the Mrs. Grundys along the Eastern seaboard, the matter has been settled. All that is needed is for the respective chairmen to get in touch with the proper and super-competent personnel managers of the loosely-joined but tightly-confident organizations to be informed what selections to make.

The last time the Boston trustees had to face this problem was when Charles Munch resigned after filling the post of conductor 13 years. At that time there was the same gossip and curiosity, both interested and prying, and attempts to outguess the trustees. One would have thought the public was playing checkers the way it moved "men" around.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

DEC 23 1967 New England Newsclip

Sen. Ted Kennedy Elected Trustee By the BSO

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the election of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy to the orchestra's board of trustees. Senator Kennedy becomes the 18th member of the present board and will assume his duties immediately.

In recent years Senator Kennedy has demonstrated an active interest in the orchestra and its affairs. Through his efforts as president of the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr., Foundation, he arranged for the Boston Symphony's partciipation at a special Symphony Hall program in April 1966 for the presentation of the foundation's international awards.

Taking the role of performer, Senator Kennedy twice appeared with the orchestra as narrator in Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." The first occasion was a benefit for the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and the second, a year ago in Symphony Hall, was at the annual Boston Symphony pension fund concert.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

FEB 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Directory Offers Budding Artists Good Tips

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music

The hopeful young musician who wonders about his chances on the concert stage will find valuable information in Music Journal's new Music & Artists Annual Directory.

It lists a large majority of soloists who will be performing before the public, nationwide and abroad, during the 1968-1969 season.

They are handled by 64 professional managers.

By far the largest management is Columbia Artists which book Community Concerts series in Worcester, Southbridge, Fitchburg and Putnam, Conn.

Columbia has several hundred such accounts throughout the nation, and in Canada.

Sopranos Popular

The most popular attractions on the concert stage today are sopranos. There are 186 of them circulating on the concert platform, in opera, oratorio and musicals.

Next in popularity are pianists. Their professional roster comes to 163. Then comes a list of 112 tenors, followed by 98 baritones, 69 violinists, 68 mezzo-sopranos, 66 bass-baritones, 33 cellists, 17 contraltos, and eight violists.

Some fields are literally without competition.

One each of the following instrumentalists are made available by the 64 managers: Saxophone, trumpet, trombone, bassoon, xylophone, accordion, harmonica, and recorder.

Surprisingly enough, there are 102 conductors, many of them famous, who do not have regular posts and are seeking engagements through personal managements and representatives.

Local series' sponsors have long known that the "big five" box-office draws are sopranos, pianists, tenors, baritones and violinists.

BSO GUEST CONDUCTORS — Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have strong evidence that they tried to respond to Erich Liensdorf's plea for more assistance with his conducting duties.

During his first season (1962-1963) they provided him with three guest conductors — Richard Burgin, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux.

Second season, there were four guest conductors of the Boston Symphony; third season, five; fourth season, five; fifth season, six.

This season, Leinsdorf has the assistance of eight guest conductors. They are Wilson, Mester, Skrowaczewski, Stokowski, Munch, Ozawa, Ehrling and Rudel.

NEWS ITEMS — Composer Carlos Surinach apparently enjoys hearing "live" performances of his own music. In October, he attended the Worcester Music Festival when Sixten Ehrling conducted the Detroit Symphony in his "Melorhythmic Dances."

Surinach recently showed up at Bushnell Auditorium in Hartford to hear Arthur Winograd conduct the Hartford Symphony in his "Sinfonietta Flamenca."

It's exciting news to the entire musical nation that the great Russian - American pianist Vladimir Horowitz has consented to make his television debut in a recital.

The late Sergei Rachmaninoff absolutely refused to perform even on radio.

Last Thursday, at Carnegie Hall, Horowitz taped a full hour program for a special broadcast to be announced. The performance was before an audience.

Horowitz has been in semi-retirement from the concert stage for several years, although he has made recordings from the stage of Carnegie Hall.

He gave two reasons for his decision:

1. "Because it is the only way I can respond to the demands of Americans everywhere to appear in their communities in recital."

2. "Because I am convinced that television has reached a state of technical and artistic maturity which can sustain the highest standards."

Before accepting the television offer, Horowitz made test performances. Programs were taped in color at Carnegie Hall on Jan. 2 and 3.

Concerning them, Horowitz said: "I have studied the results and am satisfied that the music emerges a s the prime concern. My program will be like those I have given in recital. Furthermore, there will be no interruptions in the program."

FRIENDS OF B.S.O.

128

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

SEP 20 1967 New England Newsclip

Symphony Tea Friday in Concord

THE CONCORD AREA of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a tea for the Friday afternoon subscribers to the Symphony concerts. The tea will take place at the home of Mrs. William B. Moses Jr., 86 Main St., Concord, Friday, Sept. 22, at 3 o'clock.

The subscribers to the Friday afternoon concerts have a charter bus that takes them into Boston in time for luncheon or shopping and returns them to Concord after the concerts.

Last year, the charter bus treasury had a surplus, so the Concord Ladies Symphony Bus gave the Friends of the orchestra a check for $250. The council will honor those women at the tea that will launch the 1967-68 season. Friday subscribers who do not take the bus are invited, too.

Mrs. James Perkins, a trustee of the orchestra, will be there, and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock will tell about the plans for the orchestra this year. Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair and Mrs. Howard W. Davis are co-chairmen of the Concord Area Council of Friends. Helping them with the tea are Mrs. Anatole Haemmerle and Mrs. Henry Keyes.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

SEP 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Tea On Friday For Symphony Subscribers

The Concord Area of the Council of Friends for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving a tea for the Friday afternoon subscribers of the Symphony concerts. This tea will be at the home of Mrs. William B. Moses, Jr., 86 Main st., Friday, September 22, at 3 p.m.

The subscribers to the Friday afternoon concerts have a Charter Bus which takes them into Boston in time for luncheon or shopping and returns them to Concord after the concerts. Last year the Charter Bus treasury had a surplus, so the Concord Ladies Symphony Bus gave the Friends of the Orchestra a check for $250. The Council now wishes to honor those ladies with this tea and to launch the 1967-68 season. Friday subscribers who do not take the bus are cordially invited to come.

Mrs. Janes Perkins, a Trustee of the Orchestra, will be attending, and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock is going to speak about the plans of the Orchestra this year. The committee is requesting that the guests arrive on time.

Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair and Mrs. Howard W. Davis are co-chairmen for the Concord Area Council of Friends. Committee members helping as hostesses with the tea are Mrs. Anatole Haemmerle and Mrs. Henry Keyes.

FREE PRESS
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,300

SEP 21 1967 New England Newsclip

Symphony-Goers To Enjoy Tea

The Concord Area of the Council of Friends for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving a Tea for the Friday Afternoon Subscribers of the Symphony Concerts of this area. This Tea will be at the home of Mrs. William B. Moses, Jr., 86 Main Street, Concord, on Friday, September 22, at 3 o'clock.

The subscribers to the Friday Afternoon Concerts have a Charter Bus which takes them into Boston in time for luncheon or shopping and returns them to Concord after the concerts. Last year the Charter Bus Treasury had a surplus, so the Concord Ladies Symphony Bus gave the Friends of the Orchestra a check for $250. The Council now wishes to honor those Ladies with this Tea and to launch the 1967-1968 season. Friday subscribers who do not take the bus are cordially invited to come.

Mrs. James Perkins, a Trustee of the Orchestra, will be attending, and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock is going to speak about the plans of the Orchestra this year. The committee is requesting that the guests arrive as near 3 o'clock as possible.

Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair and Mrs. Howard W. Davis are Co-Chairmen for the Concord Area Council of Friends. Committee members helping as hostesses with the Tea are Mrs. Anatole Haemmerle and Mrs. Henry Keyes.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

SEP 18 1967 New England Newsclip

SMART SET

'Friends' Add To Seminars

By ROSE WALSH

FRIENDS OF THE NEW ENGLAND Conservatory of Music have enriched their fall Seminars in Music Study, beginning today, by offering 7 different courses this year—several in piano ensemble and sight reading; in theory and in chamber singing. In addition, the course in Symphony Analysis every Friday morning before the Boston Symphony Concert is of great interest, not only to all Symphony goers, but especially to Friday subscribers.

Now in its 7th season, the classes, sponsored by the Friends for their members and potential "Friends", are held at the New England Conservatory in Boston as well as at branches on the South and North Shores and in Wellesley. Friends of the Conservatory who share one symphony ticket may share a subscription to this Seminar and attend alternately.

In the Symphony Analysis, Mrs. Mac Morgan of the faculty will discuss selections chosen from the symphony program to be played that day, with emphasis on new works. Advanced students of the conservatory will occasionally illustrate the program by playing selections of the afternoon's program, adding to the enjoyment and understanding of the music to be heard.

Seminar participants can take advantage of luncheons served at the conservatory cafeteria where tables will be reserved for them. Convenient parking is assured. More information may be obtained by calling the Friends Office at the conservatory, 536-8660, ext. 34.

Mrs. John Carter, chairman of the Friends, is on the subscription list, as are Mrs. Arthur Hilsinger, Jr. vice-chairman, (former president of the Junior League); Mrs. Herbert J. Motley, chm. of the Seminars; Mrs. Albert B. Hunt (a director of the Country Evening Concerts, Weston); Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, Mrs. Laurence M. Lombard, Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Miss Frances Whedon, Mrs. James H. Perkins (only woman on the Boston Symphony Orchestra board of trustees); Mrs. Alan Aisenberg, Mrs. Teruhisa Matsusaka, and many others.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

SEP 20 1967 New England Newsclip

SMART SET

Symphony Tea Friday

By ROSE WALSH

FRIDAY afternoon subscribers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are invited to a tea on Friday at 3 o'clock in the attractive Concord home of Mrs. William D. Moses, Jr., 86 Main st. The Concord Area of the Council of Friends of the BSO, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair and Mrs. Howard W. Davis, co-chairmen, are hostessing the party to which guests are asked to arrive as promptly as possible.

Concord subscribers to the concerts have a Charter bus which takes them into Boston in time for luncheon or shopping and returns them home after the musical afternoon. Last year the Charter Bus Treasury had a surplus so the patrons gave the Friends of the Orchestra a check for $250. The Council is honoring these ladies at the tea and at the same time launching the 1967-68 season. Non-bus subscribers are also invited to attend.

Mrs. James Perkins, a trustee of the BSO will be present and Mrs. Harris Fahnestck will discuss Symphony plans. In the hostess group are Mrs. Anatole Haemmerle and Mrs. Henry Keyes.

★ ★ ★

3 RECORD AMERICAN, BOS

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,550

OCT 27 1967 New England Newsclip

Farms Party To Aid Symphony

BOSTON —Area chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are having tea, punch and cocktail parties for subscribers of the Symphony to interest them more deeply in the "Friends" program, and to enable them to meet trustees and some of the members of the orchestra.

Following closely on the heels of the exciting Valhalla and Gold Rush parties held on the 49th floor of the Prudential Tower at the end of September, the Council has parties planned in Wellesley, Weston and Wayland, Andover and the North Shore areas.

Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of Beverly Farms, has invited North Shore subscribers to meet Everett Firth, principal timpanist of the orchestra, at a cocktail party, Sunday, October 29.

Council members assisting Mrs. Thorndike are Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr., Mrs Thomas Gardiner and Mrs. F. Corning Kenly of Manchester, Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson, Mrs. Raymond W. Ellis, Mrs. Erick Kauders and Mrs. Evan Shierling of Marblehead

129

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 8,550
047
NOV 17 1967 New England Newspapers

The Distaff Side

Friends Plan Lunch Series

The Pre-Symphony Friday luncheons and fashion shows have passed into oblivion, but a new idea is about to take over.

The Council of Friends, the group that has come up with so many startlingly good ideas, now has another one.

Friends Friday Luncheons in the Lecture Hall of Horticultural hall, Boston (just across the street from Symphony) will begin on January 12.

And a North Shore woman, Mrs. John M. Bradley of Manchester, is co-chairman of the committee that has been meeting since early October planning this new event for devotees of Symphony.

A series of charming and delightful mid-day luncheons for 250 will be held on January 12, February 9 March 8 and April 20. Since there are 1200 Friends tickets will be sold on a first come, first served basis and they may be bought for the entire series.

Starting at 12:15, each luncheon will feature apertifs and cocktails with luncheon promptly at 12:45. Serving on the committee which planned these new events is Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham, co-chairman with Mrs. Norman Cahners of the Council.

Decorations for each luncheon are being planned by Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. John M. Ferry with the cooperation of area chairmen.

Many of Boston's and the North Shore's most distinguished family are represented among the list of patronesses and, of course, all are devotees of the Symphony.

Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr. and Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding of Manchester are in charge of inviting members of the Council to be patronesses. Among those receiving such invitations are Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. of Beverly Farms, Mrs. Sumner Pingree of Hamilton, Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, wife of the Symphony conductor, and others from among the Symphony subscribers.

HUNT BREAKFAST

Talk of Symphony brings a natural thought or two of the Hunt, for it is often the same group that takes an interest in both.

Recently two North Shore devotees of the Hunt met at a Hunt breakfast in Middleburg, Va. — Mrs. Winston Guest, the former Ceezee Cochrane, who practically grew up on the North Shore and became the top girl on the Boston Glamour Girl list of 1939, and Mrs. Sears Gardiner, whose mother is Mrs. Francis P. Sears of Hamilton, and who held the same title in 1940.

Middleburg is a famous Hunt that many will recall from the days of the Kennedy Administration when Jacqueline Kennedy rode with them.

The recent breakfast was served following the opening of the Orange County Hunt, one of the most exclusive in Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Furness were hosts.

And of course it was not a breakfast at all, for at these occasions they don't serve the usual breakfast menu. What they do serve is such delicacies as creamed turkey, sausages, roast beef, salad, cheeses, biscuits and fruit compote and cookies with of all things, Irish coffee.

It's a buffet service and perfectly splendid. Mrs Guest and Mrs. Gardiner sat together after serving themselves from the buffet, we understand, and undoubtedly reminisced a bit over such things as Magnolia's Casino and the glamourus excitement on the North Shore when they were growing up in the 30's and 40's.

ANTIQUE EMBROIDERY

But life is not all luncheons, dinners, music and horses among the affluent. Many of these ladies are talented with needle and thread.

Fifty of their antique embroideries are now on exhibit in the gallery of the Old Slater Mill Museum in Pawtucket, R. I. from November 4 through 26.

Examples of past, present and future crewel embroidery designs are in this exhibition.

Among the leading exhibitors listed in this top flight show are three from the North Shore. Mrs. Chester Tannebring and Mrs. Irving Mann of Beverly and Mrs. Gordon Prince of South Hamilton.

GIRL SCOUTS

North Shore women are leaders of the Girl Scouts too, and they have been meeting this week at the Sheraton-Boston.

The blizzard was not sent special for them, but then they did not let it stop their activities you may be sure. Several New England service clubs were represented at the Wednesday night banquet that climaxed their conference, despite the bad weather.

Among the many speakers they have enjoyed and learned from was one, Mrs. Joseph Lash, with a particularly timely message. She told them that hippies, who are causing so much concern in the national press and on the national scene, are actually vanishing.

"I have seen signs that these sensitive children are ready to come back to their families and say they will live in this world," Mrs. Lash said.

Now that's a very good sign.

Mrs. Lash described rebellion of youth and the generation gap as "nothing new." We're glad to hear it from an authority. Youth has always rebelled, but Mrs. Lash finds a great love between the present generations. From this love hopefully will come understanding, and maybe even progress.

But the conference was not all in this vein. The Girl Scout leaders learned new concepts in leadership training and were told that leadership is a job for both generations. Now, that's a thought worth mulling a bit.

It was a three day convention for Region One, New England Girl Scouts of the U.S.A. and no doubt ome good material came out of it.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
NOV 19 1967 New England Newspapers

SYMPHONY LUNCHEONS

The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is planning a series of four Friday Friends Luncheons at Horticultural Hall before the Friday concerts. What could be pleasanter than to join friends for luncheon and then go across the street to Symphony Hall without being delayed by traffic? The first luncheon will take place January 12 and the others will be February 9, March 8 and April 26. Cocktails and aperitifs will be served at 12:15 before the 12:45 luncheons. Seating is limited to 250 and tickets will be sold as a series. (Above) Standing in front of a Sargent portrait of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, are Mrs. Howard E. Hansen of Wellesley Hills and Mrs. Norman Cahners of Brookline.

ALISON ARNOLD

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 53,900
NOV 16 1967 New England

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

One of the foremost traditions in Boston is the sacred Friday afternoon symphony concert. Starting promptly at 2 p.m., it draws subscribers who value their seats as prized family possessions that are carefully handed down from mother to daughter to granddaughter.

Most of these seat holders are Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and help support the orchestra with their annual giving. For these loyal supporters the Council of Friends is planning a much needed prelude to the Friday concerts, a series of luncheons that will be held during January, February, March and April.

Ever since the Pre-Symphony Luncheons arranged by Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten at the Midtown Motor Inn ceased a year ago, a need for some kind of pre-symphony lunch has been apparent. The council has arranged for its luncheons to be held at Horticultural Hall, directly across the street from Symphony Hall, so the ladies will be able to park their cars and forget the problems of traffic for the rest of the afternoon.

Mrs. John M. Bradley of Manchester and Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld of Brookline are co-chairmen of the luncheons, and they urge Friends of the Orchestra to reply quickly to their invitations as more than 1,200 Friends attend the Friday afternoon concerts and the luncheon can only accomodate 250, so the reservations have to be accepted on a first-come, first-serve basis.

Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr. and Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding, both of Manchester, are in charge of patronesses. They include Mrs. William T. Alrich of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Philip R. Allen and Mrs. Abbot Stevens of North Andover, Mrs. Henry B. Bigelow of Concord, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird of East Walpole, Mrs. Henry M. Bliss and Mrs. George Lewis Sr. of Sherborn, Mrs. Ralph Bradley and Mrs. Barbara Stone Chase of Canton, Mrs. Henry G. Byng of Medfield, Mrs. Franklin Dexter, and Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr. of Beverly Farms, Mrs. Sumner Pingree of South Hamilton, Mrs. Charles A. Rheault of Westwood and Mrs. Henry Wheeler Jr. of Weston.

The luncheons, which will be held on Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 8 and April 26, will start promptly at 12:15 p.m. with apertifs and cocktails, with luncheon served at 12:45 p.m. Tickets will be sold as a series.

Also serving on the committee for these sure-to-be-popular luncheons are Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich of Marblehead, Mrs. George E. Bates of Boston, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot of Boston, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham, Mrs. Stanford N. Calderwood of Cambridge, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark Jr. of Cambridge, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell of Westwood and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners of Brookline.

MESSENGER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
3,650
NOV 2 1967 New England Newspapers

Council of Friends Boston Symph. Orch. Fall Activities

Area Chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are having tea, punch and cocktail parties for subscribers of the Symphony to interest them more deeply in the "Friends" program, and to enable them to meet Trustees and some of the members of the Orchestra.

Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of Beverly Farms, invited North Shore subscribers to meet Everett Firth, principal timpanist of the Orchestra at a cocktail party. Marblehead council members assisting Mrs. Thorndike were Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson, Mrs. Raymond W. Ellis, Mrs. Erick Kauders and Mrs. Evan S[illegible]ling.

130

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

NOV 15 1967 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Series of Friday Luncheons Set For Friends of Boston Symphony

INVITATIONS ARE IN THE MAIL to that generous group of women who have for so many years supported the Boston Symphony Orchestra by their annual giving. They are being invited to the first of four Friends Friday Luncheons, Jan. 12, in the Lecture Hall of Horticultural Hall.

What could be better than to join friends for luncheon at this venerable building just across the street from Symphony Hall? And what better time than January when wintry blasts and snow and ice make traffic a more than usual hazard?

The Council of Friends has asked Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. John M. Bradley to be co-chairmen of the Friends Luncheons. They have made plans to make this series a charming and delightful mid-day event, as well as an enormous convenience to the Friends who can go on to the Symphony concert just a few steps away.

Many of Boston's most distinguished families are represented on the list of patronesses. All devotees of Symphony, they have shown an enthusiastic support of this latest project of the Council of Friends.

Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, a trustee of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, as well as a member of the Council of Friends, and Mrs. John M. Ferry are co-ordinating the efforts of area chairmen in planning the decorations for each luncheon.

Other members of the committee who have been meeting since early October in the Ancient Instruments Room of Symphony Hall to insure the success of this first series of Friends Luncheons are Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. Lewis F. Cabot, Mrs. Stanford N. Calderwood, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners.

Luncheon seating will be limited to 250 and as there are 1200 Friends who subscribe to the Friday afternoon concerts, reservations will be made on a first come, first served basis.

Ticket will be sold as a series for the luncheons, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 8 and April 26. Starting at 12:15 for those who wish aperitifs and cocktails, with luncheon served promptly at 12:45, these luncheons should be one of the most papular events open to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among those invited by Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr. and Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding to be patronesses are Mrs. William T. Aldrich, Mrs. Philip R. Allen, Mrs. Henry B. Bigelow, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird and Mrs. Henry M. Bliss.

Also, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Henry G. Byng, Mrs. Barbara Chase, Mrs. Bigelow Crocker Jr., Mrs. Nelson J. Darling Jr., Mrs. Franklin Dexter, Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr., Mrs. Phillips Ketchum, Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. Edwin H. Land and Mrs. Ralph Lawson.

Others are Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mrs. Frederick J. Levisure, Mrs. George Lewis Sr., Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre, Mrs. Robert H. Morris, Mrs. William B. Moses Jr., Mrs. Richard C. Paine, Miss Mary Parlett, Mrs. Charles H. Pettit, Mrs. Sumner Pingree, Mrs. Charles A. Rheault, Miss Miriam Shaw, Mrs. Abbot Stevens and Mrs. Henry Wheeler Jr.

* * *

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JAN 15 1968 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It's amazing what a few potted palms can do to a great barn of a place like Horticultural Hall. It must be added that the pots of brilliant blue cinerarias from Mrs. Edwin Webster's greenhouses didn't hurt any either at the first of the series of four pre-Symphony lunches that the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have organized for Friday afternoon symphonygoers.

Horticultural Hall is not an easy place to decorate and the remains of the Institute of Contemporary Art's exhibition from Expo "American Painting Now" hanging over all didn't add much to the graciousness of the scene. However the decorations committee, under the direction of Mrs. Charles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill and Mrs. John M. Ferry of Cambridge did a noble job of erecting a screen across the hall so that only half the hanging feet depicted in one large painting were showing.

Sherry was served in the big lower hall of the building and the round luncheon tables were placed on the upper level. Here again ingenuity and imagination were shown by the committee for they had decorated each table with pink and red carnations laid on lemon leaves and each guest was invited to take one and wear it to Symphony as a badge of recognition. Among those on the decorations committee were Mrs. Howard W. Davis and Mrs. Alexander Ellis of Concord and Mrs. Howard W. Hansen of Wellesley.

In many ways Friday's luncheon was a reunion, for many of the same people who were regular subscribers to the pre-symphony luncheons at the Midtown Motor Inn a few years ago, run so well by Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten of Brookline, were there. It was obvious how pleased everyone was to have a luncheon to attend before Symphony once again, and one that entailed one-time parking and a step across the street to the concert. Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston, Mrs. Robert C. Dean of Wellesley, Mrs. Barton Gummere of Marblehead, Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley, Mrs. George F. Hall of Milton, Mrs. Charles Rheault of Westwood and Mrs. Robert Wiese of Wellesley were some of those who were faithful subscribers to the old series and who were enjoying the new.

Guests helped themselves at long buffet tables to cheese souffle, creamed scallops and two kinds of salad before joining friends at the round tables. The potted palms from Boston's park department softened the bare walls and gave somewhat the effect of the old time palm courts that used to be part of luxury hotels in the past.

Members of the Council of Friends from the Concord, Weston, Wayland and Wellesley areas were the hostesses for this first lunch. Among those from Wellesley were Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Donald P. Babson, Mrs. Jack Parker, Mrs. Edward S. Stimpson, Mrs. Mark C. Wheeler, and Mrs. H. Starr Ballou.

Among the hundreds of ladies seen at the luncheon were Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky of Dedham, cheerful in a bright golden wool coat; Mrs. George Sargent of Dover, whose pretty pink and white suit matched the pink carnations on the tables—she didn't go to the concert as she was going home to pack for a trip to Bermuda; Mrs. Arnold Jenkins of Dedham, wrapped against the cold in a full length mink coat; Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, a white silk and wool suit attractive with her dark mink beret; Mrs. Robert Kistner of Needham, another who chose a white suit; Mrs. Frederick Stare of Wellesley in a pretty green kerchief style hat and many more.

The next luncheon will be February 9, followed by lunches on March 8 and April 26.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB. 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

It Was All Hearts and Flowers At Pre-Symphony Luncheon

HEARTS AND FLOWERS formed a Valentine motif for the second Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall, yesterday. The luncheons are under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. John M. Bradley, and yesterday's was in charge of the Andover, Brookline and North Shore Groups of the Symphony Orchestra's Council of Friends.

Mrs. Raymond Ellis and Mrs. James Marsh made the charming mobile of red Cupids and hearts, and Mrs. Thomas Otis carefully transported graceful branches of pink flowering quince she had forced especially for the luncheon. Arranged in tall black vases on the stage, they made an artistic Japanese effect.

On the center of each table was a pot of pink begonias surrounded by a white paper frill and a froth of pale pink tissue, and in each was an arrow with a red heart on the end. Even the dessert was Valentine concoction—ice-cream pie with raspberries.

Hostesses at this luncheon were Mrs. James Grew, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. John B. Hawes, Mrs. Alexander Warren and Mrs. Philipp K. Allen of Andover, Mrs. William McCormick, Mrs. Richard Ehrlich, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Francis Barnum Jr., Mrs. Manuel Kurland, Mrs. Walter Cahners, Mrs. Herbert Hoffman, Mrs. Robert Hopkins and Mrs. E. Morton Jennings Jr. of Brookline.

Also, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. David Little, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. Drayton Phillips, Mrs. John Bryant, Mrs. William English and Mrs. Edward P. Parker, all of the North Shore.

Mrs. George Sargent came in from Dover, and among others enjoying the luncheon and crossing the street to Symphony Hall afterwards for the concert were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Nelson Aldrich.

Also, Mrs. Harris Fahnstock, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. George Bates, Mrs. Augustus W. Soule, Mrs. Charles E. Bacon, Mrs. Harold Keller, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Isabella Grandin, Mrs. Otis T. Russell, Mrs. Frank Sawtell, Mrs. J. Holland Cotter and Mrs. Adolf Leeds.

* * *

130

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

NOV 15 1967 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Series of Friday Luncheons Set For Friends of Boston Symphony

INVITATIONS ARE IN THE MAIL to that generous group of women who have for so many years supported the Boston Symphony Orchestra by their annual giving. They are being invited to the first of four Friends Friday Luncheons, Jan. 12, in the Lecture Hall of Horticultural Hall.

What could be better than to join friends for luncheon at this venerable building just across the street from Symphony Hall? And what better time than January when wintry blasts and snow and ice make traffic a more than usual hazard?

The Council of Friends has asked Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. John M. Bradley to be co-chairmen of the Friends Luncheons. They have made plans to make this series a charming and delightful mid-day event, as well as an enormous convenience to the Friends who can go on to the Symphony concert just a few steps away.

Many of Boston's most distinguished families are represented on the list of patronesses. All devotees of Symphony, they have shown an enthusiastic support of this latest project of the Council of Friends.

Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, a trustee of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, as well as a member of the Council of Friends, and Mrs. John M. Ferry are co-ordinating the efforts of area chairmen in planning the decorations for each luncheon.

Other members of the committee who have been meeting since early October in the Ancient Instruments Room of Symphony Hall to insure the success of this first series of Friends Luncheons are Mrs. Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs. George E. Bates, Mrs. Lewis F. Cabot, Mrs. Stanford N. Calderwood, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners.

Luncheon seating will be limited to 250 and as there are 1200 Friends who subscribe to the Friday afternoon concerts, reservations will be made on a first come, first served basis.

Ticket will be sold as a series for the luncheons, Jan. 12, Feb. 9, March 8 and April 26. Starting at 12:15 for those who wish aperitifs and cocktails, with luncheon served promptly at 12:45, these luncheons should be one of the most papular events open to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among those invited by Mrs. Harvey H. Bundy Jr. and Mrs. Josiah A. Spaulding to be patronesses are Mrs. William T. Aldrich, Mrs. Philip R. Allen, Mrs. Henry B. Bigelow, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird and Mrs. Henry M. Bliss.

Also, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Henry G. Byng, Mrs. Barbara Chase, Mrs. Bigelow Crocker Jr., Mrs. Nelson J. Darling Jr., Mrs. Franklin Dexter, Mrs. Francis W. Hatch Jr., Mrs. Phillips Ketchum, Mrs. John H. Knowles, Mrs. Edwin H. Land and Mrs. Ralph Lawson.

Others are Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mrs. Frederick J. Levisure, Mrs. George Lewis Sr., Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre, Mrs. Robert H. Morris, Mrs. William B. Moses Jr., Mrs. Richard C. Paine, Miss Mary Parlett, Mrs. Charles H. Pettit, Mrs. Sumner Pingree, Mrs. Charles A. Rheault, Miss Miriam Shaw, Mrs. Abbot Stevens and Mrs. Henry Wheeler Jr.

* * *

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

JAN 15 1968 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

It's amazing what a few potted palms can do to a great barn of a place like Horticultural Hall. It must be added that the pots of brilliant blue cinerarias from Mrs. Edwin Webster's greenhouses didn't hurt any either at the first of the series of four pre-Symphony lunches that the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have organized for Friday afternoon symphonygoers.

Horticultural Hall is not an easy place to decorate and the remains of the Institute of Contemporary Art's exhibition from Expo "American Painting Now" hanging over all didn't add much to the graciousness of the scene. However the decorations committee, under the direction of Mrs. Charles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill and Mrs. John M. Ferry of Cambridge did a noble job of erecting a screen across the hall so that only half the hanging feet depicted in one large painting were showing.

Sherry was served in the big lower hall of the building and the round luncheon tables were placed on the upper level. Here again ingenuity and imagination were shown by the committee for they had decorated each table with pink and red carnations laid on lemon leaves and each guest was invited to take one and wear it to Symphony as a badge of recognition. Among those on the decorations committee were Mrs. Howard W. Davis and Mrs. Alexander Ellis of Concord and Mrs. Howard W. Hansen of Wellesley.

In many ways Friday's luncheon was a reunion, for many of the same people who were regular subscribers to the pre-symphony luncheons at the Midtown Motor Inn a few years ago, run so well by Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten of Brookline, were there. It was obvious how pleased everyone was to have a luncheon to attend before Symphony once again, and one that entailed one-time parking and a step across the street to the concert. Mrs. Richard Ely of Weston, Mrs. Robert C. Dean of Wellesley, Mrs. Barton Gummere of Marblehead, Mrs. Thomas Chesterton of Wellesley, Mrs. George F. Hall of Milton, Mrs. Charles Rheault of Westwood and Mrs. Robert Wiese of Wellesley were some of those who were faithful subscribers to the old series and who were enjoying the new.

Guests helped themselves at long buffet tables to cheese souffle, creamed scallops and two kinds of salad before joining friends at the round tables. The potted palms from Boston's park department softened the bare walls and gave somewhat the effect of the old time palm courts that used to be part of luxury hotels in the past.

Members of the Council of Friends from the Concord, Weston, Wayland and Wellesley areas were the hostesses for this first lunch. Among those from Wellesley were Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Donald P. Babson, Mrs. Jack Parker, Mrs. Edward S. Stimpson, Mrs. Mark C. Wheeler, and Mrs. H. Starr Ballou.

Among the hundreds of ladies seen at the luncheon were Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky of Dedham, cheerful in a bright golden wool coat; Mrs. George Sargent of Dover, whose pretty pink and white suit matched the pink carnations on the tables—she didn't go to the concert as she was going home to pack for a trip to Bermuda; Mrs. Arnold Jenkins of Dedham, wrapped against the cold in a full length mink coat; Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, a white silk and wool suit attractive with her dark mink beret; Mrs. Robert Kistner of Needham, another who chose a white suit; Mrs. Frederick Stare of Wellesley in a pretty green kerchief style hat and many more.

The next luncheon will be February 9, followed by lunches on March 8 and April 26.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

It Was All Hearts and Flowers At Pre-Symphony Luncheon

HEARTS AND FLOWERS formed a Valentine motif for the second Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall, yesterday. The luncheons are under the co-chairmanship of Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. John M. Bradley, and yesterday's was in charge of the Andover, Brookline and North Shore Groups of the Symphony Orchestra's Council of Friends.

Mrs. Raymond Ellis and Mrs. James Marsh made the charming mobile of red Cupids and hearts, and Mrs. Thomas Otis carefully transported graceful branches of pink flowering quince she had forced especially for the luncheon. Arranged in tall black vases on the stage, they made an artistic Japanese effect.

On the center of each table was a pot of pink begonias surrounded by a white paper frill and a froth of pale pink tissue, and in each was an arrow with a red heart on the end. Even the dessert was Valentine concoction—ice-cream pie with raspberries.

Hostesses at this luncheon were Mrs. James Grew, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. John B. Hawes, Mrs. Alexander Warren and Mrs. Philipp K. Allen of Andover, Mrs. William McCormick, Mrs. Richard Ehrlich, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mrs. Francis Barnum Jr., Mrs. Manuel Kurland, Mrs. Walter Cahners, Mrs. Herbert Hoffman, Mrs. Robert Hopkins and Mrs. E. Morton Jennings Jr. of Brookline.

Also, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Mrs. F. Corning Kenly, Mrs. David Little, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. Drayton Phillips, Mrs. John Bryant, Mrs. William English and Mrs. Edward P. Parker, all of the North Shore.

Mrs. George Sargent came in from Dover, and among others enjoying the luncheon and crossing the street to Symphony Hall afterwards for the concert were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Lewis H. Clark, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Nelson Aldrich.

Also, Mrs. Harris Fahnstock, Mrs. James F. Hunnewell, Mrs. George Bates, Mrs. Augustus W. Soule, Mrs. Charles E. Bacon, Mrs. Harold Keller, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Isabella Grandin, Mrs. Otis T. Russell, Mrs. Frank Sawtell, Mrs. J. Holland Cotter and Mrs. Adolf Leeds.

* * *

131

The Raleigh Times
RALEIGH, N. C.
D. 23,147
FEB 1 7 1968

Friends Of The College—1969

"Sacrifice Of The Princess," one of the pre-hispanic rituals that will be performed by in the Fiesta Mexicana next season.

The Boston Symphony, Arthur Fiedler, Yehudi Menuhin, Leontyne Price — such is the list of the headliners highlighting the 10th anniversary season of the Friends of the College.

Since 1958, the membership-supported series has offered more top entertainment from virtually every field of the performing arts for the smallest price — $1 per performance — than any other series in North Carolina.

The current FOC boasts over 19,000 memberships with applicants all over the state.

FOC 1968 will open its season on October 9, 10 and 11 with the Fiesta Mexicana presenting a colorful fiesta of modern Mexico. On October 22 and 25 Soprano Leontyne Price will make one of her rare, non-operatic appearances.

The Orchestre de Paris, led by Charles Munch, will include the Friends of the College in its first world's tour on November 1 and 2.

Yehudi Menuhin, accompanied by his sister Hepzibah, herself a talented pianist, will perform Nov. 18 and 19.

The first concert of 1969 will feature the dancers of the American Ballet theatre on Feb. 13, 14 and 15. They will be returning to Raleigh after two years, when they last performed in the FOC series.

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Eric Leinsdorf, will appear for two nights on March 10 and 11.

Rounding out the 10th anniversary season will be Arthur Fiedler and the National Orchestra of Washington, presenting a pops concert of lighthearted, popular misic.

Henry Bowers, Director of Friends of the College, said a special bonus concert, to be selected at a later date, will be offered during the 1968-69 season.

The American Ballet Theater Co. in one of their scenes from Jerome Robbin's "Fancy Free."

Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
FEB 1 1 1968
New England Newsclip

Friends of Boston Symphony to Meet

The annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Wednewday afternoon. Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, will speak at the business meeting. Erich Leinsdorf and members of the Boston Symphony will participate in the musical portion of the meeting. Pianist Gary Graffman will also be heard, and a musical surprise by pianist Pargera and Dorfpint will be a feature of the afternoon's entertainment.

A tea in the Symphony Hall foyer will follow the meeting.

BOS '68 69

The Raleigh Times
RALEIGH, N. C.
D. 23,147
MAR 1 3 1968

Special Bonus for the Friends

People being what they are, they love to see a controversial figure. The Friends of the College is offering one next season in Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf has always been under fire. Now he has announced that he is retiring at the end of the 1969 season. The reason he claims is that the orchestra trustees have refused to reduce his workload.

Typically Boston, the president of the orchestra trustees is named Cabot. ("Here's to the land of the Bean and the Cod, where the Lodges speak only to Cabots and the Cabots speak only to God." Henry B. Cabot, age 73, has been the trustee president for 20 years. He stated "I certainly do not agree with him that his schedule is an overload."

Leinsdorf says that even in baseball using a relief pitcher is standard practice. But Leinsdorf has always been in the middle of musical storms. Kirsten Flagstad, the famous soprano, absolutely refused to sing any Metropolitan Opera he was scheduled to conduct.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra probably has the most eclat of any American orchestra. Raleigh is getting a bonus: a chance to not only hear it on March 10 and 11, 1969, but also a chance to see Erich Leinsdorf before he leaves for who knows where.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
MAR 1 2 1968
New England Newsclip

B.S.O. Friends Meet Wednesday

The piano ensemble of Pergera and Dorfpint perform at the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Wednesday at Symphony Hall stage.

In other activities that afternoon, B.S.O. president Henry B. Cabot will report to the Friends and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra, with another pianist, Gary Graffman, as soloist.

131

The Raleigh Times
FEB 17 1968

Friends Of The College—1969

"Sacrifice Of The Princess," one of the prehispanic rituals that will be performed by in the Fiesta Mexicana next season.

The Boston Symphony, Arthur Fiedler, Yehudi Menuhin, Leontyne Price — such is the list of the headliners highlighting the 10th anniversary season of the Friends of the College.

Since 1958, the membership-supported series has offered more top entertainment from virtually every field of the performing arts for the smallest price — $1 per performance — than any other series in North Carolina.

The current FOC boasts over 19,000 memberships with applicants all over the state.

FOC 1968 will open its season on October 9, 10 and 11 with the Fiesta Mexicana presenting a colorful fiesta of modern Mexico. On October 22 and 25 Soprano Leontyne Price will make one of her rare, non-operatic appearances.

The Orchestre de Paris, led by Charles Munch, will include the Friends of the College in its first world's tour on November 1 and 2.

Yehudi Menuhin, accompanied by his sister Hepzibah, herself a talented pianist, will perform Nov. 18 and 19.

The first concert of 1969 will feature the dancers of the American Ballet theatre on Feb. 13, 14 and 15. They will be returning to Raleigh after two years, when they last performed in the FOC series.

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Eric Leinsdorf, will appear for two nights on March 10 and 11.

Rounding out the 10th anniversary season will be Arthur Fiedler and the National Orchestra of Washington, presenting a pops concert of lighthearted, popular misic.

Henry Bowers, Director of Friends of the College, said a special bonus concert, to be selected at a later date, will be offered during the 1968-69 season.

The American Ballet Theater Co. in one of their scenes from Jerome Robbin's "Fancy Free."

Eric Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 210,000
FEB 11 1968
New England Newsclip

Friends of Boston Symphony to Meet

The annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony Hall next Wednesday afternoon. Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, will speak at the business meeting. Erich Leinsdorf and members of the Boston Symphony will participate in the musical portion of the meeting. Pianist Gary Graffman will also be heard, and a musical surprise by pianist Pargera and Dorfpint will be a feature of the afternoon's entertainment.

A tea in the Symphony Hall foyer will follow the meeting.

BOS 68-9
The Raleigh Times
RALEIGH, N. C.
D. 23,147
MAR 13 1968

Special Bonus for the Friends

People being what they are, they love to see a controversial figure. The Friends of the College is offering one next season in Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf has always been under fire. Now he has announced that he is retiring at the end of the 1969 season. The reason he claims is that the orchestra trustees have refused to reduce his workload.

Typically Boston, the president of the orchestra trustees is named Cabot. ("Here's to the land of the Bean and the Cod, where the Lodges speak only to Cabots and the Cabots speak only to God." Henry B. Cabot, age 73, has been the trustee president for 20 years. He stated "I certainly do not agree with him that his schedule is an overload."

Leinsdorf says that even in baseball using a relief pitcher is standard practice. But Leinsdorf has always been in the middle of musical storms. Kirsten Flagstad, the famous soprano, absolutely refused to sing any Metropolitan Opera he was scheduled to conduct.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra probably has the most eclat of any American orchestra. Raleigh is getting a bonus: a chance to not only hear it on March 10 and 11, 1969, but also a chance to see Erich Leinsdorf before he leaves for who knows where.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
MAR 12 1968
New England Newsclip

B.S.O. Friends Meet Wednesday

The piano ensemble of Pergera and Dorfpint perform at the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Wednesday at Symphony Hall stage.

In other activities that afternoon, B.S.O. president Henry B. Cabot will report to the Friends and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra, with another pianist, Gary Graffman, as soloist.

132

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

MAR 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

A Smell of Spring in Air At Pre-Symphony Luncheon

TOUCHES OF SPRING at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon at Horticultural Hall, yesterday, were a huge bouquet of brilliantly colored tulips, and baskets of fragrant hyacinths on the luncheon tables. These pleasant luncheons have proved so popular that they have been over-subscribed and plans are afoot to have six instead of four next season.

Yesterday's luncheon, the third in the series sponsored by the orchestra's Council of Friends, was in charge of the Dedham, Newton and South Shore groups of the Council. Mrs. Joseph Watkins of Hingham was responsible for the bees perched on the hyacinths and even had a bee on her hat.

Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. John M. Bradley are co-chairmen of all the luncheons. Hostesses from Dedham included Mrs. Charles W. Bartlett, Mrs. Arnold D. Jenkins, Mrs. Robert A. Lawrence, Mrs. Vcevold Strekalovsky, Mrs. Henry M. Bliss, Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. A. Osborne Willauer and Mrs. Thomas E. Janson.

The Newton group included Mrs. Samuel A. Levine, Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Stephen B. Wellington, Mrs. Miles N. Clair, Mrs. B. Garfield Rae, Mrs. Seymour A. Kauffman and Mrs. William B. Schwartz Jr.

In the South Shore group were Mrs. Lawrence Sykes, Mrs. C. Rodgers Burgin, Mrs. Louis F. Eaton Jr., Mrs. Robert Faxon, Mrs. Lawrence Sykes, Mrs. Paul Rizzoto, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy and Mrs. Watkins.

Vivacious Mrs. George L. Sargent wore a becoming coat of shocking pink wool and had a pink carnation pinned to the lapel. Mrs. George E. Bates wore shiny black over-the-knee boots with her red dress.

Sitting together were Mrs. Atherton Loring and Mrs. Sidney Wirt, and among the many others were Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Edwin Green, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, and Mrs. Marcien Jenckes.

Also, Mrs. William Dexter, Mrs. Livingston Davis, Mrs. James G. Grew, Mrs. Harold R. Keller, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Mrs. William Nickerson, Miss Constanee Learned, and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb.

* * *

BSO Friends Invited to Meeting

ALL CURRENT FRIENDS of the Orchestra are invited by the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the 34th annual meeting in Symphony Hall, Wednesday afternoon, March 13, at 3:30. Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, will preside at a short business meeting that will be followed by a special performance of the orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

The program (subject to change) will consist of Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante by the orchestra and Gary Graffman, soloist, Rachmaninoff's Prelude for Piano by Gary Graffman, and the Strauss Rosenkavalier Suite by the orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf.

After the concert, tea will be served in the lower foyer. This annual event is, as always, arranged by the Council of Friends, and Mrs. David Bird of Cambridge is chairman of the tea. Doing the decorating are Mrs. Thomas Otis, Mrs. Raymond Ellis, Mrs. Weld Henshaw and Mrs. Henry A. Morss Jr.

Hostesses will be Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. Charles A. Coolidge Jr., Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. Carlton Perry Fuller, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten, Mrs. Charles E. Mason Jr., Mrs. George A. Parson, Mrs. Stephen Paine Jr., Mrs. Jerome Rosenfeld and Mrs. Robert G. Wiese Jr.

* * *

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

MAR 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Best of reasons cancels Girls Clubs fashion show

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

Everyone's asking about it. "Should I postpone my trip—my Girls Clubs fashion show invitation hasn't come, and I ALWAYS go."

Multiply her by hundreds.

It's the biggest and best show of any year, with an audience to match. And every penny raised means a better chance at happiness and a career for more than 3000 eager-to-learn youngsters. Cheer up, all you nice patrons. You've not been forgotten. In fact, a fascinating invitation is heading your way. To the dedication and preview of the world's only Girls Club of its kind, the South Boston clubhouse, which has been geared to meet the recreational and vocational needs of 5000 6-to-16-year-olds.

Because of the opening ceremonies, the benefit show won't be held this Spring.

Longtime Girls Clubs president, slim, vital wonder-worker Mrs. Byron Tosi, was a founder member for the twin clubs here, and serves on the National Board, helping with girls club problems across the nation. Observing this banner occasion with her will be many of the distinguished women who have given time and talent for more than a quarter of a century to this important contribution to America's future: Judge Jennie Loitman Barron, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Dr. Miriam Van Waters, Eva Whiting White, the Hon. Sybil Holmes, Mrs. William C. Cox, Mrs. Georges Doriot, Mrs. Harvey P. Hood, Mrs. Byron K. Elliott, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. John Edward M. Gallagher, Mrs. M. Hall, Mrs. Chauncey D. Steele Jr., Mrs. Lee Ault, Mrs. Richard Harte, Mrs. Merrill Griswold, Mrs. Sidney Rabb, Mrs. Daniel Simonds, Mrs. Frederick G. Crocker, Mrs. Raymond W. Lapham, Mrs. Charles Carney, Mrs. O. Kelley Anderson, Mrs. Edward J. Mitton, Mrs. John W. Spellman, Mrs. Nehemiah Whitman, Mrs. Forrester Clark, Mrs. T. Jefferson Coolidge.

GIRLS CLUB President Mrs. Byron Tosi—another kind of party.

Also, Mrs. George Bottomley, Mrs. James T. Baldwin, Mrs. Reynolds Fuller, Mrs. Reginald Foster, Mrs. Frederic C. Church, Mrs. Alexander C. Forbes, and others.

★

Strauss, Rachmoninoff Mendelssohn and a good Boston tea will reward the Friends of the Boston Symphony who gather at Symphony Hall Wednesday at three-thirty for the 34th annual Meeting of the Trustees. President Henry Cabot will give facts and figures, and Mrs. David Bird is chairman of tea. The Council of Friends offering cups and plates will include Mrs. John M. Ferry, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. Anthony Kutten, Mrs. Charles E. Mason Jr., Mrs. Charles A Coolidge Jr., Mrs. Stanford Calderwood, Mrs. Robert G. Wiese, Mrs. Stephen Paine Jr. and other hospitable people.

★

Kevin White in sending out Mayor of Boston invitations for a reception and luncheon Thursday, March 21, honoring the board of directors of Irish International Air Lines-Aer Lingus. The Whites have just had a brief sunning in the Barbados.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

MAR 14 1968 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

The ladies of the Museum of Fine Arts are going to have to look to their laurels, for the ladies of the Boston Symphony are rapidly overtaking them in the matter of decorations and flower arrangements.

At yesterday's annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the usually austere lower lobby of Symphony Hall was transformed into a bower of springtime. From the double wooden doors at either end of the oblong room hung rustic baskets of brilliant pink azaleas in Italian pottery containers. The tea tables with their silver tea and coffee services held arrangements of lavender iris, red and yellow tulips and white daffodils backed by forced spring green birch branches. Pots of hyancinths completed the spring effect and the usually cold marble floor was covered with oriental rugs.

The friends came to the tea from the auditorium where they had been privileged to hear music that "lifted them off the ground". This is how Mrs. Louis Cabot of Wenham, looking charming in a navy jersey dress with a mimosa yellow collar, described it to her cochairman of the Friends of the B. S. O., Mrs. Norman Cahners of Brookline.

The short concert had started with a wonderful quartet at two pianos playing among other pieces "The Soldiers' Chorus" from "Faust." The proper Bostonian heads in the audience nodded in tune to the military music as Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Thomas Perry, business manager of the orchestra; Bernard Zighera, harpist with the orchestra, and second violinist Ayrton Pinto obviously enjoyed themselves tremendously entertaining these friends of the B. S. O. who have been faithful supporters of the orchestra for so many years.

The entire orchestra came on stage next to accompany pianist Gary Graffman as he played Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante and the concert ended with the "lifting off the ground" music of the Rosenkavalier Suite by Richard Strauss.

Many of the friends of the orchestra preferred to sit in their regular seats, seats that their mothers and grandmothers before them have occupied at Friday afternoon concerts for many years. Others sat where the whim took them and used the opportunity to see how the orchestra looked from a different vantage point. But wherever they sat the silence was absolute while the orchestra was playing.

Among the many who had come clad in boots and rain hats to this annual meeting that seems fated to have bad weather — last year it was held during the worst blizzard of the year — were Mrs. Albert Titcomb of Boston; Mrs. Charles E. Mason Jr. of Chestnut Hill; Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten of Brookline, who was one of those pouring tea. Both she and her husband were enjoying the concert, Mr. Kutten being one of the many men in the audience. Also there were Mrs. Jerome Rosenfield of Chestnut Hill, discussing the decorations for the next pre-Symphony luncheon at Horticultural Hall on April 26; Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, sitting with Mrs. George Bates of Boston, who wore a stunning mushroom colored beret; Mrs. Albert Goodhue of Marblehead, president of the Vincent Club, wearing a "different hat" yesterday as assistant to publicity chairman Mrs. George Sargent of Dover; Mrs. Sherman Thayer of Boston and Cohasset, whose lettuce green dress looked very springlike; Mrs. Augustus Soule of Brookline in a charming little flat hat covered with flowers; Mrs. Joseph Ballard of Harvard; Mrs. George Parson of Louisburg Square, another in spring green; Miss Elsie Briggs of Brookline and Mrs. Leslie MacDill of Boston who came together; and Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton, an appropriate brooch in the shape of a gold instrument on the lapel of her black and white checked suit.

133

JOHN F. KENNEDY CENTER

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 220,609 SAT. 173,407

JAN 27 1968

JFK Concert Hall Gets Bass Topping

The John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts' Concert Hall will be topped off with a 10-foot tall bass viol sculpted in steel during a special ceremony at noon Monday.

Mayor Walter E. Washington and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a center trustee, will speak at the ceremony on the construction site along the Potomac.

The center's board chairman, Roger L. Stevens, will host the affair, to which all major donors to the hall have been invited.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 79,350

JAN 30 1968

New England Newsclip

High-Rise Cello Noted by Dignitaries

(Associated Press Wirephoto)

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony, flanked by Roger L. Stevens, left, chairman of the board of Washington's John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and Norwegian Ambassador Arne Gunneng sign autographs on a steel cello Monday. The cello, with bow and hands, was raised in a topping ceremony to the top of the steel structure of Kennedy Center.

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 57,734 SUN. 45,423

JAN 30 1968

Steelwork Completed at JFK Center

WASHINGTON— Steelworkers welded a bass viol cut out in steel to an upper girder of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts here yesterday after a platoon of dignitaries signed it and conductor Erich Leinsdorf gave musical approval.

The variation on the traditional topping out ceremony marked completion of steelwork on the concert hall section of the center, now under construction.

Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a trustee of the Kennedy center, said that the center, like the performing arts in general, cannot be expected to pay for itself at the box office.

SPECIAL TO THE ADVANCE FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Tuesday, January 30, 1968

—AP Wirephoto to The Times-Union

High Note on Cello

Erich Leinsdorf (center), former conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, was among notables signing autographs on steel cello yesterday. Cello, with bow and hands, was raised to top of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C. Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is flanked by Roger L. Stevens (left), chairman of the board of the center, and Norwegian Ambassador Arne Gunneng.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, January 30, 1968

AP Wirephoto

MUSICAL DIRECTOR — A workman sits atop the steel skeleton of Washington's John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, directing placement of a cello-shaped piece of steel, complete with hands and bow. Ironworkers raised the instrument during their topping ceremonies. Speaking at the ceremony was Erich Leinsworf, music director of the Boston Symphony and a trustee of the Kennedy Center, who said financial support would allow the center to acheve "the highest possible artistic aspirations."

Co-operative Orchestra in Boston

134

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
Ccirc. 92,100
DEC 20 1967
New England Newsclip

Boston Philharmonia

Co-operative Orchestra Formed for New England

The Boston Philharmonic Society announced today the formation of a permanent, professional and cooperative classical orchestra.

At a news conference in Jordan Hall, the society's board of trustees said that the orchestra, named the Boston Philharmonia, is the first cooperative orchestra in the United States.

A series of debut concerts will be presented at Jordan Hall in March-April.

The trustees also disclosed that the orchestra will perform not only in Boston, but in other cities in the commonwealth and New England.

Guest conductors will direct the orchestra until a permanent conductor is selected by the trustees and orchestra members.

With a permanent nucleus of about 40 professional members, the orchestra may be expanded as the need or occasion demands. These leading, independent Greater Boston musicians have performed with the Boston Ballet Company orchestra, the Opera Company of Boston Orchestra, and as substitutes with the Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Esplanade Orchestras.

The Philharmonic Society's trustees made it clear that the new orchestra will complement—not compete with—existing musical resources in Boston. Mass., or New England. It was established to provide concerts for a wide audience which, until now, has been deprived of the cultural enjoyment of hearing classical masterpieces.

Illustrating the immediate need for a new, full-time professional orchestra here, the trustees pointed out that:

The winter series currently presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be subscribed to by no more than 21,048 persons. . .substantially less than 1 per cent of Greater Boston's nearly three million residents. And the eight series this great orchestra presents are near to its present capacity.

Yet the national average of symphonic attendance is close to 2 per cent of a city's population. In culturally enriched metropolitan Boston, attendance at classical music performances would be well over the national average—if musical facilities were provided.

The Boston Symphony, employing more than 100 musicians, cannot devote much of its time to music requiring the services of 40—despite the fact that most of the orchestral music of the 17th and 18th centuries, and much of the 19th and 20th, was written for smaller-size orchestras.

In essence, the great volume of compositions by the classical masters, written for smaller-than-symphony orchestras is never performed, and consequently never heard by music lovers in Boston and New England.

Erich Leinsdorf, internationally acclaimed conductor of the Boston Symphony, deplored this musical vacuum recently during an interview with the New York Times.

Expressing grave fears for the future of American symphony orchestras as presently constituted, Mr. Leinsdorf cited the reluctance of trustees to recognize that two totally different audiences exist today—one for the popular repertory, and one for new and interesting music. He said he felt it was necessary for symphony orchestras to split themselves into smaller groups to reach various audiences.

There is no professional, permanent orchestra in Massachusetts to present extensive children's concerts enjoyed by many other areas of the country.

The esplanade season has dwindled regrettably in recent summers, while other American cities are expanding their summer concert seasons. This is acutely unfortunate because Boston was one of the first cities to enjoy such concerts.

However, the Boston Symphony Orchestra membership is now increasingly involved with its commitments to the highly laudable development of Tanglewood, and thus is not available to maintain or expand the Esplanade season.

There is no professional orchestra to tour the commonwealth during the regular concert season. Unquestionably, thousands of persons living outside of Boston would attend orchestral concerts if they were conveniently offered.

While students from all over the world are attracted to Boston because of its cultural environment, little or nothing has been done for those in the professional musical arts. Although business and industry are able to hold a large percentage of desirable graduates, a Boston-trained musician must leave the city to pursue an active professional career.

The Boston Philharmonic Society and the Philharmonia were organized to help correct those deficiencies in the musical scene.

The Philharmonic Society was incorporated on March 31, 1967—culminating a 17-year dream of concert violinist Robert Brink, president of the board of trustees.

The Philharmonia itself is an outgrowth of the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, which Brink and composer-musician Daniel Pinkham organized in 1950 specifically for a Cambridge event. The value and potential of these resident, independent musicians was such that the decision was made to secure further performances for the ensemble.

Since then, the festival orchestra has performed in recording, documentary and other important work with National Educational Television; in concerts with most of the prominent choruses in the area, and in chamber music concerts.

When the festival orchestra was founded, Mr. Brink, the concertmaster, recognized the need for an active New England management. From his contact and friendship with William H. Curtis (string bass), registrar and instructor at the Berklee School of Music, emerged the management team of Music Unlimited Associates in 1960.

Mr. Brink then approached the most desirable musicians in Boston with his ideal: To found an orchestra (1) that would have artistic rather than commercial excellence as its primary aim, and (2) in which the members themselves would hold certain final authority.

Early this year, 18 founding musician-members drafted the by-laws for the Boston Philharmonic Society and the Philharmonia, and the Board of Trustees authorized the Boston law firm of Hale and Dorr to execute the incorporation. Federal and state certificates for tax exemption as a non-profit organization were granted to the society.

The name Philharmonia was selected to clarify the size of the orchestra—something less than the traditional symphonic scope of 90 or more members. Although the name Philharmonia is familiar in Europe, it is relatively unknown in America.

Genuinely unique is the Philharmonia's co-operative structure. Patterned after highly successful co-operative orchestras in Europe, it differs only in one respect. In Europe, orchestra members own shares of stock in the corporation. This is not possible in the United States, since all orchestras are non-profit corporations and thereby have no stock.

But the Boston Philharmonia is 100 per cent artistically co-operative, since under the Philharmonic Society's by-laws:

—All of the musicians are permanent corporate members of the Philharmonic Society. Three members of the orchestra committee are permanent members of the board of trustees.

—The orchestra members have exclusive decision on orchestral personnel.

—The orchestra members' vote is matched with that of the trustees on (1) engagement of conductors, and (2), engagement of the orchestra management.

—The orchestra members' opinion is consulted on policy matters that concern the musical product.

Officers of the Boston Philharmonic Society's board of trustees are: President, Robert Brink, internationally-known violinist; also an instructor at the New England Conservatory of Music; treasurer, William H. Curtis, instructor and registrar at the Berklee School of Music, Boston; secretary, Virgil C. Brink, senior partner — the law firm of Hale and Door, Boston.

Members are George E. Geyer, physician; president of the Handel and Haydn Society; Bruce Harriman, vice-president of the New England Telephone Co.; John W. Sears, state representative, 3rd Suffolk District; Robert MacWilliams, president of the E. C. Schirmer Music Publishing Co.; Maynard Goldman, musician, and instructor at Brandeis University and Concord Academy; Fordyce C. Pier, musician, and director — the Cambridge Arts Ensemble; Nancy Jerome, musician, secretary of the orchestra committee; Daniel Pinkham, distinguished composer and musician; also an instructor at the New England Conservatory of Music; and Raymond Toubman, musician, chairman of the orchestra committee.

135

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
DEC 19 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Philharmonia Formed

By MICHAEL STEINBERG,
Globe Music Critic

The Boston Philharmonic Society has announced the formation of a permanent, professional orchestra to be known as the Boston Philharmonia. The orchestra is a players' co-operative, and will be the first of its kind in the United States, though a number of European groups, including the London Symphony, operate on that basis.

A series of three concerts will be given in Jordan Hall in March and April 1968. Thomas Dunn, music director of the Handel and Haydn Society and of the Festival Orchestra (New York), will conduct one of these concerts. Details about dates, programs and the other conductors will be announced later.

President of the new orchestra is Robert Brink, violinist and concert manager. Music Unlimited Associates, the concert management firm Brink heads, will manage the Boston Philharmonia's business affairs.

The Philharmonia aims to make orchestral concerts available to an audience to whom the concerts of the Boston Symphony are unavailable, either for financial reasons or because the Symphony concerts are so largely sold out by subscription. It further plans to be available for school concerts; for concerts elsewhere in Massachusetts, for which, according to studies by the Massachusetts Council on the Arts, there is great demand; and for Summer concerts, for example on the Charles River Esplanade, where in recent years activities have dwindled virtually to the vanishing point as Boston Symphony players have been more occupied at Tangelwood.

The Boston Philharmonia will have a permanent nucleus of about 40 players. Its repertory, drawing heavily, though not exclusively, on music of the 18th and 20th centuries, will emphasize works for ensembles larger than normal chamber music groups, yet smaller than full symphony orchestra. This represents an area commonly neglected in public concert programs.

Under the co-operative plan, orchestral musicians are permanent corporate members of the Boston Philharmonic Society, they have exclusion right of decision on engagement of orchestral personnel, and their members' vote is matched with that of the trustees on the engagement of conductors and of management.

Members of the Boston Philharmonic Society's board of trustees are Robert Brink, President; William H. Curtis, Berklee School of Music, treasurer; Virgil C. Brink, senior partner in the law firm of Hale and Door, secretary; Dr. George E. Geyer, president of the Handel and Haydn Society; Bruce Harriman, vice-president, New England Telephone Company; Rep. John W. Sears; Robert MacWilliams, president, E. C. Schirmer Publishing Company; composer Daniel Pinkham; Maynard Goldman; Fordyce C. Pier; Nancy Jerome and Raymond Toubman. Gov. Volpe has accepted the Honorary Chairmanship.

LEINSDORF HONORED—Massachusetts State Federation of Music Club presents citation to Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony, for his work as director of the Berkshire Music Center. From left, Mrs. Ursula Burke, federation president; Leinsdorf; Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky; and Chester Williams, federation vice president.

The ARTS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
DEC 19 1967 New England Newsclip

By McLAREN HARRIS

The establishment of a new professional orchestra in Boston was announced yesterday by the Boston Philharmonic Society, Inc., an organization founded in March by 18 musicians headed by violinist Robert Brink.

The orchestra, to be known as the Boston Philharmonia, will consist of approximately 40 members and will emphasize small-orchestra repertoire from the 18th and 20th centuries. Three debut concerts are planned for March and April at Jordan Hall. Next season the ensemble hopes to present as many as ten programs in Boston plus programs for school children, engagements elsewhere in Greater Boston and New England and, if funds are available, an Esplanade season.

Guest conductors will direct the orchestra until a permanent conductor can be chosen. Thomas Dunn, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Festival Orchestra of New York, has been engaged for one of the spring concerts.

FORMATION OF A NEW ORCHESTRA, the Boston Philharmonia, was announced yesterday by members of the Boston Philharmonic Society including Robert Brink, president; William H. Curtis, treasurer; Virgil C. Brink, secretary, and Bruce Harriman, trustee.

REASONS CITED

The following reasons were cited for the new orchestra's establishments:

- The potential audience for orchestral concerts far exceeds 21,000 which, according to the society's figures, represents the Boston Symphony Orchestra's capacity live audience during the winter season.
- There is presently no orchestra in Boston suited to frequent performances of small-ensemble repertoire, which comprises a major portion of 18th-century instrumental music and many works of the 20th century. The 106-member Boston Symphony, claims the society, cannot continually pare down its forces to meet such needs.
- No orchestra is currently able to undertake extensive touring of schools to present children's programs.
- No orchestra is now available to travel to areas outside of Boston on a regular basis.
- A new orchestra would provide increased opportunity for employment to promising students and young professionals in Boston.

Brink said that membership of the Boston Philharmonia will be essentially the same as that of the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, which heretofore performed in conjunction with the Handel and Haydn Society, Lexington Choral Society, MIT Choral Society and others, and has recorded for WGBH-TV. Except for a 14-member chamber ensemble, the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, for all practical purposes, will cease to exist.

Trustees emphasized that the Boston Philharmonia will be a cooperative organization. Orchestra personnel will be considered as corporate members with three players represented on the board of trustees. They will exercise authority over certain areas of orchestral administration, such as (1) having exclusive decision on matters regarding orchestra personnel; (2) having a matching vote with that of the trustees on the engagement of a conductor and appointment of orchestra management; (3) having an advisory role on policy matters concerning the musical product.

RASING FUNDS

Officers indicated that the society is in the process of raising funds amounting to $30-50,000 for the spring and approximately $150,000 for next season. Also under consideration are Federal funds under Titles 1 and 3 of the U.S. Education Act of 1967.

Officers of the Boston Philharmonic Society include Robert Brink, president; William H. Curtis, treasurer; and Virgil C. Brink, secretary. Members of the board of trustees include Bruce Harriman, Rep. John W. Sears, George E. Geyer, Robert MacWilliams, Daniel Pinkham, Fordyce Pier, Maynard Goldman, Nancy Jerome and Raymond Toubman. Management for the orchestra is provided by Music Unlimited Associates.

ENTERPRISE (E)
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
CIRC. 4600
047
MAR 29 1968 New England Newsclip

COOPERATIVE

'Sounds Of Spring' Fit Efforts Of Orchestra

BOSTON (UPI) — America's first cooperative orchestra provides the newest sound from Boston this spring.

Unlike the "Boston sound" of pop music fame, the newly formed Boston Philharmonia will specialize in music from the baroque to Shostakovich and in between — music too ambitious for chamber groups and yet unsuitable for an orchestra the size of the Boston Symphony.

Unique in the United States, the Boston Philharmonia, name sake of a world renowned London recording orchestra, is comprised of players who are corporate and permanent members of the Boston Philharmonic Society. They choose their own conductor, with approval of the society's trustees.

The Boston Philharmonia was formed not as a rival to the 87-year-old Boston Symphony but to complement it. The older and larger group can not further expand its all-year schedule, which includes the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Meets Demand

In addition to helping meet the demand for more concert music performances in Boston, the Philharmonia will bring serious music to smaller New England cities and college areas which seldom have visiting orchestras or their own ensembles.

Kenneth DeWitt Schermerhorn, a native of Schenectady, N.Y., was picked to lead the debut concert of the Boston Philharmonia on April 8 in Jordan Hall, auditorium of the New England Conservatory. Schermerhorn, conductor and music director of the American Ballet Theater in New York City, becomes head of the Milwaukee Symphony in the fall.

The Philharmonia's first concert will offer early symphonies by Mozart and Schubert; the "Danses Concertante" by Stravinsky, now living in California.

Forty Players

Thomas Dunn and Alexander Schneider will conduct the Boston Philharmonia April 18 and 25, to complete its initial season.

The Philharmonia has a nucleus of 40 players, but more can be added if a certain piece of music requires them. Most of the personnel are free-lance musicians, many of them virtuosos of their chosen instrument. They have been appearing with the Boston Ballet, the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, the Opera Company of Boston or as substitutes with the Boston Symphony and the Pops.

The society believes the Boston Philharmonia will be the pioneer and pace-setter for similar cooperative orchestras throughout America.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000
DEC 19 1967

Every Man to Be Boss In Boston Philharmonia

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (UPI)—The formation of the Boston Philharmonia, in which the players will be their own bosses, was announced today.

The Philharmonic Society's board of trustees said the orchestra would be the first cooperative orchestra in the United States. Its 40 members are permanent corporate members of the Philharmonic Society and will determine which musicians will constitute the orchestra.

The society said it would "complement, not compete with" existing musical groups in New England, including the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Philharmonia will make its debut in March in Jordan Hall. It will be directed by guest conductors until a permanent conductor is chosen.

135

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 94,100

DEC 19 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Philharmonia Formed

By MICHAEL STEINBERG,
Globe Music Critic

The Boston Philharmonic Society has announced the formation of a permanent, professional orchestra to be known as the Boston Philharmonia. The orchestra is a players' co-operative, and will be the first of its kind in the United States, though a number of European groups, including the London Symphony, operate on that basis.

A series of three concerts will be given in Jordan Hall in March and April 1968. Thomas Dunn, music director of the Handel and Haydn Society and of the Festival Orchestra (New York), will conduct one of these concerts. Details about dates, programs and the other conductors will be announced later.

President of the new orchestra is Robert Brink, violinist and concert manager, Music Unlimited Associates, the concert management firm Brink heads, will manage the Boston Philharmonia's business affairs.

The Philharmonia aims to make orchestral concerts available to an audience to whom the concerts of the Boston Symphony are unavailable, either for financial reasons or because the Symphony concerts are so largely sold out by subscription. It further plans to be available for school concerts; for concerts elsewhere in Massachusetts, for which, according to studies by the Massachusetts Council on the Arts, there is great demand; and for Summer concerts, for example on the Charles River Esplanade, where in recent years activities have dwindled virtually to the vanishing point as Boston Symphony players have been more occupied at Tangelwood.

The Boston Philharmonia will have a permanent nucleus of about 40 players. Its repertory, drawing heavily, though not exclusively, on music of the 18th and 20th centuries, will emphasize works for ensembles larger than normal chamber music groups, yet smaller than full symphony orchestra. This represents an area commonly neglected in public concert programs.

Under the co-operative plan, orchestral musicians are permanent corporate members of the Boston Philharmonic Society, they have exclusion right of decision on engagement of orchestral personnel, and their members' vote is matched with that of the trustees on the engagement of conductors and of management.

Members of the Boston Philharmonic Society's board of trustees are Robert Brink, President; William H. Curtis, Berklee School of Music, treasurer; Virgil C. Brink, senior partner in the law firm of Hale and Door, secretary; Dr. George E. Geyer, president of the Handel and Haydn Society; Bruce Harriman, vice-president, New England Telephone Company; Rep. John W. Sears; Robert MacWilliams, president, E. C. Schirmer Publishing Company; composer Daniel Pinkham; Maynard Goldman; Fordyce C. Pier; Nancy Jerome and Raymond Toubman. Gov. Volpe has accepted the Honorary Chairmanship.

LEINSDORF HONORED—Massachusetts State Federation of Music Club presents citation to Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony, for his work as director of the Berkshire Music Center. From left, Mrs. Ursula Burke, federation president; Leinsdorf; Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky; and Chester Williams, federation vice president.

The ARTS

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

DEC 19 1967 New England Newsclip

By McLAREN HARRIS

The establishment of a new professional orchestra in Boston was announced yesterday by the Boston Philharmonic Society, Inc., an organization founded in March by 18 musicians headed by violinist Robert Brink.

The orchestra, to be known as the Boston Philharmonia, will consist of approximately 40 members and will emphasize small-orchestra repertoire from the 18th and 20th centuries. Three debut concerts are planned for March and April at Jordan Hall. Next season the ensemble hopes to present as many as ten programs in Boston plus programs for school children, engagements elsewhere in Greater Boston and New England and, if funds are available, an Esplanade season.

Guest conductors will direct the orchestra until a permanent conductor can be chosen. Thomas Dunn, conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society and the Festival Orchestra of New York, has been engaged for one of the spring concerts.

FORMATION OF A NEW ORCHESTRA, the Boston Philharmonia, was announced yesterday by members of the Boston Philharmonic Society including Robert Brink, president; William H. Curtis, treasurer; Virgil C. Brink, secretary, and Bruce Harriman, trustee.

REASONS CITED

The following reasons were cited for the new orchestra's establishments:

- The potential audience for orchestral concerts far exceeds 21,000 which, according to the society's figures, represents the Boston Symphony Orchestra's capacity live audience during the winter season.
- There is presently no orchestra in Boston suited to frequent performances of small-ensemble repertoire, which comprises a major portion of 18th-century instrumental music and many works of the 20th century. The 106-member Boston Symphony, claims the society, cannot continually pare down its forces to meet such needs.
- No orchestra is currently able to undertake extensive touring of schools to present children's programs.
- No orchestra is now available to travel to areas outside of Boston on a regular basis.
- A new orchestra would provide increased opportunity for employment to promising students and young professionals in Boston.

Brink said that membership of the Boston Philharmonia will be essentially the same as that of the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, which heretofore performed in conjunction with the Handel and Haydn Society, Lexington Choral Society, MIT Choral Society and others, and has recorded for WGBH-TV. Except for a 14-member chamber ensemble, the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, for all practical purposes, will cease to exist.

Trustees emphasized that the Boston Philharmonia will be a cooperative organization. Orchestra personnel will be considered as corporate members with three players represented on the board of trustees. They will exercise authority over certain areas of orchestral administration, such as (1) having exclusive decision on matters regarding orchestra personnel; (2) having a matching vote with that of the trustees on the engagement of a conductor and appointment of orchestra management; (3) having an advisory role on policy matters concerning the musical product.

RASING FUNDS

Officers indicated that the society is in the process of raising funds amounting to $30-50,000 for the spring and approximately $150,000 for next season. Also under consideration are Federal funds under Titles 1 and 3 of the U.S. Education Act of 1967.

Officers of the Boston Philharmonic Society include Robert Brink, president; William H. Curtis, treasurer; and Virgil C. Brink, secretary. Members of the board of trustees include Bruce Harriman, Rep. John W. Sears, George E. Geyer, Robert MacWilliams, Daniel Pinkham, Fordyce Pier, Maynard Goldman, Nancy Jerome and Raymond Toubman. Management for the orchestra is provided by Music Unlimited Associates.

ENTERPRISE (E)
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
CIRC. 4600

047

MAR 29 1968 New England Newsclip

COOPERATIVE

'Sounds Of Spring' Fit Efforts Of Orchestra

BOSTON (UPI) — America's first cooperative orchestra provides the newest sound from Boston this spring.

Unlike the "Boston sound" of pop music fame, the newly formed Boston Philharmonia will specialize in music from the baroque to Shostakovich and in between — music too ambitious for chamber groups and yet unsuitable for an orchestra the size of the Boston Symphony.

Unique in the United States, the Boston Philharmonia, name sake of a world renowned London recording orchestra, is comprised of players who are corporate and permanent members of the Boston Philharmonic Society. They choose their own conductor, with approval of the society's trustees.

The Boston Philharmonia was formed not as a rival to the 87-year-old Boston Symphony but to complement it. The older and larger group can not further expand its all-year schedule, which includes the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Meets Demand

In addition to helping meet the demand for more concert music performances in Boston, the Philharmonia will bring serious music to smaller New England cities and college areas which seldom have visiting orchestras or their own ensembles.

Kenneth DeWitt Schermerhorn, a native of Schenectady, N.Y., was picked to lead the debut concert of the Boston Philharmonia on April 8 in Jordan Hall, auditorium of the New England Conservatory. Schermerhorn, conductor and music director of the American Ballet Theater in New York City, becomes head of the Milwaukee Symphony in the fall.

The Philharmonia's first concert will offer early symphonies by Mozart and Schubert; the "Danses Concertante" by Stravinsky, now living in California.

Forty Players

Thomas Dunn and Alexander Schneider will conduct the Boston Philharmonia April 18 and 25, to complete its initial season.

The Philharmonia has a nucleus of 40 players, but more can be added if a certain piece of music requires them. Most of the personnel are free-lance musicians, many of them virtuosos of their chosen instrument. They have been appearing with the Boston Ballet, the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, the Opera Company of Boston or as substitutes with the Boston Symphony and the Pops.

The society believes the Boston Philharmonia will be the pioneer and pace-setter for similar cooperative orchestras throughout America.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

DEC 19 1967

Every Man to Be Boss In Boston Philharmonia

BOSTON, Dec. 18 (UPI)—The formation of the Boston Philharmonia, in which the players will be their own bosses, was announced today.

The Philharmonic Society's board of trustees said the orchestra would be the first cooperative orchestra in the United States. Its 40 members are permanent corporate members of the Philharmonic Society and will determine which musicians will constitute the orchestra.

The society said it would "complement, not compete with" existing musical groups in New England, including the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Philharmonia will make its debut in March in Jordan Hall. It will be directed by guest conductors until a permanent conductor is chosen.

NEWS (e)
MALDEN, MASS.
CIRC. 10,832

APR 4 1968 New England Newsclip

Spring's Newest Sound . . .

Hub's Co-op Orchestra

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — America's first cooperative orchestra provides the newest sound from Boston this spring.

Unlike the "Boston sound" of pop music fame, the newly formed Boston Philharmonia will specialize in music from the baroque to Shostakovich and in between — music too ambitious for chamber groups and yet unsuitable for an orchestra the size of the Boston Symphony.

Unique in the United States, the Boston Philharmonia, namesake of a world renowned London recording orchestra, is comprised of players who are corporate and permanent members of the Boston Philharmonic Society. They choose their own conductor, with approval of the society's trustees.

The Boston Philharmonia was formed not as a rival to the 87-year-old Boston Symphony but to complement it. The older and larger group can not further expand its all-year schedule, which includes the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Meets Demand

In addition to helping meet the demand for more concert music performances in Boston, the Philharmonia will bring serious music to smaller New England cities and college areas which seldom have visiting orchestras or their own ensembles.

Kenneth DeWitt Schermerhorn, a native of Schenectady, N.Y., was picked to lead the debut concert of the Boston Philharmonia on April 8 in Jordan Hall, auditorium of the New England Conservatory.

Schermerhorn, conductor and music director of the American Ballet Theater in New York City, becomes head of the Milwaukee Symphony in the fall.

The Philharmonia's first concert will offer early symphonies by Mozart and Schubert; the "Danses Concertante" by Stravinsky, now living in California.

Forty Players

Thomas Dunn and Alexander Schneider will conduct the Boston Philharmonia April 18 and 25, to complete its initial season.

The Philharmonia has a nucleus of 40 players, but more can be added if a certain piece of music requires them. Most of the personnel are free-lance musicians, many of them virtuosos of their chosen instrument. They have been appearing with the Boston Ballet, the Cambridge Festival Orchestra, the Opera Company of Boston or as substitutes with the Boston Symphony and the Pops.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

DEC 19 1967 New England Newsclip

New Boston Philharmonic Group Formed

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Philharmonic Society has announced formation of a philharmonic orchestra for Boston.

The society's Board of Trustees said Monday the orchestra, named the Boston Philharmonia, is the first co-operative orchestra in the United States.

The orchestra's 40 members are permanent corporate members of the Philharmonic Society and will have say in the hiring and firing of musicians, the society said.

The society said the new orchestra will "complement— not compete with"—existing musical groups in New England including the prestigious Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Philharmonia, which will make its debut in a series of concerts in March and April in Boston's Jordan Hall, will be directed by guest conductors until a permanent conductor is chosen.

The society said the current winter series presented by the Boston Symphony can be subscribed to by no more than 21,048 persons, or less than 1 per ce of greater Boston's nearly three million residents.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 5,750

APR 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Musicians Form Cooperative Orchestra

BOSTON (UPI) — America's first cooperative orchestra provides the newest sound from Boston this spring.

Unlike the "Boston sound" of pop music fame, the newly formed Boston Philharmonia will specialize in music from the baroque to Shostakovich and in between — music too ambitious for chamber groups and yet unsuitable for an orchestra the size of the Boston Symphny.

Unique in the United States, the Boston Philharmonia, namesake of a world renowned London recording orchestra, is comprised of players who are corporate and permanent members of the Boston Philharmonic Society. They choose their own conductor, with approval of the society's trustees.

The Boston Philharmonia was formed not as a rival to the 87-year-old Boston Symphony but to complement it. The older and larger group can not further expand its all-year schedule, which includes the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

In addition to helping meet the demand for more concert music performances in Boston, the Philharmonia will bring serious music to smaller New England cities and college areas which seldom have visiting orchestras or their own ensembles.

Kenneth DeWitt Schermerhorn, a native of Schenectady, N.Y., was picked to lead the debut concert of the Boston Philharmonia on April 8 in Jordan Hall, auditorium of the New England Conservatory. Schermerhorn, conductor and music director of the American Ballet Theater in New York City, becomes head of the Milwaukee Symphony in the fall.

The Philharmonia has a nucleus of 40 players, but more can be added if a certain piece of music requires them. Most of the personnel are free-lance musicians, many of them virtuosos of their chosen instrument.

The society believes the Boston Philharmonia will be the pioneer and pace-setter for similar cooperative orchestras throughout America.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

DEC 19 1967 New England Newsclip

Philharmonia Orchestra First U.S. Co-operative

BOSTON — The Boston Philharmonic Society announced today the formation of a permanent, professional and co-operative classical orchestra.

At a news conference in Jordan Hall, the Society's Board of Trustees said that the orchestra, named the Boston Philharmonia, is the first co-operative orchestra in the United States.

A series of debut concerts will be presented at Jordan Hall in March-April.

The trustees also disclosed that the orchestra will perform not only in Boston, but in other cities in the Commonwealth and New England.

Guest conductors will direct the orchestra until a permanent conductor is selected by the Trustees and orchestra members.

With a permanent nucleus of about 40 professional members, the orchestra may be expanded as the need or occasion demands. These leading, independent Greater Boston musicians have performed with the Boston Ballet Company orchestra, the Opera Company of Boston orchestra, and as substitutes with the Boston Symphony, Boston Pops and Boston Esplanade orchestras.

The Philharmonic Society's trustees made it clear that the new orchestra will complement — not compete with — existing musical resources in Boston, Massachusetts or New England. It was established to provide concerts for a wide audience which, until now, has been deprived of the cultural enjoyment of hearing classical masterpieces.

Illustrating the immediate need for a new, full-time professional orchestra here, the Trustees pointed out that the winter series currently presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be subscribed to by no more than 21,048 persons...substantially less than 1 per cent of Greater Boston's nearly 3 million residents, and the eight series this great orchestra presents are near to its present capacity.

Yet the national average of symphonic attendance is close to 2 per cent of a city's population. In culturally-enriched Metropolitan Boston, attendance at classical music performances would be well over the national average — if musical facilities were provided.

The Boston Symphony, employing more than 100 musicians, cannot devote much of its time to music requiring the services of 40 — despite the fact that most of the orchestral music of the 17th and 18th centuries, and much of the 19th and 20, was written for smaller-size orchestras.

In essence, the great volume of compositions by the classical masters written for smaller-than-symphony orchestras is never performed, and consequently never heard by music lovers in Boston and New England.

Erich Leinsdorf, internationally - acclaimed conductor of the Boston Symphony, deplored this musical vacuum recently during an interview with the New York Times.

Expressing grave fears for the future of American symphony orchestras as presently constituted, Mr. Leinsdorf cited the reluctance of trustees to recognize that two totally different audiences exist today — one for the popular repertory, and one for new and interesting music. He said he felt it was necessary for symphony orchestras to split themselves into smaller groups to reach various audiences.

There is no professional, permanent orchestra in Massachusetts to present extensive children's concerts enjoyed by many other areas of the country.

The Esplanade season has dwindled regrettably in recent summers, while other American cities are expanding their summer concert seasons. This is acutely unfortunate because Boston was one of the first cities to enjoy such concerts.

However, the Boston Symphony Orchestra membership is now increasingly involved with its commitments to the highly laudable development of Tanglewood, and thus is not available to maintain or expand the Esplanade season.

137

LEINSDORF'S RESIGNATION

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

DEC 6 1967 New England Newscltp

Heavy Workload

Leinsdorf Will Leave Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the prestigious Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation from the symphony after the 1968-69 season.

Heavy Workload

"The reason I am leaving is 99 per cent of the workload," he said.

Leinsdorf said he began discussing the possibility of a reduction in his duties several months ago.

"I followed at that time the advice of my physician," he said. "The subject has come up regularly since and came to a head last June when I actually mentioned the word 'resignation' to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees."

He said he will leave the BSO Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he gives the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the BSO an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his workload.

The conductor said he is not ready to make any decision on what he will do when he leaves the symphony.

"I want first of all, a little time to enjoy my feeling of having a pack on my back," he said.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its 11th conductor since its founding in 1881.

His resignation makes the BSO the third major U.S. orchestra in the market for a new conductor. The Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic also seek conductors.

Leinsdorf, married and the father of three boys and two girls, lives in Brookline, a Boston suburb. He is a naturalized American citizen.

Born in Vienna, Austria, he came to the United States shortly before World War II to conduct at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. His specialty was Wagnerian opera.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Guest Conductor

After military service, he conducted briefly with the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. From 1947 to 1955 he conducted the Rochester, N.Y., Philharmonic. He directed the New York Opera for one season, left to rejoin the Met as a guest conductor, then came to Boston in 1962.

He reportedly receives $80,000 to $90,000 a year with the Boston Symphony.

A spokesman for the trustees said Leinsdorf's resignation was "reluctantly" accepted but that he would return occasionally as a guest conductor.

Leinsdorf said his resignation reminded him of a conversation he once had with a former conductor of the Boston Symphony, the late Pierre Monteux.

"He told me this job needed two orchestras and three conductors," he said.

Taxpayers to Get

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

DEC 8 1967 New England Newscltp

A gifted maestro moves on

The symphony orchestra is a nineteenth century institution whose survival in our own eclectic era is something of an anomaly. It is big, unwieldy and costly, and its classical repertory appeals to a relatively small public.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in some ways a special case. Now in its 87th season, it gives more concerts than any other major orchestra (well over 200 a season) and it has no difficulty in selling out all of its series in advance. It has become so much a part of our cultural community that a symphonyless Boston would be unthinkable. Yet the big orchestra has problems even here.

The announcement that Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's musical director since 1962, will leave Boston at the end of the 1968-69 season is one evidence of it. Mr. Leinsdorf has not caught on with the Boston public as well as he might have and his relationship with the orchestra members has not been the happiest. But he brought great musicianship and needed discipline to the orchestra. And his programming introduced Symphony-goers to a whole range of new and unusual music. He will be a hard man to replace.

Indeed, in order to attract a new conductor of comparable stature the B.S.O. trustees may have to make some concessions they were unwilling to make to Mr. Leinsdorf. The director gave as his reason for resigning the backbreaking number of concerts he is required to conduct—more than any other music director—and the unwillingness of the trustees to spend money for guest conductors in order to give listeners a change of pace.

These are legitimate complaints. The director ought to be given more free time to study, to travel, to conduct other orchestras and just to rest. And the orchestra ought to offer more variety both in guest conductors and in guest artists. The Hall is still selling out, and tapes and recordings continue to move well, but some soft spots are developing which suggest that the public will have to be courted more actively hereafter.

Boston cherishes its orchestra and wants it to continue the fine instrument it has always been. The community is in Mr. Leinsdorf's debt for his contribution to the orchestra's present excellence. It will be even more in his debt, if, by his leaving, he jolts the trustees into making the kind of changes needed to assure a bright future for the B.S.O. as well.

IOWA PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Des Moines, Iowa

Cir. 74330 0·47
Gazette
Cedar Rapids, Iowa

DEC 7 1967

Erich Leinsdorf Resigns from Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said in announcing his resignation.

He said he will leave the orchestra Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he give the trustees 20-months notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the orchestra an extra season, however, if a replacement is not found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his administrative workload.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its eleventh conductor since its founding in 1881.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

DEC 6 1967

Leinsdorf Exits Director's Post With Boston

BOSTON — The third of America's top symphony orchestras is seeking a music director with the resignation of Erich Leinsdorf from his Boston Symphony post. The resignation is effective at the end of the 1969 Tanglewood season, but Leinsdorf indicated he would remain one more season if no successor is found.

Leonard Bernstein and Jean Martinon are resigning similar posts with the New York Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony, respectively. Both orchestras will have a season of visiting conductors before announcing successors. Chicago's next music director is expected to be announced next month.

Leinsdorf gave his heavy conducting load as his main reason for resigning. His assignment this season includes 18 of 24 subscription programs in Boston and 17 of 24 at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. Names most frequently mentioned as possibilities for the three key orchestral berths are Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, Seiji Ozawa, Carlo Maria Giulini and Claudio Abbado. Leinsdorf has held his Boston post since 1962.

NEWS-TIMES (e)
DANBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 26,000

DEC 6 1967 New England Newscltp

Noted Boston Orchestra Head Will Resign

BOSTON (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation.

He said he will leave the orchestra Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he give the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the orchestra an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his administrative workload.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its 11th conductor since its founding in 1881.

13

LEINSDORF'S RESIGNATION

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350

DEC 6 1967 New England Newsclip

Heavy Workload

Leinsdorf Will Leave Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the prestigious Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation from the symphony after the 1968-69 season.

Heavy Workload

"The reason I am leaving is 99 per cent of the workload," he said.

Leinsdorf said he began discussing the possibility of a reduction in his duties several months ago.

"I followed at that time the advice of my physician," he said. "The subject has come up regularly since and came to a head last June when I actually mentioned the word 'resignation' to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees."

He said he will leave the BSO Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he gives the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the BSO an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his workload.

The conductor said he is not ready to make any decision on what he will do when he leaves the symphony.

"I want first of all, a little time to enjoy my feeling of having a pack on my back," he said.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its 11th conductor since its founding in 1881.

His resignation makes the BSO the third major U.S. orchestra in the market for a new conductor. The Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic also seek conductors.

Leinsdorf, married and the father of three boys and two girls, lives in Brookline, a Boston suburb. He is a naturalized American citizen.

Born in Vienna, Austria, he came to the United States shortly before World War II to conduct at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. His specialty was Wagnerian opera.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Guest Conductor

After military service, he conducted briefly with the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. From 1947 to 1955 he conducted the Rochester, N.Y., Philharmonic. He directed the New York Opera for one season, left to rejoin the Met as a guest conductor, then came to Boston in 1962.

He reportedly receives $80,000 to $90,000 a year with the Boston Symphony.

A spokesman for the trustees said Leinsdorf's resignation was "reluctantly" accepted but that he would return occasionally as a guest conductor.

Leinsdorf said his resignation reminded him of a conversation he once had with a former conductor of the Boston Symphony, the late Pierre Monteux.

"He told me this job needed two orchestras and three conductors," he said.

Taxpayers to Get

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 224,100

DEC 8 1967 New England Newsclip

A gifted maestro moves on

The symphony orchestra is a nineteenth century institution whose survival in our own eclectic era is something of an anomaly. It is big, unwieldy and costly, and its classical repertory appeals to a relatively small public.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in some ways a special case. Now in its 87th season, it gives more concerts than any other major orchestra (well over 200 a season) and it has no difficulty in selling out all of its series in advance. It has become so much a part of our cultural community that a symphonyless Boston would be unthinkable. Yet the big orchestra has problems even here.

The announcement that Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's musical director since 1962, will leave Boston at the end of the 1968-69 season is one evidence of it. Mr. Leinsdorf has not caught on with the Boston public as well as he might have and his relationship with the orchestra members has not been the happiest. But he brought great musicianship and needed discipline to the orchestra. And his programming introduced Symphony-goers to a whole range of new and unusual music. He will be a hard man to replace.

Indeed, in order to attract a new conductor of comparable stature the B.S.O. trustees may have to make some concessions they were unwilling to make to Mr. Leinsdorf. The director gave as his reason for resigning the backbreaking number of concerts he is required to conduct—more than any other music director—and the unwillingness of the trustees to spend money for guest conductors in order to give listeners a change of pace.

These are legitimate complaints. The director ought to be given more free time to study, to travel, to conduct other orchestras and just to rest. And the orchestra ought to offer more variety both in guest conductors and in guest artists. The Hall is still selling out, and tapes and recordings continue to move well, but some soft spots are developing which suggest that the public will have to be courted more actively hereafter.

Boston cherishes its orchestra and wants it to continue the fine instrument it has always been. The community is in Mr. Leinsdorf's debt for his contribution to the orchestra's present excellence. It will be even more in his debt, if, by his leaving, he jolts the trustees into making the kind of changes needed to assure a bright future for the B.S.O. as well.

IOWA PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Des Moines, Iowa

Cir. 74330 0.47
Gazette
Cedar Rapids, Iowa

DEC 7 1967

Erich Leinsdorf Resigns from Boston Symphony

29

BOSTON (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said in announcing his resignation.

He said he will leave the orchestra Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he give the trustees 20-months notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the orchestra an extra season, however, if a replacement is not found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his administrative workload.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its eleventh conductor since its founding in 1881.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

DEC 6 1967

Leinsdorf Exits Director's Post With Boston

BOSTON — The third of America's top symphony orchestras is seeking a music director with the resignation of Erich Leinsdorf from his Boston Symphony post. The resignation is effective at the end of the 1969 Tanglewood season, but Leinsdorf indicated he would remain one more season if no successor is found.

Leonard Bernstein and Jean Martinon are resigning similar posts with the New York Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony, respectively. Both orchestras will have a season of visiting conductors before announcing successors. Chicago's next music director is expected to be announced next month.

Leinsdorf gave his heavy conducting load as his main reason for resigning. His assignment this season includes 18 of 24 subscription programs in Boston and 17 of 24 at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. Names most frequently mentioned as possibilities for the three key orchestral berths are Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, Seiji Ozawa, Carlo Maria Giulini and Claudio Abbado. Leinsdorf has held his Boston post since 1962.

NEWS-TIMES (e)
DANBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 26,000

DEC 6 1967 New England Newsclip

Noted Boston Orchestra Head Will Resign

BOSTON (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation.

He said he will leave the orchestra Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he give the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the orchestra an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his administrative workload.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its 11th conductor since its founding in 1881.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100
DEC 8 1967 New England Newspp

BUD COLLINS

Help wanted--at the Hall and the Heights

Two of the town's leading executives—Erich Leinsdorf and Jim Miller — have blown their jobs within 24 hours. Leinsdorf conducted the orchestral squad at Symphony Hall while Miller conducted the football squad at Boston College. Both are good men, but the pressure and the verdicts from their critics are identical: "not inspirational enough."

This means that they didn't win enough, and when they did win it wasn't with flair. In looking for a man who can win with style and vibrato, the trustees of the Boston Symphony should interview Ara Parseghian of Notre Dame. And the graduate board at B.C. might discuss their opening with Leonard Bernstein of the New York Philharmonic. Ara and Lenny are their kind of guys, and could adapt to the new situations easily.

The Boston careers of Leinsdorf and Miller have run remarkably parallel. They arrived in the autumn of 1962, were received as geniuses and did well. Disenchantment set in, however, and they were let go at practically the same time, Leinsdorf on Tuesday, Miller on Wednesday. Because of these coincidental circumstances, it was speculated that Erich and Jim might be exchanging jobs. Leinsdorf could give the B.C.'s the rhythm they lacked, and Miller could instruct the B.S.O. in the proper rendition of "For Boston."

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony, stopped those rumors by announcing that Leinsdorf will stay on the podium for 18 months. This rules out Miller as a replacement because he can't wait that long for another job.

Basically, Leinsdorf and Miller had the same trouble: patrons who are living in the past. The music nuts at Symphony Hall can't get over the memories of Serge Koussevitzky and Charles Munch. The football nuts at Boston College are still dreaming of Frank Leahy and bowl games.

These people aren't satisfied with very-good; they demand what they remember as perfection. Miller, for instance, beat Holy Cross four out of six times. Leinsdorf, in the words of one critic, "could be depended on to handle Schumann beautifully five out of six times." It wasn't good enough.

Henry B. Cabot and the gang down at Symphony are no less cannibalistic than any other alumni group, but they do have discretion. They didn't carry signs that said "Goodbye Erich!", and they didn't boo in the middle of a performance. Still, when Leinsdorf heard people pronouncing his first name as "Ear-ache" he could sense that somebody was unhappy.

The knockers always look for miracles from the conductor, forgetting that he has to have the horses. Have the B.S.O. and B.C. fallen down in their recruiting programs? Are they attracting the best performers?

"I am responsible for the team I field," Leinsdorf says, and Miller would agree. But did they get the cooperation they needed from their administrations?

There were other considerations in the demises of Erich Leinsdorf and Jim Miller. Ticket sales were off at the B.S.O. and B.C.; there was talk of dissension and complaceney on the squads. These difficulties always indicate a change of leaders.

Now the B.S.O. and B.C. are looking for successors. B.C.'s task is easier: There are more good football coaches around than symphony conductors. Henry Cabot and his fellow trustees may have to go outside of the country as they search the bush leagues of music to find a promising musician to reform the B.S.O. into an orchestra of destiny — an ensemble called desire.

There is strong sentiment in favor of bringing up Seigi Ozawa, who has been building a formidable minor league symphony in Toronto. This makes sense. Didn't Dick Williams come up from Toronto to revive the Red Sox? Could Ozawa create a musical "Impossible Dream"? Other names worth consideration by the B.S.O. are Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones, Herb Alpert, Montovani, Red Foley of the Grand Ol' Opry and Frank Leahy.

Although reasonably discreet in the Leinsdorf affair, the B.S.O. trustees did violate one rule of good taste in dismissals: they neglected to give Leinsdorf a vote of confidence before letting him go.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN
CIRC. 133,200
DEC 6 1967 New England Newspp

Boston Conductor Unhappy, to Quit

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

ERICH LEINSDORF

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation.

He said he will leave the orchestra Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he give the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the orchestra an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his administrative workload.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250
DEC 6 1967 New England Newspp

AP Wirephoto

TO LEAVE BSO AUG. '69

Leinsdorf Quits $90G Post

Erich Leinsdorf, 54, the Viennese-born musician who rose to become music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, resigned his $80,000 to $90,000 a year post yesterday, effective August, 1969. The Brookline resident blamed a heavy work load for his decision, and leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the third major American ensemble on the lookout for a permanent music director. The others are New York and Chicago.

Erich Leinsdorf, Conductor, Resigns in 1969

Leinsdorf will leave the BSO after seven years at the end of the 1969 season at Tanglewood, summer home for the orchestra. His contract stipulates a minimum period of 20 months for giving notice.

In his letter of resignation, Leinsdorf informed the orchestra's trustees he would stay on "with a vastly reduced work load," if they have not found a successor for him within a year. Under these terms, it is possible he would still be conducting in Boston until the end of 1970.

Leinsdorf refused to comment on his future plans, but did say he has not been invited to take the post of director of the new John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington. He is a close personal friend of the Kennedy family.

In accepting Leinsdorf's resignation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, thanked him for "many memorable hours of music making, for his leadership of the Orchestra, for his remarkable contribution to the educational work of the orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, and for the fact that during his tenure our subscriptions have steadily increased ,and the box office at Tanglewood has been at an all-time high."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000
DEC 6 1967 New England Newspp

The Loss of Leinsdorf

First-rate conductors of major symphony orchestras are rare commodities on the musical market these days. In 87 years the Boston Symphony has employed 11 musical directors, and now the orchestra's trustees must begin the search for a twelfth.

When his resignation becomes effective, Erich Leinsdorf will not have completed a particularly long tenure in Boston, compared to the 13-year reign of his predecessor, Charles Munch, or the 25 years during which Serge Koussevitzky brought the orchestra to international prominence. But Mr. Leinsdorf's contributions since his appointment in 1962 have been sufficently great to cause one to sense the weight of his departure even before it occurs.

His love for music has been illustrated in the enlargement and revitalization of the repertoire. His respect for Boston audiences has been evident in his efforts to bring them to a closer understanding of modern idioms through the introduction of recent compositions. His sense of responsibility toward the position has been felt in the roles he played in nearly all musical and administrative aspects of the orchestra's life, which he believes are basically interactive.

In the past five years we have come to rely upon the smooth operation of the orchestral apparatus and the superb artistic results of more than 130 concerts per year. We have either underestimated the dimensions of the conductor's task or let ourselves believe that he is a superman. Mr. Leinsdorf has admitted that he isn't.

Our sorrow over the impending loss of this man of the arts is mixed with sympathy and good wishes for Henry B. Cabot and the trustees, who must locate a capable successor and reconcile his duties with the rising costs of orchestra management, at a time when as many as three other orchestras in this country are doing the same. The competition will be keen. We wish them, and Mr. Leinsdorf, good fortune.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 243,199
DEC 8 1967 New England Newsclip

BUD COLLINS

Help wanted--at the Hall and the Heights

Two of the town's leading executives—Erich Leinsdorf and Jim Miller — have blown their jobs within 24 hours. Leinsdorf conducted the orchestral squad at Symphony Hall while Miller conducted the football squad at Boston College. Both are good men, but the pressure and the verdicts from their critics are identical: "not inspirational enough."

This means that they didn't win enough, and when they did win it wasn't with flair. In looking for a man who can win with style and vibrato, the trustees of the Boston Symphony should interview Ara Parseghian of Notre Dame. And the graduate board at B.C. might discuss their opening with Leonard Bernstein of the New York Philharmonic. Ara and Lenny are their kind of guys, and could adapt to the new situations easily.

The Boston careers of Leinsdorf and Miller have run remarkably parallel. They arrived in the autumn of 1962, were received as geniuses and did well. Disenchantment set in, however, and they were let go at practically the same time, Leinsdorf on Tuesday, Miller on Wednesday. Because of these coincidental circumstances, it was speculated that Erich and Jim might be exchanging jobs. Leinsdorf could give the B.C.'s the rhythm they lacked, and Miller could instruct the B.S.O. in the proper rendition of "For Boston."

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony, stopped those rumors by announcing that Leinsdorf will stay on the podium for 18 months. This rules out Miller as a replacement because he can't wait that long for another job.

Basically, Leinsdorf and Miller had the same trouble: patrons who are living in the past. The music nuts at Symphony Hall can't get over the memories of Serge Koussevitzky and Charles Munch. The football nuts at Boston College are still dreaming of Frank Leahy and bowl games.

These people aren't satisfied with very-good; they demand what they remember as perfection. Miller, for instance, beat Holy Cross four out of six times. Leinsdorf, in the words of one critic, "could be depended on to handle Schumann beautifully five out of six times." It wasn't good enough.

Henry B. Cabot and the gang down at Symphony are no less cannibalistic than any other alumni group, but they do have discretion. They didn't carry signs that said "Goodbye Erich!", and they didn't boo in the middle of a performance. Still, when Leinsdorf heard people pronouncing his first name as "Ear-ache" he could sense that somebody was unhappy.

The knockers always look for miracles from the conductor, forgetting that he has to have the horses. Have the B.S.O. and B.C. fallen down in their recruiting programs? Are they attracting the best performers?

"I am responsible for the team I field," Leinsdorf says, and Miller would agree. But did they get the cooperation they needed from their administrations?

There were other considerations in the demises of Erich Leinsdorf and Jim Miller. Ticket sales were off at the B.S.O. and B.C.; there was talk of dissension and complaceney on the squads. These difficulties always indicate a change of leaders.

Now the B.S.O. and B.C. are looking for successors. B.C.'s task is easier: There are more good football coaches around than symphony conductors. Henry Cabot and his fellow trustees may have to go outside of the country as they search the bush leagues of music to find a promising musician to reform the B.S.O. into an orchestra of destiny — an ensemble called desire.

There is strong sentiment in favor of bringing up Seigi Ozawa, who has been building a formidable minor league symphony in Toronto. This makes sense. Didn't Dick Williams come up from Toronto to revive the Red Sox? Could Ozawa create a musical "Impossible Dream"? Other names worth consideration by the B.S.O. are Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones, Herb Alpert, Montovani, Red Foley of the Grand Ol' Opry and Frank Leahy.

Although reasonably discreet in the Leinsdorf affair, the B.S.O. trustees did violate one rule of good taste in dismissals: they neglected to give Leinsdorf a vote of confidence before letting him go.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN
CIRC. 133,030
DEC 6 1967 New England Newsclip

Boston Conductor Unhappy, to Quit

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation.

He said he will leave the orchestra Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he give the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the orchestra an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his administrative workload.

ERICH LEINSDORF

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. [illegible]
DEC 6 1967 New England Newsclip

TO LEAVE BSO AUG. '69

Leinsdorf Quits $90G Post

Erich Leinsdorf, 54, the Viennese-born musician who rose to become music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, resigned his $80,000 to $90,000 a year post yesterday, effective August, 1969. The Brookline resident blamed a heavy work load for his decision, and leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the third major American ensemble on the lookout for a permanent music director. The others are New York and Chicago.

Erich Leinsdorf, Conductor, Resigns in 1969

Leinsdorf will leave the BSO after seven years at the end of the 1969 season at Tanglewood, summer home for the orchestra. His contract stipulates a minimum period of 20 months for giving notice.

In his letter of resignation, Leinsdorf informed the orchestra's trustees he would stay on "with a vastly reduced work load," if they have not found a successor for him within a year. Under these terms, it is possible he would still be conducting in Boston until the end of 1970.

Leinsdorf refused to comment on his future plans, but did say he has not been invited to take the post of director of the new John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington. He is a close personal friend of the Kennedy family.

In accepting Leinsdorf's resignation, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, thanked him for "many memorable hours of music making, for his leadership of the Orchestra, for his remarkable contribution to the educational work of the orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, and for the fact that during his tenure our subscriptions have steadily increased ,and the box office at Tanglewood has been at an all-time high."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. [illegible]
DEC 6 1967 New England Newsclip

The Loss of Leinsdorf

First-rate conductors of major symphony orchestras are rare commodities on the musical market these days. In 87 years the Boston Symphony has employed 11 musical directors, and now the orchestra's trustees must begin the search for a twelfth.

When his resignation becomes effective, Erich Leinsdorf will not have completed a particularly long tenure in Boston, compared to the 13-year reign of his predecessor, Charles Munch, or the 25 years during which Serge Koussevitzky brought the orchestra to international prominence. But Mr. Leinsdorf's contributions since his appointment in 1962 have been sufficently great to cause one to sense the weight of his departure even before it occurs.

His love for music has been illustrated in the enlargement and revitalization of the repertoire. His respect for Boston audiences has been evident in his efforts to bring them to a closer understanding of modern idioms through the introduction of recent compositions. His sense of responsibility toward the position has been felt in the roles he played in nearly all musical and administrative aspects of the orchestra's life, which he believes are basically interactive.

In the past five years we have come to rely upon the smooth operation of the orchestral apparatus and the superb artistic results of more than 130 concerts per year. We have either underestimated the dimensions of the conductor's task or let ourselves believe that he is a superman. Mr. Leinsdorf has admitted that he isn't.

Our sorrow over the impending loss of this man of the arts is mixed with sympathy and good wishes for Henry B. Cabot and the trustees, who must locate a capable successor and reconcile his duties with the rising costs of orchestra management, at a time when as many as three other orchestras in this country are doing the same. The competition will be keen. We wish them, and Mr. Leinsdorf, good fortune.

139

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 538,393 SUN. 693,178

DEC 24 1967

Suddenly Three Orchestras Are Up For Grabs

By Paul Hume
Special from the Washington Post

Music

Symphonic musical chairs is the name of the game, and it is being played today in the United States as never before.

Suddenly, three major American symphony orchestra conductorships are open at the same time. Never in the 125 years since the birth of the New York Philharmonic, our oldest orchestra, has there been a moment like this one: Boston, New York and Chicago are all seeking conductors.

These are enviable posts because there probably are no finer orchestras in the world today than these three. They have audiences of long-proven sophistication and loyalty, they pay the highest salaries to orchestra conductors anywhere and they hold infinite possibilities for making magnificent music.

But the posts are unenviable, too, because of the problems of directing an orchestra that has 52-week contracts.

Erich Leinsdorf, in resigning from the Boston Symphony effective at the end of the summer of 1969, spoke of the impossible strains that are involved in planning the winter season, the Tanglewood school and the recording schedule.

When people talk about the likely candidates for the big eastern orchestral assignments, certain young conductors' names always come up. They are, alphabetically: Colin Davis from England; Istvan Kertesz from Hungary; Lorin Maazel from the United States; Zubin Mehta from India and Seiji Ozawa from Japan.

It is by no means certain that any of these will land any of the three big vacancies. Mehta is happy with the Los Angeles Philharmonic and his frequent Metropolitan Opera stints.

Ozawa, who has directed the Chicago Symphony's summer season at Ravinia, is now conductor of the Toronto Symphony.

The one prediction I am willing to make at this point is that the Chicago Symphony is already wrapped up for Georg Solti. It was offered to Solti five years ago, before Martinon got it. But at that time Solti, who had briefly held the post of conductor of the Dallas Symphony, had just completed a year at Covent Garden and said he did not want people to think that he flitted from post to post.

He is now more mature, both in opera, where he has a great genius, and in the orchestral repertoire, where he was a bit less experienced. He should make Chicago a very exciting conductor. He is, incidentally, like Ormandy, Reiner, Szell and Kertesz, Hungarian, and it was the Reiner regime in Chicago that gave the world one of its great orchestra-conductor combines for a decade.

Lorin Maazel, an American born in France, was educated in this country but has made his career largely in Europe, where he is at present musical director of the West Berlin Opera and conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony.

Colin Davis, also a past guest with the Philadelphia Orchestra, proved himself a superb opera conductor at the Met in last season's "Peter Grimes."

Kertesz suited many Philadelphians better than any other guest they have had in recent years. He is highly musical and makes concerts of intense impact.

Disadvantages in the past have stemmed from the tendency of orchestral boards to hire one top man and one second-rate man. Naturally the orchestras and the audiences paid little attention to the "associate." But if an orchestra's season is divided between, say, a Szell and a Steinberg, an Ormandy and a Kertesz, a Giulini and a Solti, things could be brilliant most of the time.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN. 956,206

DEC 7 1967

Erich Leinsdorf May Prolong Stay

Special to The Inquirer

BOSTON, Dec. 6—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced Wednesday that he has advised the trustees of the orchestra that he will relinquish his post at the end of the Tanglewood season of 1969, in accordance with his contract which stipulates a minimum period of 20 months for giving notice.

He has agreed at the same time, if the trustees have not found his successor by a year from now, to help by remaining as music director until the end of the 1970 Tanglewood season, but under a guaranteed severe reduction of conducting duties.

The reason for his decision is his heavy work load.

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 370,499 SUN. 522,391

DEC 17 1967

Orchestras Facing Conductor Shortage

By Robert Finn

Music

In addition to all their widely-publicized financial problems and labor difficulties, America's major symphony orchestras are now faced with yet another crisis: a shortage of permanent conductors.

With the recent announcement that Erich Leinsdorf will soon be quitting the Boston Symphony's podium, three of the country's five top orchestras are now actively seeking new permanent conductors. And the list of applicants is slim. People are turning them down right and left.

Jean Martinon is now in his final year in Chicago. Leonard Bernstein has only another year or two to go in New York. And now Leinsdorf.

Among the "big five" orchestras, that leaves only Ormandy, now in his 31st year in Philadelphia, and Szell, in his 22nd year in Cleveland. Ormandy is 68, Szell 70. In our last conversation, Szell remarked to me with a grin, "I sometimes think it would be pleasant to retire before I have to."

Leinsdorf quit with a blast at his workload in Boston, remarking that a symphony conductor should not have to be "a 27-inning pitcher." He was also angry because the Boston trustees cut down on his guest-conducting time.

HE IS RIGHT about the workload. American orchestras play far more concerts than do their European counterparts. European conductors who do accept major posts here are appalled at the amount of conducting entailed.

Conducting a symphony concert is not the easiest kind of work. What one sees at the concert itself is merely the final stage, the tip of the iceberg. What precedes that, in the conductor's study and in rehearsals, is the real meat of the job. It is physically tiring, emotionally exhausting, intellectually demanding. The concertgoer who thinks, "Hell, I could get up there and wave my arms, too" is sadly deluded.

So conductors are thinking twice about heeding the calls of major American orchestras. When Pierre Boulez was here, Newsweek magazine asked him if he were interested in Bernstein's post. The reply was a flat no. And Zubin Mehta has expressed no interest in moving up from Los Angeles, where he has lots of free time, to the Philharmonic's concert mill.

It was obvious during Boulez' visit here that many were sizing him up as an eventual successor to Szell. Claudio Abbado will doubtless get the same treatment later this year.

BOULEZ told me he is honored by the attention, but not interested. What he wants is more free time to compose. I believe him.

The dilemma of the big orchestras as they seek men willing to take on the exhausting burden of permanent posts is, in some measure, a result of the advent of the 52-week contract for which orchestra musicians lobbied so long.

Everyone agrees the year-round contract is a good thing and the men deserve it. But what it means is simply more and more concerts—concerts that have to be conducted by somebody.

And in this age of the virtuoso conductor, orchestras have not helped their position by over-glamorizing the job. Whoever succeeds Bernstein in New York, or Szell in Cleveland, will have a rough time holding the interest of those numerous persons who care more about Bernstein and Szell than they do about Mozart and Brahms. Can you blame any conductor for thinking twice about stepping into such a situation?

THE ORCHESTRAS are shopping mostly among the young, ambitious men who might be interested in furthering their careers and are young enough to bear the burden of work. You hear a lot about Ozawa, Maazel, Kertesz, Davis, Giulini. All are talented, but as a group they are not "box office" in the crassly commercial sense. But if anyone takes up the burdens, it will have to be them.

Some musicians, you know, think the symphony orchestra as we know it is on its deathbed. Certainly the younger composers are foresaking it in favor of smaller media where they can more readily get performances. This in itself is an ominous trend. If the repertory stagnates, the orchestra as a musical medium will become an anachronism.

The orchestras are beset by the militancy of players and unions, by the rising cost spiral, and now by what might be called a "conductors revolt." Who says art is an escape from reality?

139

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 538,393 SUN. 693,178

DEC 24 1967

Suddenly Three Orchestras Are Up For Grabs

By Paul Hume
Special from the Washington Post

Music

Symphonic musical chairs is the name of the game, and it is being played today in the United States as never before.

Suddenly, three major American symphony orchestra conductorships are open at the same time. Never in the 125 years since the birth of the New York Philharmonic, our oldest orchestra, has there been a moment like this one: Boston, New York and Chicago are all seeking conductors.

These are enviable posts because there probably are no finer orchestras in the world today than these three. They have audiences of long-proven sophistication and loyalty, they pay the highest salaries to orchestra conductors anywhere and they hold infinite possibilities for making magnificent music.

But the posts are unenviable, too, because of the problems of directing an orchestra that has 52-week contracts.

Erich Leinsdorf, in resigning from the Boston Symphony effective at the end of the summer of 1969, spoke of the impossible strains that are involved in planning the winter season, the Tanglewood school and the recording schedule.

When people talk about the likely candidates for the big eastern orchestral assignments, certain young conductors' names always come up. They are, alphabetically: Colin Davis from England; Istvan Kertesz from Hungary; Lorin Maazel from the United States; Zubin Mehta from India and Seiji Ozawa from Japan.

It is by no means certain that any of these will land any of the three big vacancies. Mehta is happy with the Los Angeles Philharmonic and his frequent Metropolitan Opera stints.

Ozawa, who has directed the Chicago Symphony's summer season at Ravinia, is now conductor of the Toronto Symphony.

The one prediction I am willing to make at this point is that the Chicago Symphony is already wrapped up for Georg Solti. It was offered to Solti five years ago, before Martinon got it. But at that time Solti, who had briefly held the post of conductor of the Dallas Symphony, had just completed a year at Covent Garden and said he did not want people to think that he flitted from post to post.

He is now more mature, both in opera, where he has a great genius, and in the orchestral repertoire, where he was a bit less experienced. He should make Chicago a very exciting conductor. He is, incidentally, like Ormandy, Reiner, Szell and Kertesz, Hungarian, and it was the Reiner regime in Chicago that gave the world one of its great orchestra-conductor combines for a decade.

Lorin Maazel, an American born in France, was educated in this country but has made his career largely in Europe, where he is at present musical director of the West Berlin Opera and conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony.

Colin Davis, also a past guest with the Philadelphia Orchestra, proved himself a superb opera conductor at the Met in last season's "Peter Grimes."

Kertesz suited many Philadelphians better than any other guest they have had in recent years. He is highly musical and makes concerts of intense impact.

Disadvantages in the past have stemmed from the tendency of orchestral boards to hire one top man and one second-rate man. Naturally the orchestras and the audiences paid little attention to the "associate." But if an orchestra's season is divided between, say, a Szell and a Steinberg, an Ormandy and a Kertesz, a Giulini and a Solti, things could be brilliant most of the time.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 522,941 SUN. 956,206

DEC 7 1967

Erich Leinsdorf May Prolong Stay

Special to The Inquirer

BOSTON, Dec. 6—Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced Wednesday that he has advised the trustees of the orchestra that he will relinquish his post at the end of the Tanglewood season of 1969, in accordance with his contract which stipulates a minimum period of 20 months for giving notice.

He has agreed at the same time, if the trustees have not found his successor by a year from now, to help by remaining as music director until the end of the 1970 Tanglewood season, but under a guaranteed severe reduction of conducting duties.

The reason for his decision is his heavy work load.

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 370,499 SUN. 522,391

DEC 17 1967

Orchestras Facing Conductor Shortage

By Robert Finn

Music

In addition to all their widely-publicized financial problems and labor difficulties, America's major symphony orchestras are now faced with yet another crisis: a shortage of permanent conductors.

With the recent announcement that Erich Leinsdorf will soon be quitting the Boston Symphony's podium, three of the country's five top orchestras are now actively seeking new permanent conductors. And the list of applicants is slim. People are turning them down right and left.

Jean Martinon is now in his final year in Chicago. Leonard Bernstein has only another year or two to go in New York. And now Leinsdorf.

Among the "big five" orchestras, that leaves only Ormandy, now in his 31st year in Philadelphia, and Szell, in his 22nd year in Cleveland. Ormandy is 68, Szell 70. In our last conversation, Szell remarked to me with a grin, "I sometimes think it would be pleasant to retire before I have to."

Leinsdorf quit with a blast at his workload in Boston, remarking that a symphony conductor should not have to be "a 27-inning pitcher." He was also angry because the Boston trustees cut down on his guest-conducting time.

HE IS RIGHT about the workload. American orchestras play far more concerts than do their European counterparts. European conductors who do accept major posts here are appalled at the amount of conducting entailed.

Conducting a symphony concert is not the easiest kind of work. What one sees at the concert itself is merely the final stage, the tip of the iceberg. What precedes that, in the conductor's study and in rehearsals, is the real meat of the job. It is physically tiring, emotionally exhausting, intellectually demanding. The concertgoer who thinks, "Hell, I could get up there and wave my arms, too" is sadly deluded.

So conductors are thinking twice about heeding the calls of major American orchestras. When Pierre Boulez was here, Newsweek magazine asked him if he were interested in Bernstein's post. The reply was a flat no. And Zubin Mehta has expressed no interest in moving up from Los Angeles, where he has lots of free time, to the Philharmonic's concert mill.

It was obvious during Boulez' visit here that many were sizing him up as an eventual successor to Szell. Claudio Abbado will doubtless get the same treatment later this year.

BOULEZ told me he is honored by the attention, but not interested. What he wants is more free time to compose. I believe him.

The dilemma of the big orchestras as they seek men willing to take on the exhausting burden of permanent posts is, in some measure, a result of the advent of the 52-week contract for which orchestra musicians lobbied so long.

Everyone agrees the year-round contract is a good thing and the men deserve it. But what it means is simply more and more concerts—concerts that have to be conducted by somebody.

And in this age of the virtuoso conductor, orchestras have not helped their position by over-glamorizing the job. Whoever succeeds Bernstein in New York, or Szell in Cleveland, will have a rough time holding the interest of those numerous persons who care more about Bernstein and Szell than they do about Mozart and Brahms. Can you blame any conductor for thinking twice about stepping into such a situation?

THE ORCHESTRAS are shopping mostly among the young, ambitious men who might be interested in furthering their careers and are young enough to bear the burden of work. You hear a lot about Ozawa, Maazel, Kertesz, Davis, Giulini. All are talented, but as a group they are not "box office" in the crassly commercial sense. But if anyone takes up the burdens, it will have to be them.

Some musicians, you know, think the symphony orchestra as we know it is on its deathbed. Certainly the younger composers are foresaking it in favor of smaller media where they can more readily get performances. This in itself is an ominous trend. If the repertory stagnates, the orchestra as a musical medium will become an anachronism.

The orchestras are beset by the militancy of players and unions, by the rising cost spiral, and now by what might be called a "conductors revolt." Who says art is an escape from reality?

140

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 369,982 SUN. 442,677

DEC 17 1967

Who'll Take Boston, New York, Chicago Podiums?

By PAUL HUME
Miami Herald-Washington Pos' Wire

WASHINGTON — Musical chairs is the name of the game and it is being played today in the United States as never before.

Three major American symphony orchestra conductorships are open at the same time. Never in the 175 years since the New York Philharmonic began life as our oldest orchestra has there been a moment like this one: Boston, New York, and Chicago are all seeking conductors.

These are enviable posts because there probably are not in the world today finer orchestras then any of these three. They have audiences of long-proven sophistication and loyalty, they pay the highest salaries, and they hold infinite possibilities for making magnificent music.

But the posts are unenviable, too, because of the problems that confront any conductor who takes on the burdens of directing the rising number of orchestras in this country that have 52-week contracts.

★ ★ ★

ERICH LEINSDORF, in offering his resignation from the Boston Symphony, to take effect at the end of the summer of 1969, spoke of the impossible strains that are involved in planning the winter season, the Tanglewood School and the recordings that give the Boston Symphony no small part of its income.

The year-round contracts toward which every major American orchestra is rapidly moving do unquestionably increase the conductor's work. These contracts are, equally undeniably, going to have much to do with the reshaping of our orchestras' habits in the immediate future.

★ ★ ★

It has never happened before. Three major U.S. symphony orchestras must find replacements for their conductors — all at once. Here's a rundown on likely candidates to fill the shoes of Leinsdorf at Boston, Bernstein at New York, and Martinon in Chicago.

★ ★ ★

LEINSDORF

BERNSTEIN

MARTINON

But the big, fascinating questions now are: Who will move into Leonard Bernstein's spot in New York? Who will get Boston? And who will take over from Jean Martinon in Chicago?

When people talk about likely candidates, certain young conductors' names always come up. They are, purely alphabetically: Colin Davis, from England; Istvan Kertesz, from Hungary; Lorin Maazel, from the U.S.; Zubin Mehta, from India; and Seiji Ozawa, from Japan.

I have added the countries of origin of each of these men because there is some concern that American orchestras should have American conductors.

★ ★ ★

IT IS BY no means certain that any of the five conductors I have named will land any of the three big vacancies now existing. Mehta, happy with the Los Angeles Philharmonic and his frequent Metropolitan Opera stints, has quoted the phrase, "The New York Philharmonic is the graveyard of conductors."

Ozawa has done a superb job of directing the Chicago Symphony's summer season at Ravinia, and is now conductor of the Toronto Symphony.

The one prediction I am willing to make at this point is that the Chicago Symphony is already wrapped up for Georg Solti. It was offered to Solti five years ago, before Martinon got it. But at that time Solti, who had briefly held the post of conductor of the Dallas Symphony, had just completed a year at Covent Garden, and said he did not want people to think that he flipped from post to post so fast.

He is now more mature, and should make Chicago a very exciting conductor.

Lorin Maazel, an American born in France, has made his career largely in Europe where he is at present musical director of the West Berlin Opera and conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony. Philadelphians have liked him in recent seasons when he was a guest, and so have Washingtonians when he has been here with the Philadelphians.

Colin Davis, also a past guest with the Philadelphia Orchestra, proved himself a superb opera conductor at the Met in last season's "Peter Grimes." He is also a fine Berlioz man, and one of the favorite leaders of the London Symphony. Kertesz suited many Philadelphians better than any other guest they have had in recent years. He is highly musical and makes concerts of intense impact.

★ ★ ★

BUT THERE are many other possibilities: Carlo Maria Giulini and Herbert Von Karajan will be guests in Chicago this season. Guilini is magnificent, but refuses the huge task of preparing a repertoire adequate to the demands of an American orchestra's season.

Karajan? Now there's one of the magic names. Claudia Cassidy has already come out in favor of paying whatever it would cost Chicago to get him for both opera and orchestra.

Among American conductors who might reasonably be considered possible leaders for Boston, New York, and Chicago, how about Skrowaceski in Minneapolis, the post from which Ormandy went to Philadelphia, and Mitropoulos to New York?

Or Krips in San Francisco? Would one of these orchestras decide to take a chance on Thomas Schippers? On William Steinberg from Pittsburgh? Would George Szell conceivably leave his beloved Cleveland orchestra? He already has agreed to serve as the New York Philharmonic guest musical director on a shared basis in the 1969-70 season.

An insufficiently recognized conductor is Izler Solomon in Indianapolis. And Milton Katims in Seattle. Might Sixten Ehrling in Detroit move east?

What about the rising talents of such Americans as Robert LaMarchina and George Cleve, Nicholas Harsanyi and Anshel Brusilow? Erich Kunzel, associate conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is a man of demonstrated gifts of unusual power.

★ ★ ★

FROM EUROPE, other strong contenders would have to include Georges Pretre, Karl Boehm, Lovro Von Matacic, Wolfgang Sawallisch, and Spain's Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos.

Composer Pierre Boulez, of Paris, once known only as a leading avant-garde composer, has in recent years shown himself a notable conductor.

It would also be a mistake not to recall the names of Walter Hendl and Thor Johnson, two men who have served our major orchestras over a number of years.

A strong possibility for the near future is that Boston's trustees will realize they must divide responsibilities they have up to this time thrown upon one key man.

Disadvantages in the past have stemmed from the tendency of orchestral boards to hire one top man and one second-rate man. Naturally, orchestras and audiences paid little attention to the "associate."

But if an orchestra's season is divided between, say, a Szell and a Steinberg, an Ormandy and a Kertesz, a Guilini and a Solti, things could be brilliant most of the time.

Lively Arts:

Eli Adams.....editor
George Bourke
amusement editor
Lawrence DeVine...drama critic
Doris Reno..music & art editor
Beatrice Washburn..book editor

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

DEC 6 1967

New England Newspp

Leinsdorf to Quit as Conductor Of Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation.

He said he will leave the orchestra Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he gives the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its 11th conductor since its founding in 1881.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

DEC 6 1967

New England Newspp

Symphony Leader to Quit

BOSTON (UPI)—Erich Leinsdorf has decided to quit his post as music director of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra within two years.

The 55-year-old native of Vienna announced his resignation Tuesday, blaming a heavy work load for his decision. He said the resignation is effective August 1969.

Regarding the amount of work he has done, Leinsdorf said in a telephone interview, "Nobody in the American musical scene has worked more than I have with the B.S.O. I'm over my 600th concert."

Leinsdorf, on a scheduled late fall vacation, was in New York visiting relatives. His next Boston concert will be Dec. 15.

Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson was on the podium at Symphony Hall Tuesday night. Some of the players, en route to the hall, heard the announcement by car radio.

It was made formal by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra trustees, who addressed the 104 musicians before Tuesday night's program of music by Brahms, Henze and Rimsky-Korsakov.

Born in Vienna 55 years ago, Leinsdorf came to the United States in 1937. He has held the top musical posts in Cleveland and Rochester, N.Y., and was assistant conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra in New York and the Salzburg Festival in Austria.

Leinsdorf succeeded Charles Munch in 1962, becoming the 11th conductor of the orchestra. Munch had led the Boston Symphony for 13 seasons, succeeding the famed Serge Koussevitzky who was its leader for a quarter-century.

His resignation was in accordance with his contract which stipulates a 20-month notice period. He may remain in Boston through 1970, having notified the trustees that if they have not found a successor by a year from now, he would stay on "with a vastly reduced conducting load."

—Associated Press Wirephoto
ERIC LEINSDORF

141

MESSENGER
NORWOOD, MASS.
SEMI-WKLY. CIRC. 7,450

DEC 6 1967 New England Newspap

The State

LEINSDORF RESIGNS AS BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF resigned yesterday as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective in August, 1969. Leinsdorf, 55, who has conducted the 104-member orchestra for the past five years, blamed a heavy work load for his decision.

The Viennese-born musician said, "Nobody in the American musical scene has worked more than I have with the B.S.O. I'm over my 600th concert." The move made the Boston Symphony the third major American orchestra on the lookout for a permanent music director. New York and Chicago are currently shopping for conductors.

NEWS (e)
SALEM, MASS.
CIRC. 28,550

DEC 6 1967 New England Newspap

Conductor Leinsdorf Resigns

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the prestigious Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation from the symphony after the 1968-69 season.

"The reason I am leaving is 99 per cent of the workload," he said.

Leinsdorf said he began discussing the possibility of a reduction in his duties several months ago.

"I followed at that time the advice of my physician," he said. "The subject has come up regularly since and came to a head last June when I actually mentioned the word resignation' to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees."

He said he will leave the BSO Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he gives the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the BSO an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his workload.

The conductor said he is not ready to make any decision on what he will do when he leaves the symphony.

"I want first of all, a little time to enjoy my feeling of having a pack off my back," he said.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its 11th conductor since its founding in 1881.

His resignation makes the BSO the third major U.S. orchestra in the market for a new conductor. The Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic also seek conductors.

Leinsdorf, married and the father of three boys and two girls, lives in Brookline, a Boston suburb. He is a naturalized American citizen.

Born in Vienna, Austria, he came to the United States shortly before World War II to conduct at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. His specialty was Wagnerian opera.

After military service, he conducted briefly with the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. From 1947 to 1955 he conducted the Rochester, N.Y., Philharmonic. He directed the New York Opera for one season, left to rejoin the Met as a guest conductor, then came to Boston in 1962.

He reportedly receives $80,000 to $90,000 a year with the Boston Symphony.

A spokesman for the trustees said Leinsdorf's resignation was "reluctantly" accepted but that he would return occasionally as a guest conductor.

Leinsdorf said his resignation reminded him of a conversation he once had with a former conductor of the Boston Symphony, the late Pierre Monteux.

"He told me this job needed two orchestras and three conductors," he said.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

DEC 17 1967

Conductors Passing Batons

By Paul Hume

MUSICAL CHAIRS is the name of the game and it is being played today in the United States as never before.

Suddenly, though not unexpectedly, three major American symphony orchestra conductorships are open at the same time. Never in the 175 years since the New York Philharmonic began life to become our oldest orchestra has there been a moment like this one: Boston, New York and Chicago are all seeking conductors.

These are enviable posts because, potentially at least, there are not in the world today finer orchestras than any of these three. And because these orchestras have audiences of long-proven sophistication and loyalty, pay the highest salaries to orchestra conductors anywhere and hold infinite possibilities for making magnificent music in the years ahead.

But the posts are unenviable, too, because of the problems that confront any conductor who takes on the burdens of directing one of the rising number of orchestras in this country that have 52-week contracts. Erich Leinsdorf, in offering his resignation from the Boston Symphony, to take effect at the end of the summer of 1969, spoke of the impossible strains that are involved in planning the winter season, the Tanglewood season, the Tanglewood school and the recordings that give the Boston Symphony no small part of its income.

Seiji Ozawa

Georg Solti

YEARS AGO Eugene Ormandy said to me that the young men coming up in the conducting field would never take on the work load that he and his senior colleagues regularly assume. It was interesting to see, in the comment on Leinsdorf's resignation by Boston Symphony board president Henry B. Cabot, the suggestion that Ormandy with the Philadelphia's equal task of home and tour concerts, its Saratoga season and a heavier recording schedule, still seemed to manage. But as Leinsdorf pointed out in his initial statement, the Boston board has always insisted on fewer soloists and guest conductors than other major orchestras, thus throwing a greater responsibility on the conductor.

The year-round contracts toward which every major American orchestra is rapidly moving do unquestionably increase the conductor's work. These contracts are, equally undeniably, going to have much to do with the reshaping of our orchestras' habits in the immediate future.

One of the strong possibilities for the near future is that Boston's trustees will realize that they must divide up the responsibilities they have to this time thrust upon one man. Not only must another man take on the direction of Tanglewood's music center sessions, but quite possibly, all of our major orchestras will engage two principal, co-equal conductors so that the long seasons may have the benefit of men who come to their work unfatigued.

Disadvantages in the past, when some plan was tried, usually stemmed from the tendency of orchestral boards to hire one top man and one second-rater. Naturally orchestras and audiences paid little attention to the "associate." But if an orchestra's season were divided between, say, a Szell and a Steinberg, an Ormandy and a Kertisz, a Giulini and a Solti, things could be brilliant most of the time. That is, however, another subject, and not the one up for crystal gazing today.

TODAY THE big, fascinating questions are: who will move into the Bernstein spot in New York? Who will get Boston? And who will take over from Martinon in Chicago? But when you play musical chairs, you don't just fill three vacant chairs, for when you fill three chairs, you empty three others.

When people talk about the likely candidates for the big Eastern orchestral assignments, certain young conductors' names always come up. They are, purely alphabetically: Colin Davis, from England; Istvan Kertesz, from Hungary; Lorin Maazel, from the United States; Zubin Mehta, from India, and Seiji Ozawa, from Japan. I have added the countries of origin of each of these men because there is some concern that American orchestras should have American conductors.

Without entering a controversial area, I believe today that American orchestras should have the very finest conductors available, wherever they came from. If they are American, fine. If they are European, Asian or African, equally fine. American orchestras have, in the past, profited from American conductors. They have also suffered from them. That, too, is not today's game, which, I repeat, is "Who goes where?"

It is by no means certain that any of the five conductors I have named will land any of the three big vacancies now existing. Mehta, happy with the Los Angeles Philharmonic and his frequent Metropolitan Opera stints, has been quoted as saying "The New York Philharmonic is the graveyard of conductors."

Ozawa, who has done a superb job of directing the Chicago Symphony's summer season at Ravinia, is now conductor of the Toronto Symphony, a post he will obviously not retain when something bigger comes his way.

But the one prediction I am willing to make at this point is that the Chicago Symphony is already wrapped up for Georg Solti. It was offered to Solti five years ago, before Martinon got it.

AT THAT TIME Solti, who had briefly held the post of conductor of the Dallas Symphony, and had just completed a year at Convent Garden, said he did not want people to think that he flipped from post to post so fast, never staying long in one place. He is now more mature, both in opera, where he has a great genius, and in the orchestral repertory, where he was a bit less experience. He should make Chicago a very exciting conductor. He is like Ormandy, Reiner, Szell and Kertesz Hungarian. It was the Reiner, regime in Chicago that gave the world one of its great orchestra-conductor combines for a decade.

Zubin Mehta on the podium.

Lorin Maazel, an American born in France, was educated in this country but has made his career largely in Europe where he is at present musical director of the West Berlin Opera and conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony. Philadelphians have liked him very much in recent seasons when he has guest conducted there. So have Washingtonians when he has been here with the Philadelphia, a slot he will fill twice here in the next few months.

Colin Davis, also a past guest with the Philadelphia Orchestra, proved himself a superb opera conductor at the Met in last season's "Peter Grimes." He is also a fine Berlioz man and one of the favorite leaders of the London Symphony. Kertesz suited many Philadelphians better than any other guest they have had in recent years. He is highly musical and makes concerts of intense impact.

There are many other possibilities: Carlo Maria Giulini and Herbert von Karajan will be guests in Chicago this season. Giulini is magnificent, but refuses the huge task of preparing a repertory adequate to the demands of the average American orchestra's season.

Karajan? Now there's one of the magic names. Claudia Cassidy has already come out in favor of paying whatever it would cost Chicago to get him for both opera and orchestra. She reports that rumors are circulating that he might be offered $300,000 a year. But to her suggestion that he is "the greatest" conductor today, it seems a reasonable reply that no man is.

AMONG AMERICAN conductors who might reasonably be considered possible leaders for Boston, New York and Chicago, how about Skrowaceski in Minneapolis, the post from which Ormandy went to Philadelphia and Mitropoulos to New York? Or Krips in San Francisco? Would one of these orchestras decide to take a chance on Thomas Schippers? On William Steinberg from Pittsburgh? Would George Szell conceivably leave his beloved Cleveland Orchestra? He has already agreed to serve as the New York Philharmonic guest musical director on a shared basis in the 1969-70 season.

An insufficiently recognized conductor is Izler Solomon in Indianapolis. And Milton Katims in Seattle. Might Sixten Ehrling in Detroit move East? What about the rising talents of such Americans as Robert LaMarchina and George Cleve, Nicholas Harsanyi and Anshel Brusilow? Erich Kunzel, associate conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is a man of demonstrated gifts of unusual power.

From Europe other strong contenders would have to include Georges Pretre, Karl Boehm, Lovro von Matacic, Wolfgang Sawallisch and Spain's Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos. And Pierre Boulez of Paris, once known only as a leading avant garde composer, has in recent years shown himself a notable conductor.

It would also be a mistake not to recall the names of Walter Hendl and Thor Johnson, two men who have served our major orchestras over a number of years. Because the shuffle that has begun in Chicago, Boston and New York will not end when those podiums have new occupants.

Predictions: Chicago goes to Georg Solti. Boston? No guess. New York? Hm.

141

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 444,396 SUN. 553,012

DEC 17 1967

Conductors Passing Batons

By Paul Hume

MUSICAL CHAIRS is the name of the game and it is being played today in the United States as never before.

Suddenly, though not unexpectedly, three major American symphony orchestra conductorships are open at the same time. Never in the 175 years since the New York Philharmonic began life to become our oldest orchestra has there been a moment like this one: Boston, New York and Chicago are all seeking conductors.

These are enviable posts because, potentially at least, there are not in the world today finer orchestras than any of these three. And because these orchestras have audiences of long-proven sophistication and loyalty, pay the highest salaries to orchestra conductors anywhere and hold infinite possibilities for making magnificent music in the years ahead.

But the posts are unenviable, too, because of the problems that confront any conductor who takes on the burdens of directing one of the rising number of orchestras in this country that have 52-week contracts. Erich Leinsdorf, in offering his resignation from the Boston Symphony, to take effect at the end of the summer of 1969, spoke of the impossible strains that are involved in planning the winter season, the Tanglewood season, the Tanglewood school and the recordings that give the Boston Symphony no small part of its income.

Seiji Ozawa

Georg Solti

YEARS AGO Eugene Ormandy said to me that the young men coming up in the conducting field would never take on the work load that he and his senior colleagues regularly assume. It was interesting to see, in the comment on Leinsdorf's resignation by Boston Symphony board president Henry B. Cabot, the suggestion that Ormandy with the Philadelphia's equal task of home and tour concerts, its Saratoga season and a heavier recording schedule, still seemed to manage. But as Leinsdorf pointed out in his initial statement, the Boston board has always insisted on fewer soloists and guest conductors than other major orchestras, thus throwing a greater responsibility on the conductor.

The year-round contracts toward which every major American orchestra is rapidly moving do unquestionably increase the conductor's work. These contracts are, equally undeniably, going to have much to do with the reshaping of our orchestras' habits in the immediate future.

One of the strong possibilities for the near future is that Boston's trustees will realize that they must divide up the responsibilities they have to this time thrust upon one man. Not only must another man take on the direction of Tanglewood's music center sessions, but quite possibly, all of our major orchestras will engage two principal, co-equal conductors so that the long seasons may have the benefit of men who come to their work unfatigued.

Disadvantages in the past, when some plan was tried, usually stemmed from the tendency of orchestral boards to hire one top man and one second-rater. Naturally orchestras and audiences paid little attention to the "associate." But if an orchestra's season were divided between, say, a Szell and a Steinberg, an Ormandy and a Kertisz, a Giulini and a Solti, things could be brilliant most of the time. That is, however, another subject, and not the one up for crystal gazing today.

TODAY THE big, fascinating questions are: who will move into the Bernstein spot in New York? Who will get Boston? And who will take over from Martinon in Chicago? But when you play musical chairs, you don't just fill three vacant chairs, for when you fill three chairs, you empty three others.

When people talk about the likely candidates for the big Eastern orchestral assignments, certain young conductors' names always come up. They are, purely alphabetically: Colin Davis, from England; Istvan Kertesz, from Hungary; Lorin Maazel, from the United States; Zubin Mehta, from India, and Seiji Ozawa, from Japan. I have added the countries of origin of each of these men because there is some concern that American orchestras should have American conductors.

Without entering a controversial area, I believe today that American orchestras should have the very finest conductors available, wherever they came from. If they are American, fine. If they are European, Asian or African, equally fine. American orchestras have, in the past, profited from American conductors. They have also suffered from them. That, too, is not today's game, which, I repeat, is "Who goes where?"

It is by no means certain that any of the five conductors I have named will land any of the three big vacancies now existing. Mehta, happy with the Los Angeles Philharmonic and his frequent Metropolitan Opera stints, has been quoted as saying "The New York Philharmonic is the graveyard of conductors."

Ozawa, who has done a superb job of directing the Chicago Symphony's summer season at Ravinia, is now conductor of the Toronto Symphony, a post he will obviously not retain when something bigger comes his way.

But the one prediction I am willing to make at this point is that the Chicago Symphony is already wrapped up for Georg Solti. It was offered to Solti five years ago, before Martinon got it.

AT THAT TIME Solti, who had briefly held the post of conductor of the Dallas Symphony, and had just completed a year at Convent Garden, said he did not want people to think that he flipped from post to post so fast, never staying long in one place. He is now more mature, both in opera, where he has a great genius, and in the orchestral repertory, where he was a bit less experience. He should make Chicago a very exciting conductor. He is like Ormandy, Reiner, Szell and Kertesz Hungarian. It was the Reiner, regime in Chicago that gave the world one of its great orchestra-conductor combines for a decade.

Zubin Mehta on the podium.

Lorin Maazel, an American born in France, was educated in this country but has made his career largely in Europe where he is at present musical director of the West Berlin Opera and conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony. Philadelphians have liked him very much in recent seasons when he has guest conducted there. So have Washingtonians when he has been here with the Philadelphia, a slot he will fill twice here in the next few months.

Colin Davis, also a past guest with the Philadelphia Orchestra, proved himself a superb opera conductor at the Met in last season's "Peter Grimes." He is also a fine Berlioz man and one of the favorite leaders of the London Symphony. Kertesz suited many Philadelphians better than any other guest they have had in recent years. He is highly musical and makes concerts of intense impact.

There are many other possibilities: Carlo Maria Giulini and Herbert von Karajan will be guests in Chicago this season. Giulini is magnificent, but refuses the huge task of preparing a repertory adequate to the demands of the average American orchestra's season.

Karajan? Now there's one of the magic names. Claudia Cassidy has already come out in favor of paying whatever it would cost Chicago to get him for both opera and orchestra. She reports that rumors are circulating that he might be offered $300,000 a year. But to her suggestion that he is "the greatest" conductor today, it seems a reasonable reply that no man is.

AMONG AMERICAN conductors who might reasonably be considered possible leaders for Boston, New York and Chicago, how about Skrowaceski in Minneapolis, the post from which Ormandy went to Philadelphia and Mitropoulos to New York? Or Krips in San Francisco? Would one of these orchestras decide to take a chance on Thomas Schippers? On William Steinberg from Pittsburgh? Would George Szell conceivably leave his beloved Cleveland Orchestra? He has already agreed to serve as the New York Philharmonic guest musical director on a shared basis in the 1969-70 season.

An insufficiently recognized conductor is Izler Solomon in Indianapolis. And Milton Katims in Seattle. Might Sixten Ehrling in Detroit move East? What about the rising talents of such Americans as Robert LaMarchina and George Cleve, Nicholas Harsanyi and Anshel Brusilow? Erich Kunzel, associate conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, is a man of demonstrated gifts of unusual power.

From Europe other strong contenders would have to include Georges Pretre, Karl Boehm, Lovro von Matacic, Wolfgang Sawallisch and Spain's Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos. And Pierre Boulez of Paris, once known only as a leading avant garde composer, has in recent years shown himself a notable conductor.

It would also be a mistake not to recall the names of Walter Hendl and Thor Johnson, two men who have served our major orchestras over a number of years. Because the shuffle that has begun in Chicago, Boston and New York will not end when those podiums have new occupants.

Predictions: Chicago goes to Georg Solti. Boston? No guess. New York? Hm.

MESSENGER
NORWOOD, MASS.
SEMI-WKLY. CIRC. 7,450

DEC 6 1967 New England Newspap

The State

LEINSDORF RESIGNS AS BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR

ERICH LEINSDORF resigned yesterday as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective in August, 1969. Leinsdorf, 55, who has conducted the 104-member orchestra for the past five years, blamed a heavy work load for his decision.

The Viennese-born musician said, "Nobody in the American musical scene has worked more than I have with the B.S.O. I'm over my 600th concert." The move made the Boston Symphony the third major American orchestra on the lookout for a permanent music director. New York and Chicago are currently shopping for conductors.

NEWS (e)
SALEM, MASS.
CIRC. 28,550

DEC 6 1967 New England Newspap

Conductor Leinsdorf Resigns

BOSTON (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf says he is approaching the 600-concert mark as conductor of the prestigious Boston Symphony Orchestra and the job feels "like pitching 27 straight innings in baseball."

"I am too much interested in music to have my energies used up in administration," the 54-year-old conductor said Tuesday in announcing his resignation from the symphony after the 1968-69 season.

"The reason I am leaving is 99 per cent of the workload," he said.

Leinsdorf said he began discussing the possibility of a reduction in his duties several months ago.

"I followed at that time the advice of my physician," he said. "The subject has come up regularly since and came to a head last June when I actually mentioned the word resignation' to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees."

He said he will leave the BSO Aug. 25, 1969, after it ends a summer at Tanglewood in Lenox. His contract requires that he gives the trustees 20 months' notice of his resignation.

He said he will stay with the BSO an extra season, however, if no replacement is found, but with a guaranteed decrease in his workload.

The conductor said he is not ready to make any decision on what he will do when he leaves the symphony.

"I want first of all, a little time to enjoy my feeling of having a pack off my back," he said.

Leinsdorf, in his sixth season with the orchestra, is its 11th conductor since its founding in 1881.

His resignation makes the BSO the third major U.S. orchestra in the market for a new conductor. The Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic also seek conductors.

Leinsdorf, married and the father of three boys and two girls, lives in Brookline, a Boston suburb. He is a naturalized American citizen.

Born in Vienna, Austria, he came to the United States shortly before World War II to conduct at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. His specialty was Wagnerian opera.

After military service, he conducted briefly with the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. From 1947 to 1955 he conducted the Rochester, N.Y., Philharmonic. He directed the New York Opera for one season, left to rejoin the Met as a guest conductor, then came to Boston in 1962.

He reportedly receives $80,000 to $90,000 a year with the Boston Symphony.

A spokesman for the trustees said Leinsdorf's resignation was "reluctantly" accepted but that he would return occasionally as a guest conductor.

Leinsdorf said his resignation reminded him of a conversation he once had with a former conductor of the Boston Symphony, the late Pierre Monteux.

"He told me this job needed two orchestras and three conductors," he said.

142

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 319,508 SUN. 566,562

JAN 28 1968

Szell's 22 Years in Cleveland

Great Conductor Was Once a Candidate for St. Louis Post

By THOMAS B. SHERMAN

THE CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary under the leadership of George Szell, who has been its conductor for the last 22 years. No institution of its kind, in the United States or elsewhere, is better entitled to the admiration and support of the musical public. And no one person has done more to bring the orchestra to its present eminence than its conductor.

When it was founded in 1918 by Adela Prentiss Hughes it was a provincial orchestra with a modest program for the years ahead. Its parent organization, the Musical Arts Association, had been formed for the purpose of presenting symphonic music to the people of Cleveland and it was assumed at the time that visiting orchestras would offer the most attractive concerts.

The local supporters are no longer so modest. Many of them say flatly that Cleveland has the best orchestra in the United States. No such claim to eminence can be statistically supported, of course; but when a consensus develops, a matter of taste comes close to being a matter of fact.

THE CONSENSUS in this instance is not confined to concert goers of Cleveland. Wherever the orchestra has played within recent years, whether on the Eastern seaboard, the large cities of the Far West, the great festivals of Europe or the farther-lying musical centers of the Soviet Union, the response of press and public was the same. On a recent occasion I heard the orchestra play a program consisting of Schubert's Great C-Major Symphony, Rhapsodie Espagnole by Lalo and Moussorgsky's Khovantchina Overture. It was a masterly demonstration of virtuosity on the part of both orchestra and conductor.

The first move upward took place in 1933 when Artur Rodzinski succeeded Nikolai Sokoloff as conductor. Ten years later Rodzinski resigned and Erich Leinsdorf was brought in as his successor from the Metropolitan Opera where he began directing the Wagnerian repertory. Leinsdorf was succeeded by George Szell in 1946 and he has presided over the artistic policies of the Cleveland orchestra ever since.

At that time, Szell was already an artistic figure with an international reputation. He had started his musical career as a pianistic phenomenon when still a child. As he advanced in his profession, he attracted the attention of Richard Strauss, who appointed him to the conductorial staff of the Berlin State opera where he remained as Strauss's assistant for two years. On Strauss's recommendation he succeeded Otto Klemperer as principal conductor of the Strasbourg municipal theater. In fairly quick succession he was conductor of the court theater at Darmstadt, the municipal theater at Darmstadt and the Berlin State Opera.

SZELL BECAME DIRECTOR of the German Opera at Prague in 1929 and it was there that William Walter, manager of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, heard him when Walter was roving through Europe looking for guest conductors. So when Szell came to St. Louis as guest conductor in the seasons of 1930-31 and 1932, he had already acquired a reputation and a solid backlog of experience in the symphony and opera repertories. At that time he was 33 years old.

Szell's reception in St. Louis was mixed. The nay-sayers were not wholly wrong in deciding that he was not the best available man for the job of permanent conductor in St. Louis; but it is also true that his depth of musical learning was not completely appreciated. In any case, he was not engaged. He returned to Prague, conducted all over Europe, and when at the outbreak of World War II he was stranded in the United States, he repeated his European successes.

The American public knew him best as a principal conductor at the Metropolitan Opera, but the directors of the Cleveland Orchestra had thoroughly digested the "book" on his activities when they made a bid for his services. Getting his signature on a contract did not depend wholly on the offer of a generous salary. He wanted full control and available resouces for putting together the best qualified orchestra personnel that could be found in the musical world.

Aside from playing concerts of the best quality, Conductor Szell and his assistants have provided such a variety of services for the Cleveland public that the orchestra has achieved the status of a vital educational institution.

Audiences of more than 80,000 attend the children's concerts in Severance Hall in Cleveland and on tour. The orchestra chorus has presented such works at Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Verdi's "Requiem," and Haydn's "Mass in Time of War." The Children's Chorus made its debut with Britten's "Spring Symphony" in 1955 and is now a regular participant in special events.

THE CONDUCTOR'S workshops represent a further extension of the orchestra's educational program, as do the "New Music Program" and the Youth Opera week. Szell has an able corps of lieutenants, headed by Assistant Conductor Louis Lane, and he needs them because the orchestra operates on a year-around basis.

In the past the summer season has been devoted largely to a "Pops" concert series played in a downtown auditorium. In the summer ahead, however, the number of "Pops" will be reduced in order to clear the way for the six-week Festival season to be inaugurated at the newly created Blossom Music Center. This summer home for the orchestra is situated on the high eastern bluff of the Cuyahoga River Valley just north of Akron.

THE SHELL is being placed in a natural amphitheater 400 feet in diameter, and it has been named for a family whose members have long been patrons of the orchestra. The site lies within a 35-minute driving distance from Cleveland and Akron. The Blossom Center is being built at a cost of $4,000,000. An additional $2,000,000 is being raised for operating costs of the center. The budget for the main season in Severance Hall has approximated $2,600,000. Fifty per cent of this cost is earned at the box office, 30 per cent is derived from endowment, and the rest from yearly gifts.

As the figures show, the public honors a distinguished orchestra and a world famous conductor by supporting them as well as praising them. A few members of the supporting group are convinced they could do better if Severance Hall were larger; but in the same breath they acknowledge the prime advantages of an intimate and beautiful auditorium where a 1800 capacity audience feels close to the music and enjoys a clean and resonant sound.

As for George Szell, at age 70, he is in a position that might be regarded as psychologically precarious. He has attained his heart's desire — so where does he go from there? For one thing, he is going to New York in 1969 to replace the retiring Leonard Bernstein as artistic director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. This is only an interim commitment which will last until the Philharmonic has chosen Bernstein's successor. Szell will retain his post in Cleveland. In his belief, there is none better.

Blossom Music Center, the $4,000,000 summer home of the Cleveland Orchestra, is shown in an architect's drawing. It is to be ready this summer.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

JAN 14 1968

New England Newsclip

Why Leinsdorf Is Leaving Hub Podium

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

For 28 years after Erich Leinsdorf first came to the United States he divided his time between conducting opera and symphony orchestras.

Five years ago, he gave up a brilliant career as conductor and musical consultant at the Metropolitan Opera to assume duties as music director of the Boston Symphony.

He had conducted the Cleveland Orchestra in 1943 and the Rochester Philharmonic from 1947 to 1956. He has little to say about the latter.

If Leinsdorf's recently announced resignation from the Boston Symphony does become effective with the final Berkshire Festival concert, in August, 1969, he will have had the fourth longest tenure as conductor of that orchestra since it was founded in 1881. Leinsdorf is the 11th conductor.

The others are William Gericke (1898-1906); Serge Koussevitzky (1924-1949); and Charles Munch (1949-1962).

Although little has been made of it, Leinsdorf has agreed to remain as conductor of the Boston Symphony until the end of the 1970 Tanglewood season.

He will do this if the trustees have not found a successor by a year from now. And the trustees will have to guarantee a severe reduction in conducting duties.

Besides expressing his willingness to extend his resignation date to 1970, Leinsdorf has also agreed to appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for at least five years after termination of his contract.

Why the resignation?

Great Enthusiasm

Leinsdorf began his duties with the Boston Symphony with great enthusiasm. After signing the contract in 1962 and discussing policy with the trustees, he made this statement:

"Whatever came up, the musical necessity had its way. From having seen musical organizations abroad and in this country, this is rare. As I don't know all musical organizations I cannot in fairness say that it is unique, but I have a suspicion it is unique. I am going to do my very best to keep it this way."

The summary reason given for Leinsdorf's resignation is "the heavy load of concerts, rehearsals, recordings and musical planning, connected with the regular winter season and at Tanglewood."

Music

But the start of Leinsdorf's decision was made his first year.

In his own words:

"I first broached the subject of overwork to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, four years ago, having learned by then that conducting between 80 and 100 concerts during the winter season of seven months, plus recordings and rehearsals was too much."

Leinsdorf goes on to say:

"The duty of the music director of the Boston Symphony is further complicated through planning the entire Berkshire Festival season, conducting 17 or 18 different programs each summer, and the active directorship of the Berkshire Music Center, which was personally asked of me by Mr. Cabot."

Since Koussevitzky founded the Center in 1940, it has been generally assumed that the conductor of the Boston Symphony would also direct the center.

Leinsdorf is candid about artistic and administrative functions of a conductor. His opinions have direct bearing on his resignation.

"I am a person — and that may be a very personal trait of mine — who views the music directorship as much more than merely choosing programs and conducting them," he says. "To me there is a complete interdependence of all artistic and administrative decisions, each musical decision affecting finance and administration, and each administrative decision affecting music."

(Last season, the Boston Symphony's total cost for salaries, administration, music transportation, upkeep, etc. was more than three million dollars.)

Leinsdorf repeatedly tried to live up to this policy by requesting of the Boston Symphony trustees that they engage more guest conductors.

"In asking for a reduction of conducting duties," he states, "I followed the advise of my physician.

"The subject has come up regularly," he adds, "and came to a head last June when I actually mentioned the word 'resignation' to the president of the trustees."

It is also the policy of the Boston Symphony to engage fewer guest soloists than most of the other major orchestras and to rely more heavily upon the orchestra and its conductor.

Besides the lack of what he considers adequate assistance with his conducting duties, Leinsdorf also takes exception to the use he has felt required to make of vacation periods.

He says that although several yearly vacation periods were allowed, they were "taken up by the necessity to search for new or rarely heard works, for studying scores and for a minimum of guest conducting abroad."

Guest appearances abroad he declares to be "an activity which I believe essential for any conductor who wishes to broaden his musical horizons and keep abreast of musical trends elsewhere."

Contrary to some published reports, there was no backstage elation when Leinsdorf's resignation was announced to the orchesta members by Cabot.

1AB

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 180,833 SUN. 186,074

JAN 7 1968

The World Of Music

Major Orchestras Seek Directors

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

AS WE ENTER a new year, the musical world in America faces one of its greatest problems in decades, and this time it has comparatively little to do with money. In fact the problem—artistically speaking — is much more important than money, for its ultimate solution may change the whole pattern of American symphony orchestras.

The problem sounds simple enough: It is the forthcoming retirement of the music directors of several major orchestras. The news of their going came with speed and a vengeance. Leonard Bernstein to leave the New York Philharmonic, Eric Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony, Jean Martinon, the Chicago orchestra.

Rumors persist that Eugene Ormandy, now 67, is looking for an easier schedule — this despite a recent long-term contract for the orchestra to start recording again for RCA Victor after many years with Columbia. William Steinberg of the Pittsburgh Orchestra already has a major assignment with the New Yorkers, as has George Szell of Cleveland.

★ ★ ★

Now, there is no dearth of qualified conductors in this world, yet these major orchestras, perhaps the best in the world, demand such all-compassing creatures in the conductorial position that the choice will be difficult and involved. It will create a chain reaction that will affect many other orchestras here and possibly abroad.

For every time someone moves, the game of musical chairs begins: every time a chair is filled, another is emptied. Self-anointed prophets in the business are having the time of their lives these days listing names and giving reasons why one of their favorites should be in one or the other chair. But, like in a presidential election, the prophets are a dime a dozen and more often than not, dead wrong. In the meantime, the guessing game is fun. I propose to mention no names, no candidates, but rather to seek an over-all answer to the problem.

The music director of a major orchestra, even of a minor one, is not just another cog, albeit a major one, in a complex machine. His knowledge and his experience, his ability to capture the imagination of both the orchestra and the public, his knack of making programs that please and educate, to set and hold standards, to live within what is always an insufficient budget, to bring in guests and soloists and new works, to add polish and glamour to all his doings, to expand the horizon of both his orchestra and his listeners, to add to the cultural level of his community and via recordings—one source of a considerable income with these major orchestras—to the international community — these are but some of the demands, obligations, and expectations from a conductor.

★ ★ ★

I haven't mentioned talent, because I take this most essential ingredient for granted. Without talent, there is no conductor, but simply someone up front. I haven't mentioned stamina, sheer physical strength, because it represents a problem all by itself. Not only the musicians, now that more orchestras are going into year-round seasons, but the conductor, too, needs time off — if for no other reason than to relax — while studying new works and perhaps getting a chance to read and to think.

A hundred or so concerts in a 31-week winter season, plus at least 20 recording sessions, plus some 20 summer programs — this is incidentally the Boston Symphony conductor's contractual obligation—isn't the easiest of tasks. A youthful vigor is a basic requirement which does not always come with youth, per se.

Szell, Ormandy, Leinsdorf, Steinberg — none of them 16 or 30 years old — have the stamina but there is also a point of no return. To go without relief all year is simply impossible and particularly so in music, where a degree of spontaneity adds zest to the doings. There is also the matter of saturation. Every conductor is expected to have a wide standard repertory, yet is expected to mount new works, or at least lesser known works.

The planning and preparation for all this is not a matter of hours, but a matter of around-the-clock involvement. Add to this the limelight, the intricate dealings with the personnel of an orchestra, a federation of prima donnas, most of whom always know better, and with the executives of the orchestra (no less prima donnas when it comes to the business end of things), the glass house existence, the public invasion of privacy, the microscopy of the critics—it isn't a job for the merely competent musican, but rather for an administrator - musician-personality-actor - conductor-psychologist-star.

★ ★ ★

The situation of the conductor is further eroded, as management and union increase their say-so over artistic policy, which includes getting rid of musicians who prove incompetent or insubordinate.

As a ball team needs a captain, so an orchestra requires a conductor. And if some of the things he does are capricious and arbritrary, consider what he produces. If you don't like how one pianist hunches over the keys, don't look — listen. With a conductor, of course, we do want a reasonably pleasant appearance and personality, for he fronts the band—and we are used to a packaged product.

In a way, though, we have exaggerated one aspect of the conductorial art: the glamour. A combination of virile good looks, stage presence with accommodating characteristics, often a certain social posture, seem requirements greatly exaggerated today. I am not here referring to the complete absorption that made Toscanini distort his face, Bernstein dance a fandango, von Karajan imperiously rule the world.

I am talking about the stardust which surrounds the very, very young in the business. For example, the very able but quite over-rated Zubin Mehta rejected the New York Philharmonic position before it was even suggested that he was in the running. Many good conductors suffer by not having this sprinkle stuff, despite the fact that they have knowledge, experience, talent, musicianship and control. One name will not make an opera company, one star will not make a movie. The conductor's glamour alone will not pack Lincoln Center for long, even for a loyal and sophisticated audience such as New York, Boston, or Chicago offer.

★ ★ ★

Rumor has it that someone in Chicago suggested Karajan. The salary alone—the same rumors suggest an offer of $300,000—doesn't do it, either. A musical director needs to get out into the world, his guest conducting of other orchestras is as necessary to him as is breathing and for very obvious reasons. But what use is a high salary when there is little opportunity to enjoy it? Conducting—glamour aside—is hard, very hard work—physically, intellectually, spiritually.

Does it mean, then, that the basics are no longer enough? Other media have despoiled our tastes. We want to be excited, not merely satisfied, aroused, not merely intrigued, on an emotional binge, not merely effected, and so we want even orchestral music delivered to us neatly packaged by a showman.

There is nothing wrong with demanding a vibrantly alive conductor, but let's make sure it is still the musical product and not the packaging that does the trick. How many times have we said, "Tonight I am going to hear Toscanini or Stokowski," when even then we might have mentioned the orchestra involved or possibly one of the composers of the music to be heard?

★ ★ ★

Yet conductors are the first to realize that without a first-rate orchestral instrument, they are as helpless as they are useless. Their interdependence, their mutual respects and affection is based on basics, although there is a mystique in the bond between a conductor and an orchestra that defies definition and explanation.

A solution to the problem? Perhaps a form of divided or joint principal conductorships that will be able to handle a situation that rapidly demands drastic change. In the meantime, the guessing game continues for the men who have talent, musicianship, broad cultural background and interests, depth of repertory, catholicity of taste, ability to get along, stamina, good health, enthusiasm.

Anyone interested? Several positions are open. The salaries are high — and so are the headaches.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,508 SUN. 566,562

MAR 3 1968

American Conductors' Handicap

European Experience, Glamour Is Still Needed by Job Seekers

By THOMAS B. SHERMAN

A NUMBER OF top-ranking American orchestras will be operating with new conductors within the next year or two. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned his post at Boston, Leonard Bernstein is retiring temporarily from the New York Philharmonic, Jean Martinon is leaving Chicago, Joseph Krips is abandoning San Francisco to a younger conductor.

In several instances replacements have already been announced. Walter Susskind will conduct the St. Louis orchestra beginning next season and Seiji Ozawa will replace Krips. None of the newcomers to the American scene is likely to be a native American. The European-trained conductor will not only be given the call in the more important musical centers; he will also receive first consideration for lesser posts.

The main justification for such a preference is immediately evident. The European continent, which for musical purposes includes Great Britain, provides a complete apparatus for training young musicians in all aspects of conducting. The United States provides no such advantages.

In the municipal opera houses of Germany, Austria, Italy and in England to a lesser extent, the young conductor gets a laboratory training in symphonic, choral and operatic music. He also acquires a lustre, in the eyes of American audiences, that plain Americans cannot claim.

It is entirely possible that a well-trained young American, if given the chance, could offset the purely non-musical prestige that automatically accrues to a Hungarian, a German or an Italian. American boards of directors, however, are as nervous about audience reaction as a Broadway producer on opening night.

THE AMERICAN CONDUCTOR who reaches a podium in his own country by accident or through the momentary whim of an influential patron, must come on strong and make an immediately favorable impression. If he fails the first time around in the big cities, he may not get a second opportunity.

Leonard Bernstein came on strong. He made the most of an opportunity that arose when Bruno Walter was prevented by illness from conducting a Sunday afternoon program in New York. He has sustained his reputation ever since by any number of devices that dramatize his personality. He talks to the audiences, tells them that he and the soloist have disagreed about the interpretation of a concerto, writes Broadway shows, discourses on philosophy and poetry. He is a press department's delight because he is an unfailing source of publicity.

Fortunately for the American public, he is also a musical scholar and an inspired leader. And by now he is as impressive in Europe as in his own country and the musicians he works with have a deep respect for his musianship.

There is only one Bernstein. If there were ten such, the directors of the Boston, New York and Chicago Symphony orchestras would forget about Herbert von Karajan, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini or Georg Solti. As matters stand, however, one or more of these artists will undoubtedly take over three or more American posts within the next few years.

It is by no means certain that every one of these conductors would accept a permanent American post. All of them are so thoroughly publicized that any one can fill up a season with nothing but guest engagements. And such a career has its temptations.

A GUEST CONDUCTOR has no lasting effect on the discipline and quality of an orchestra. He has no administrative responsibilities and is not charged with the task of selecting personnel and maintaining an orchestra's playing standards. He comes in for a week or two, works with another man's orchestra, plays his concerts, picks up his check and moves on to the next station or perhaps to Switzerland.

If his performance is not wholly a success, the blame may be artfully shifted to the musicians he was forced to work with. More than one retreating or advancing conductor has called attention to the "unfortunate conditions" that prevail in the organization he is temporarily heading. If his reputation is big enough, he can't lose. As a member of the St. Louis orchestra once said: "If the concert goes well the conductor gets the credit; if it's a flop, the orchestra is blamed."

ASIDE FROM THESE manifestations of a sensitive and self-protecting ego that may be found in most conductors, the reliance on guest conductors is bad for several reasons. It operates against the attainment of an optimum efficiency and an individual orchestral style. Moreover, it tends to deflect the interest of an audience from the music.

Yet it is an expanding system in the United States and elsewhere, because the big orchestras play through the whole year. Erich Leinsdorf resigned from his Boston post because he could not endure such a back-breaking schedule.

One may be sure that his successor will not be required to observe the same schedule. And similar conditions will have similar consequences in New York, Los Angeles and any other city that presents a full year's program to its public.

A sensible alternative would be to divide the season in half with two conductors of equal rank and ability in charge of each. It is not a system that the incumbent conductor is likely to approve. He doesn't want to share his orchestra with a musician of equal rank. To suggest that he do so in the higher interest of music is to offer a counsel of perfection.

All of this being demonstrably true, it is unlikely that any important American orchestra will employ two "permanent" conductors of equal prestige; and even if such were attempted, there would not be enough qualified conductors to go around. Even as matters stand prestige conductors are in short supply. In fact, the supply grows shorter, and in an absolute sense, as the demand increases.

Karajan, Mehta, Solti, Davis and Ozawa are certainly able conductors but only a very young or an inexperienced member of the public would rank them higher than Toscanini, Walter, Beecham, Furtwaengler, Mengelberg, Klemperer or Weingartner —to mention the first names that come to mind.

The conviction that the training available to conductors in America does not produce the musicianly finish that once prevailed in Europe, does not provide a complete answer. The galaxy of great conductors even in Europe also suffers by comparison with the musicians who directed the great orchestras of the world in the early part of this century.

IT IS POSSIBLE that the public places too much emphasis on personality and that young artists who sense this attitude may be neglecting the harder but less obvious discipline of their craft. Unlike a soloist, a clever conductor can get through a performance when his knowledge of the score is superficial. He can conceal a memory lapse.

A great conductor, or even a conscientious man of ordinary talent, will not be influenced by the foibles of the public. But when the demand is greater than the supply, the standards of the craft are easily affected and the flashy operator may take advantage of such a situation.

A genius, of course, is subject to no rules and no precedents. But even geniuses may hesitate to enter the field if they are Americans who are conditioned to the fact that Europeans have a built-in advantage. They go to Europe, as did Lorin Maazel, to acquire a glamorous as well as a musical finish.

1A3

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 180,833 SUN. 186,074

JAN 7 1968

The World Of Music

Major Orchestras Seek Directors

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

AS WE ENTER a new year, the musical world in America faces one of its greatest problems in decades, and this time it has comparatively little to do with money. In fact the problem—artistically speaking — is much more important than money, for its ultimate solution may change the whole pattern of American symphony orchestras.

The problem sounds simple enough: It is the forthcoming retirement of the music directors of several major orchestras. The news of their going came with speed and a vengeance. Leonard Bernstein to leave the New York Philharmonic, Eric Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony, Jean Martinon, the Chicago orchestra.

Rumors persist that Eugene Ormandy, now 67, is looking for an easier schedule — this despite a recent long-term contract for the orchestra to start recording again for RCA Victor after many years with Columbia. William Steinberg of the Pittsburgh Orchestra already has a major assignment with the New Yorkers, as has George Szell of Cleveland.

★ ★ ★

Now, there is no dearth of qualified conductors in this world, yet these major orchestras, perhaps the best in the world, demand such all-compassing creatures in the conductorial position that the choice will be difficult and involved. It will create a chain reaction that will affect many other orchestras here and possibly abroad.

For every time someone moves, the game of musical chairs begins: every time a chair is filled, another is emptied. Self-anointed prophets in the business are having the time of their lives these days listing names and giving reasons why one of their favorites should be in one or the other chair. But, like in a presidential election, the prophets are a dime a dozen and more often than not, dead wrong. In the meantime, the guessing game is fun. I propose to mention no names, no candidates, but rather to seek an over-all answer to the problem.

The music director of a major orchestra, even of a minor one, is not just another cog, albeit a major one, in a complex machine. His knowledge and his experience, his ability to capture the imagination of both the orchestra and the public, his knack of making programs that please and educate, to set and hold standards, to live within what is always an insufficient budget, to bring in guests and soloists and new works, to add polish and glamour to all his doings, to expand the horizon of both his orchestra and his listeners, to add to the cultural level of his community and via recordings—one source of a considerable income with these major orchestras—to the international community — these are but some of the demands, obligations, and expectations from a conductor.

★ ★ ★

I haven't mentioned talent, because I take this most essential ingredient for granted. Without talent, there is no conductor, but simply someone up front. I haven't mentioned stamina, sheer physical strength, because it represents a problem all by itself. Not only the musicians, now that more orchestras are going into year-round seasons, but the conductor, too, needs time off — if for no other reason than to relax — while studying new works and perhaps getting a chance to read and to think.

A hundred or so concerts in a 31-week winter season, plus at least 20 recording sessions, plus some 20 summer programs — this is incidentally the Boston Symphony conductor's contractual obligation—isn't the easiest of tasks. A youthful vigor is a basic requirement which does not always come with youth, per se.

Szell, Ormandy, Leinsdorf, Steinberg — none of them 16 or 30 years old — have the stamina but there is also a point of no return. To go without relief all year is simply impossible and particularly so in music, where a degree of spontaneity adds zest to the doings. There is also the matter of saturation. Every conductor is expected to have a wide standard repertory, yet is expected to mount new works, or at least lesser known works.

The planning and preparation for all this is not a matter of hours, but a matter of around-the-clock involvement. Add to this the limelight, the intricate dealings with the personnel of an orchestra, a federation of prima donnas, most of whom always know better, and with the executives of the orchestra (no less prima donnas when it comes to the business end of things), the glass house existence, the public invasion of privacy, the microscopy of the critics—it isn't a job for the merely competent musician, but rather for an administrator - musician-personality-actor - conductor-psychologist-star.

★ ★ ★

The situation of the conductor is further eroded, as management and union increase their say-so over artistic policy, which includes getting rid of musicians who prove incompetent or insubordinate.

As a ball team needs a captain, so an orchestra requires a conductor. And if some of the things he does are capricious and arbitrary, consider what he produces. If you don't like how one pianist hunches over the keys, don't look — listen. With a conductor, of course, we do want a reasonably pleasant appearance and personality, for he fronts the band—and we are used to a packaged product.

In a way, though, we have exaggerated one aspect of the conductorial art: the glamour. A combination of virile good looks, stage presence with accommodating characteristics, often a certain social posture, seem requirements greatly exaggerated today. I am not here referring to the complete absorption that made Toscanini distort his face, Bernstein dance a fandango, von Karajan imperiously rule the world.

I am talking about the stardust which surrounds the very, very young in the business. For example, the very able but quite over-rated Zubin Mehta rejected the New York Philharmonic position before it was even suggested that he was in the running. Many good conductors suffer by not having this sprinkle stuff, despite the fact that they have knowledge, experience, talent, musicianship and control. One name will not make an opera company, one star will not make a movie. The conductor's glamour alone will not pack Lincoln Center for long, even for a loyal and sophisticated audience such as New York, Boston, or Chicago offer.

★ ★ ★

Rumor has it that someone in Chicago suggested Karajan. The salary alone—the same rumors suggest an offer of $300,000—doesn't do it, either. A musical director needs to get out into the world, his guest conducting of other orchestras is as necessary to him as is breathing and for very obvious reasons. But what use is a high salary when there is little opportunity to enjoy it? Conducting—glamour aside—is hard, very hard work—physically, intellectually, spiritually.

Does it mean, then, that the basics are no longer enough? Other media have despoiled our tastes. We want to be excited, not merely satisfied, aroused, not merely intrigued, on an emotional binge, not merely affected, and so we want even orchestral music delivered to us neatly packaged by a showman.

There is nothing wrong with demanding a vibrantly alive conductor, but let's make sure it is still the musical product and not the packaging that does the trick. How many times have we said, "Tonight I am going to hear Toscanini or Stokowski," when even then we might have mentioned the orchestra involved or possibly one of the composers of the music to be heard?

★ ★ ★

Yet conductors are the first to realize that without a first-rate orchestral instrument, they are as helpless as they are useless. Their interdependence, their mutual respects and affection is based on basics, although there is a mystique in the bond between a conductor and an orchestra that defies definition and explanation.

A solution to the problem? Perhaps a form of divided or joint principal conductorships that will be able to handle a situation that rapidly demands drastic change. In the meantime, the guessing game continues for the men who have talent, muscianship, broad cultural background and interests, depth of repertory, catholicity of taste, ability to get along, stamina, good health, enthusiasm.

Anyone interested? Several positions are open. The salaries are high — and so are the headaches.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 349,503 SUN. 566,562

MAR 3 1968

American Conductors' Handicap

European Experience, Glamour Is Still Needed by Job Seekers

By THOMAS B. SHERMAN

A NUMBER OF top-ranking American orchestras will be operating with new conductors within the next year or two. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned his post at Boston, Leonard Bernstein is retiring temporarily from the New York Philharmonic, Jean Martinon is leaving Chicago, Joseph Krips is abandoning San Francisco to a younger conductor.

In several instances replacements have already been announced. Walter Susskind will conduct the St. Louis orchestra beginning next season and Seiji Ozawa will replace Krips. None of the newcomers to the American scene is likely to be a native American. The European-trained conductor will not only be given the call in the more important musical centers; he will also receive first consideration for lesser posts.

The main justification for such a preference is immediately evident. The European continent, which for musical purposes includes Great Britain, provides a complete apparatus for training young musicians in all aspects of conducting. The United States provides no such advantages.

In the municipal opera houses of Germany, Austria, Italy and in England to a lesser extent, the young conductor gets a laboratory training in symphonic, choral and operatic music. He also acquires a lustre, in the eyes of American audiences, that plain Americans cannot claim.

It is entirely possible that a well-trained young American, if given the chance, could offset the purely non-musical prestige that automatically accrues to a Hungarian, a German or an Italian. American boards of directors, however, are as nervous about audience reaction as a Broadway producer on opening night.

THE AMERICAN CONDUCTOR who reaches a podium in his own country by accident or through the momentary whim of an influential patron, must come on strong and make an immediately favorable impression. If he fails the first time around in the big cities, he may not get a second opportunity.

Leonard Bernstein came on strong. He made the most of an opportunity that arose when Bruno Walter was prevented by illness from conducting a Sunday afternoon program in New York. He has sustained his reputation ever since by any number of devices that dramatize his personality. He talks to the audiences, tells them that he and the soloist have disagreed about the interpretation of a concerto, writes Broadway shows, discourses on philosophy and poetry. He is a press department's delight because he is an unfailing source of publicity.

Fortunately for the American public, he is also a musical scholar and an inspired leader. And by now he is as impressive in Europe as in his own country and the musicians he works with have a deep respect for his musianship.

There is only one Bernstein. If there were ten such, the directors of the Boston, New York and Chicago Symphony orchestras would forget about Herbert von Karajan, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini or Georg Solti. As matters stand, however, one or more of these artists will undoubtedly take over three or more American posts within the next few years.

It is by no means certain that every one of these conductors would accept a permanent American post. All of them are so thoroughly publicized that any one can fill up a season with nothing but guest engagements. And such a career has its temptations.

A GUEST CONDUCTOR has no lasting effect on the discipline and quality of an orchestra. He has no administrative responsibilities and is not charged with the task of selecting personnel and maintaining an orchestra's playing standards. He comes in for a week or two, works with another man's orchestra, plays his concerts, picks up his check and moves on to the next station or perhaps to Switzerland.

If his performance is not wholly a success, the blame may be artfully shifted to the musicians he was forced to work with. More than one retreating or advancing conductor has called attention to the "unfortunate conditions" that prevail in the organization he is temporarily heading. If his reputation is big enough, he can't lose. As a member of the St. Louis orchestra once said: "If the concert goes well the conductor gets the credit; if it's a flop, the orchestra is blamed."

ASIDE FROM THESE manifestations of a sensitive and self-protecting ego that may be found in most conductors, the reliance on guest conductors is bad for several reasons. It operates against the attainment of an optimum efficiency and an individual orchestral style. Moreover, it tends to deflect the interest of an audience from the music.

Yet it is an expanding system in the United States and elsewhere, because the big orchestras play through the whole year. Erich Leinsdorf resigned from his Boston post because he could not endure such a back-breaking schedule.

One may be sure that his successor will not be required to observe the same schedule. And similar conditions will have similar consequences in New York, Los Angeles and any other city that presents a full year's program to its public.

A sensible alternative would be to divide the season in half with two conductors of equal rank and ability in charge of each. It is not a system that the incumbent conductor is likely to approve. He doesn't want to share his orchestra with a musician of equal rank. To suggest that he do so in the higher interest of music is to offer a counsel of perfection.

All of this being demonstrably true, it is unlikely that any important American orchestra will employ two "permanent" conductors of equal prestige; and even if such were attempted, there would not be enough qualified conductors to go around. Even as matters stand prestige conductors are in short supply. In fact, the supply grows shorter, and in an absolute sense, as the demand increases.

Karajan, Mehta, Solti, Davis and Ozawa are certainly able conductors but only a very young or an inexperienced member of the public would rank them higher than Toscanini, Walter, Beecham, Furtwaengler, Mengelberg, Klemperer or Weingartner —to mention the first names that come to mind.

The conviction that the training available to conductors in America does not produce the musicianly finish that once prevailed in Europe, does not provide a complete answer. The galaxy of great conductors even in Europe also suffers by comparison with the musicians who directed the great orchestras of the world in the early part of this century.

IT IS POSSIBLE that the public places too much emphasis on personality and that young artists who sense this attitude may be neglecting the harder but less obvious discipline of their craft. Unlike a soloist, a clever conductor can get through a performance when his knowledge of the score is superficial. He can conceal a memory lapse.

A great conductor, or even a conscientious man of ordinary talent, will not be influenced by the foibles of the public. But when the demand is greater than the supply, the standards of the craft are easily affected and the flashy operator may take advantage of such a situation.

A genius, of course, is subject to no rules and no precedents. But even geniuses may hesitate to enter the field if they are Americans who are conditioned to the fact that Europeans have a built-in advantage. They go to Europe, as did Lorin Maazel, to acquire a glamorous as well as a musical finish.

144

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

APR 26 1968 New England Newsclip

About That Podium . . .

By Peter M. Knapp

The appointment of William Steinberg as interim music director does not end the Boston Symphony's quest for a permanent conductor. It buys more time for that search, meanwhile assuring the orchestra of a steady, experienced hand on the helm part of the time.

Steinberg's appointment is for a three-year period, effective with the 1969-1970 winter season when Erich Leinsdorf's resignation falls due. He will be a part-time conductor in Boston, sharing his time with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra whose music director he has been since 1952.

Steinberg will conduct about half the Boston winter season concerts and also will lead the orchestra at a number of Tanglewood programs. This arrangement thus means a good deal of guest leadership, among whom will be Leinsdorf. From these guest conductors the Boston Symphony will choose a permanent leader.

Who And How Many?

Although Boston is fortunate to be given additional time in its search for a permanent man — or will it be two conductors sharing responsibilities in a tremendous workload? — Steinberg's appointment by its very nature will leave the BSO in a state of flux over the next few years.

Because of a scarcity of oustanding conductors, let alone great ones, the prominent baton-wielders are over-committed and generally reluctant to be tied down to one orchestral post. They can pick and choose among guest-conducting offers from the world's best orchestras; several hold dual positions as will Steinberg.

Part-time leadership is not healthy for any orchestra over any long period of time. At least Boston is lucky to have a conductor of Steinberg's talents. But an arrangement in which there is a troop of guests mounting the podium leads to a situation in which it is difficult for any one of them to establish firm rapport with the players, let alone develop a continuity of musical development.

Given the scarcity of top conductors, however, orchestral trustees are in a bind. Both the Chicago and New York symphony orchestras have appointed interim directors as they look for permanent directors. The New York Philharmonic will share George Szell, director of the Cleveland Orchestra, in much the same setup as Boston's with Steinberg.

There is the older generation of top conductors, represented by such distinguished leaders as Steinberg, 68, and Szell, 70, and the youngsters — brilliantly talented but some considered not yet experienced enough to be given the vast responsibilities of a major orchestra. They include Seiji Ozawa, Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, Istvan Kertesz, Colin Davis, Claudio Ahbado, Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos. Yet even with their lack of seasoning, these young men also are in a "seller's market," jetting across oceans and continents to fill major engagements and holding down major musical chairs elsewhere.

WILLIAM STEINBERG
. . . in the meantime

Generation Gap Again

The big orchestras, then, will have to choose between the older, established generation, or between the energetic youngsters — if they can be persuaded to be tied down in one spot.

Steinberg's appointment is in the Boston Symphony's Germanic meat-and-potatoes tradition that has only occasionally been broken. He is an accomplished, respected musician, a fine technician, generally conservative, unlikely to lead the Boston Symphony in new directions. A large bulky man, concise in gestures, precise in his demands, Steinberg can be expected to produce performances of immaculate musicianship and order without showmanship and without the white heat of emotion and excitement.

Boston is lucky to get him to fill in, but the BSO will have to find new, permanent and vital musical leadership if it is not to drift in the years ahead.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Steinberg To Direct Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — William Steinberg, 68, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed interim successor to Erich Leinsdorf as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was reported today.

Steinberg reportedly will direct the orchestra for three seasons beginning in the fall of 1969 but will not sever his connections with the Pittsburgh orchestra.

Leinsdorf, who joined the Boston Symphony in 1962, resigned last December effective in the summer of next year.

Steinberg will conduct the Boston orchestra for 12 weeks during its winter season

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Steinberg Is Reported Leinsdorf's Successor

BOSTON (AP) — William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra reportedly has been chosen to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 68-year old Steinberg reportedly will be given an interim appointment as music director beginning in the fall of 1969.

Leinsdorf, 55, announced four months ago that he will resign from his post with the BSO effective in the summer of 1969.

BSO officials and Steinberg were not immediately available for confirmation.

It was understood that the conductor will not sever his relations with the Pittsburgh Symphony when he is appointed director of the Boston orchestra.

Orchestra's Season

The BSO's season consists of 24 weeks in Boston and six weeks out of town. Steinberg, reportedly would have to conduct only 12 weeks out of the regular season, allowing guest conductors a chance to show their talent to BSO officials and the audience.

The BSO is the third major symphony orchestra in search of a permanent director. The Chicago Symphony is losing Jean Martinon and the New York Philharmonic is losing Leonard Bernstein.

Born in Germany

Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany, and became director of the Cologne Opera in 1924. He left Germany in 1933 because of his Jewish faith, in 1936 became director of the Palestine Symphony, now the Israel Philharmonic.

He came to the United States in 1938 and conducted the NBC Symphony. From 1945 until his Pittsburgh appointment in 1952, he conducted the Buffalo Philharmonic. From 1958 to 1960, he was music director of the London Philharmonic concurrent with his Pittsburgh duties.

William Steinberg

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 344,579 SUN. 740,523

APR 26 1968

For Music Lovers Here

'Sharing' Of Steinberg Is Blessing In Disguise

By CARL APONE
Music Editor

News of William Steinberg's taking over as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upset many music lovers here. They feared the move meant the beginning of the end for Dr. Steinberg here.

NEWS ANALYSIS

Now, however, in the quieter moments after the sound and fury, it becomes apparent that the City will derive many more blessings than tribulations from his actions. The blessings:

✔ Dr. Steinberg has silenced the ever-present fears that he will leave by agreeing to sign what amounts to a "lifetime" contract here. Beginning with the 1969-70 season, he will divide his services between Boston and Pittsburgh.

✔ Boston's determination to sign Dr. Steinberg again reminds local audiences that he is one of the top three or four conductors in the world.

✔ The action in Boston should help the local orchestra sell its records and add to its drawing power on tours. In the record department the reasoning would be: Why wait for Dr. Steinberg to record with Boston? He's available now with the Pittsburgh.

✔ Local audiences will have the opportunity to see more guest conductors during Dr. Steinberg's absences in Boston. European orchestras thrive on the guest conductor system. Audiences love the variety.

✔ It will be easier to get guest conductors here, such as Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, Carlo Maria Guilini, with Dr. Steinberg as music director of both Boston-Pittsburgh. He will be able to offer these conductors a package deal: four weeks in Boston and three in Pittsburgh. Under the present system we seldom offer conductors a package deal of several weeks.

✔ Dr. Steinberg is beloved by orchestra members here and many have said they would leave if he departed. His continued presence means a strong musical director will continue to maintain strong musicianship here.

The drawbacks will mean that the local orchestra will have added costs. Guest conductors don't come cheap. It's cheaper to get a conductor for the entire season than it is to hire guest conductors.

WILLIAM STEINBERG
'Silences' fears.

Four Concerts On Tour

Then, too, Dr. Steinberg will be conducting a few less Pittsburgh Orchestra programs here than usual, 16 weeks, four of them on tour. So in contrast to the 12 we will get in 1969-70 we have had 15 to 16 weeks of his conducting.

The consolation here is that we shared Dr. Steinberg with the London Philharmonic and New York Philharmonic and it was satisfactory when you consider the alternative. Maurice Chevalier said he didn't mind old age when he considered the alternative—death.

Pittsburghers don't mind sharing Dr. Steinberg when you consider the alternative—his leaving.

Good conductors nowadays are hard to find. Chicago has searched one year without success. And, for this reason, in the future, George Szell and Andre Previn will be drawing paychecks from two orchestras, Szell from Cleveland and New York, Previn from Houston-London Philharmonic.

Dr. Steinberg long has maintained that Pittsburgh is one of the finest music cities in the nation. Local people have shown their loyalty and now he has shown his by remaining here.

But people in this day and age who think a man should retire at age 65 may ask what good is a lifetime contract from a man 68? Well, the rule of thumb here is that conductors don't really learn to interpret Mozart until they are 70. Pierre Monteaux, Leopold Stowkowski, Arturo Toscanini and Bruno Walter went strong in their 80s and George Szell is in his 70s.

Pittsburgh Fared Well

So Pittsburgh did very well in the Boston-Pittsburgh pact, but how would you like to be Henry Cabot Lodge, president of the Boston Orchestra, in this situation? Erich Leinsdorf stepped down in Boston because of overwork (he said) so the Lodges turn around and, in what would seem a two-faced deal, hire Dr. Steinberg and give him half the load.

Actually, critics, patrons and record buyers were cool toward Leinsdorf. Boston record sales, for example, fell off badly during his reign. So when Erich left Boston Commons no one went riding around the countryside on horseback to arouse the people, and no one sounded an alarm by putting a lantern in the Old North Church steeple.

144

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

APR 26 1968 New England Newsclip

About That Podium . . .

By Peter M. Knapp

The appointment of William Steinberg as interim music director does not end the Boston Symphony's quest for a permanent conductor. It buys more time for that search, meanwhile assuring the orchestra of a steady, experienced hand on the helm part of the time.

Steinberg's appointment is for a three-year period, effective with the 1969-1970 winter season when Erich Leinsdorf's resignation falls due. He will be a part-time conductor in Boston, sharing his time with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra whose music director he has been since 1952.

Steinberg will conduct about half the Boston winter season concerts and also will lead the orchestra at a number of Tanglewood programs. This arrangement thus means a good deal of guest leadership, among whom will be Leinsdorf. From these guest conductors the Boston Symphony will choose a permanent leader.

Who And How Many?

Although Boston is fortunate to be given additional time in its search for a permanent man — or will it be two conductors sharing responsibilities in a tremendous workload? — Steinberg's appointment by its very nature will leave the BSO in a state of flux over the next few years.

Because of a scarcity of oustanding conductors, let alone great ones, the prominent baton-wielders are over-committed and generally reluctant to be tied down to one orchestral post. They can pick and choose among guest-conducting offers from the world's best orchestras; several hold dual positions as will Steinberg.

Part-time leadership is not healthy for any orchestra over any long period of time. At least Boston is lucky to have a conductor of Steinberg's talents. But an arrangement in which there is a troop of guests mounting the podium leads to a situation in which it is difficult for any one of them to establish firm rapport with the players, let alone develop a continuity of musical development.

Given the scarcity of top conductors, however, orchestral trustees are in a bind. Both the Chicago and New York symphony orchestras have appointed interim directors as they look for permanent directors. The New York Philharmonic will share George Szell, director of the Cleveland Orchestra, in much the same setup as Boston's with Steinberg.

There is the older generation of top conductors, represented by such distinguished leaders as Steinberg, 68, and Szell, 70, and the youngsters — brilliantly talented but some considered not yet experienced enough to be given the vast responsibilities of a major orchestra. They include Seiji Ozawa, Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, Istvan Kertesz, Colin Davis, Claudio Ahbado, Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos. Yet even with their lack of seasoning, these young men also are in a "seller's market," jetting across oceans and continents to fill major engagements and holding down major musical chairs elsewhere.

WILLIAM STEINBERG
. . . in the meantime

Generation Gap Again

The big orchestras, then, will have to choose between the older, established generation, or between the energetic youngsters — if they can be persuaded to be tied down in one spot.

Steinberg's appointment is in the Boston Symphony's Germanic meat-and-potatoes tradition that has only occasionally been broken. He is an accomplished, respected musician, a fine technician, generally conservative, unlikely to lead the Boston Symphony in new directions. A large bulky man, concise in gestures, precise in his demands, Steinberg can be expected to produce performances of immaculate musicianship and order without showmanship and without the white heat of emotion and excitement.

Boston is lucky to get him to fill in, but the BSO will have to find new, permanent and vital musical leadership if it is not to drift in the years ahead.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Steinberg To Direct Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — William Steinberg, 68, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed interim successor to Erich Leinsdorf as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was reported today.

Steinberg reportedly will direct the orchestra for three seasons beginning in the fall of 1969 but will not sever his connections with the Pittsburgh orchestra.

Leinsdorf, who joined the Boston Symphony in 1962, resigned last December effective in the summer of next year.

Steinberg will conduct the Boston orchestra for 12 weeks during its winter season

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,390

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Steinberg Is Reported Leinsdorf's Successor

BOSTON (AP) — William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra reportedly has been chosen to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 68-year old Steinberg reportedly will be given an interim appointment as music director beginning in the fall of 1969.

Leinsdorf, 55, announced four months ago that he will resign from his post with the BSO effective in the summer of 1969.

BSO officials and Steinberg were not immediately available for confirmation.

It was understood that the conductor will not sever his relations with the Pittsburgh Symphony when he is appointed director of the Boston orchestra.

Orchestra's Season

The BSO's season consists of 24 weeks in Boston and six weeks out of town. Steinberg, reportedly would have to conduct only 12 weeks out of the regular season, allowing guest conductors a chance to show their talent to BSO officials and the audience.

The BSO is the third major symphony orchestra in search of a permanent director. The Chicago Symphony is losing Jean Martinon and the New York Philharmonic is losing Leonard Bernstein.

Born in Germany

Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany, and became director of the Cologne Opera in 1924. He left Germany in 1933 because of his Jewish faith, in 1936 became director of the Palestine Symphony, now the Israel Philharmonic.

He came to the United States in 1938 and conducted the NBC Symphony. From 1945 until his Pittsburgh appointment in 1952, he conducted the Buffalo Philharmonic. From 1958 to 1960, he was music director of the London Philharmonic concurrent with his Pittsburgh duties.

William Steinberg

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 331,579 SUN. 740,523

APR 26 1968

For Music Lovers Here

'Sharing' Of Steinberg Is Blessing In Disguise

By CARL APONE
Music Editor

News of William Steinberg's taking over as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upset many music lovers here. They feared the move meant the beginning of the end for Dr. Steinberg here.

NEWS ANALYSIS

Now, however, in the quieter moments after the sound and fury, it becomes apparent that the City will derive many more blessings than tribulations from his actions. The blessings:

✔ Dr. Steinberg has silenced the ever-present fears that he will leave by agreeing to sign what amounts to a "lifetime" contract here. Beginning with the 1969-70 season, he will divide his services between Boston and Pittsburgh.

✔ Boston's determination to sign Dr. Steinberg again reminds local audiences that he is one of the top three or four conductors in the world.

✔ The action in Boston should help the local orchestra sell its records and add to its drawing power on tours. In the record department the reasoning would be: Why wait for Dr. Steinberg to record with Boston? He's available now with the Pittsburgh.

✔ Local audiences will have the opportunity to see more guest conductors during Dr. Steinberg's absences in Boston. European orchestras thrive on the guest conductor system. Audiences love the variety.

✔ It will be easier to get guest conductors here, such as Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, Carlo Maria Guilini, with Dr. Steinberg as music director of both Boston-Pittsburgh. He will be able to offer these conductors a package deal: four weeks in Boston and three in Pittsburgh. Under the present system we seldom offer conductors a package deal of several weeks.

✔ Dr. Steinberg is beloved by orchestra members here and many have said they would leave if he departed. His continued presence means a strong musical director will continue to maintain strong musicianship here.

The drawbacks will mean that the local orchestra will have added costs. Guest conductors don't come cheap. It's cheaper to get a conductor for the entire season than it is to hire guest conductors.

WILLIAM STEINBERG
'Silences' fears.

Four Concerts On Tour

Then, too, Dr. Steinberg will be conducting a few less Pittsburgh Orchestra programs here than usual, 16 weeks, four of them on tour. So in contrast to the 12 we will get in 1969-70 we have had 15 to 16 weeks of his conducting.

The consolation here is that we shared Dr. Steinberg with the London Philharmonic and New York Philharmonic and it was satisfactory when you consider the alternative. Maurice Chevalier said he didn't mind old age when he considered the alternative—death.

Pittsburghers don't mind sharing Dr. Steinberg when you consider the alternative—his leaving.

Good conductors nowadays are hard to find. Chicago has searched one year without success. And, for this reason, in the future, George Szell and Andre Previn will be drawing paychecks from two orchestras, Szell from Cleveland and New York, Previn from Houston-London Philharmonic.

Dr. Steinberg long has maintained that Pittsburgh is one of the finest music cities in the nation. Local people have shown their loyalty and now he has shown his by remaining here.

But people in this day and age who think a man should retire at age 65 may ask what good is a lifetime contract from a man 68? Well, the rule of thumb here is that conductors don't really learn to interpret Mozart until they are 70. Pierre Monteaux, Leopold Stowkowski, Arturo Toscanini and Bruno Walter went strong in their 80s and George Szell is in his 70s.

Pittsburgh Fared Well

So Pittsburgh did very well in the Boston-Pittsburgh pact, but how would you like to be Henry Cabot Lodge, president of the Boston Orchestra, in this situation? Erich Leinsdorf stepped down in Boston because of overwork (he said) so the Lodges turn around and, in what would seem a two-faced deal, hire Dr. Steinberg and give him half the load.

Actually, critics, patrons and record buyers were cool toward Leinsdorf. Boston record sales, for example, fell off badly during his reign. So when Erich left Boston Commons no one went riding around the countryside on horseback to arouse the people, and no one sounded an alarm by putting a lantern in the Old North Church steeple.

145

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

APR 26 1968

STEINBERG NAMED BOSTONIANS' HEAD

Job Starts in 1969 Season —To Keep Pittsburgh Post

BY THEODORE STRONGIN

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will also be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years starting with the 1969-70 season.

In separate announcements yesterday, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston's board of trustees, disclosed Mr. Steinberg's appointment and John Angle, president of the Pittsburgh, said that Mr. Steinberg had agreed to be director at Pittsburgh for an "indefinite number of seasons to come."

In Boston, Mr. Steinberg will succeed Erich Leinsdorf, who in December announced that he would resign because the orchestra's trustees had refused to reduce his workload.

Responsibilities Listed

In Boston, Mr. Steinberg, who is 68 years old, will provide over-all musical guidance and will conduct about one-half of the symphony's 30-week winter season.

He will also conduct some concerts at Tanglewood, the symphony's summer home in Lenox, Mass., but beyond that his duties at Tanglewood have not yet been determined. Mr. Leinsdorf directed the Tanglewood festival and school while he was music director of the Boston.

At Pittsburgh, Mr. Steinberg will also provide musical guidance — which includes choosing guest artists, selecting musicians for the orchestra and organizing programs — just as he has since he became music director in Pittsburgh in 1952.

Officials of the Boston Symphony would not say whether Mr. Steinberg's appointment was temporary, pending a search for a permanent conductor, or whether they would consider reappointing him at the end of three years.

Seymour Rosen, manager of the Pittsburgh Symphony, said yesterday that he expected Mr. Steinberg to stay with the Pittsburgh indefinitely, as the new agreement states.

In the Boston announcement, Mr. Cabot said that "we are delighted to have the benefit of Mr. Steinberg's wisdom, vast experience and renowned talent."

Mr. Leinsdorf, reached in Boston, said that he was very gratified "that the man who comes to Boston to take charge is not only an eminent musician but an old friend."

Mr. Steinberg was not available for comment yesterday.

HERALD (E)
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
CIRC. 15,450

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Pittsburgh Conductor for Boston Post?

BOSTON (AP)—William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a Boston newspaper reported today.

The Boston Globe's music critic, Michael Steinberg (no relation), said the 68 - year - old Steinberg will be given an interim appointment as music director beginning in the fall of 1969.

The Pittsburgh Post - Gazette also reported the appointment.

Leinsdorf, 55, announced four months ago that he will resign from his post with the BSO effective in the summer of 1969.

BSO officials and Steinberg were not immediately available for confirmation, the Globe said.

The newspaper said it is understood that the conductor will not sever his relations with the Pittsburgh Symphony when he is appointed director of the Boston orchestra.

The BSO's season consists of 24 weeks in Boston and six weeks out of town. Steinberg, the newspaper said, will have to conduct only 12 weeks out of the regular season, allowing guest conductors a chance to show their talent to BSO officials and the audience.

The Globe said the interim appointment is being made to help restore direction and morale to the orchestra while the search goes on for a permanent appointment.

The BSO is the third major symphony orchestra in search of a permanent director. The Chicago Symphony is losing Jean Martinon and the New York Philharmonic is losing Leonard Bernstein.

Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany, and became director of the Cologne Opera in 1924. He left Germany in 1933 because of his Jewish faith, in 1936 became director of the Palestine Symphony, now the Israel Philharmonic.

He came to the United States in 1938 and conducted the NBC Symphony. From 1945 until his Pittsburgh appointment in 1952, he conducted the Buffalo Philharmonic. From 1958 to 1960, he was music director of the London Philharmonic concurrently with his Pittsburgh duties.

SUN (e)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
CIRC. 12,400

APR 25 1968 New England Newsclip

Pittsburgh Conductor To Succeed Leinsdorf

BOSTON (AP)—William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a Boston newspaper reported today.

The Boston Globe's music critic, Michael Steinberg (no relation), said the 68-year-old Steinberg will be given an interim appointment as music director beginning in the fall of 1969.

The Pittsburgh Post - Gazette also reported the appointment.

Leinsdorf, 55, announced four months ago that he will resign from his post with the BSO effective in the summer of 1969.

BSO officials and Steinberg were not immediately available for confirmation, the Globe said.

The newspaper said it is understood that the conductor will not sever his relations with the Pittsburgh Symphony when he is appointed director of the Boston orchestra.

The BSO's season consists of 24 weeks in Boston and six weeks out of town. Steinberg, the newspaper said, will have to conduct only 12 weeks out of the regular season, allowing guest conductors a chance to show their talent to BSO officials and the audience.

The Globe said the interim appointment is being made to help restore direction and morale to the orchestra while the search goes on for a permanent appointment.

The BSO is the third major symphony orchestra in search of a permanent director. The Chicago Symphony is losing Jean Martinon and the New York Philharmonic is losing Leonard Bernstein.

Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany, and became director of the Cologne Opera in 1924. He left Germany in 1933 because of his Jewish faith, in 1936 became director of the Palestine Symphony, now the Israel Philharmonic.

He came to the United States in 1938 and conducted the NBC Symphony. From 1945 until his Pittsburgh appointment in 1952, he conducted the Buffalo Philharmonic. From 1958 to 1960, he was music director of the London Philharmonic concurrently with his Pittsburgh duties.

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 344,579 SUN. 740,523

APR 25 1968

Dual Role With City

Boston Symphony To Share Steinberg

AGE O

Dr. William Steinberg will become the new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and will sign a new contract with the Pittsburgh Symphony making him music director for an indefinite number of seasons.

He was to announce this afternoon that he will sign a three-year contract with Boston giving him full control of all music policy and conducting there.

The announcement was to be made simultaneously in Pittsburgh by John Angle, Symphony Society, and in Boston by Henry Cabot, president of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony.

His new contract in Pittsburgh will begin in 1969 when his present one expires.

Dr. Steinberg will replace the Boston Symphony's present music director, Eric Leinsdorf.

Dr. Steinberg will accept no other guest conducting engagements.

According to the Pittsburgh Symphony Society, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be under his direction for 15 weeks of the winter season and some of the summer concerts at the Tanglewood Music Festival."

A Society spokesman said that Dr. Steinberg would conduct the Pittsburgh Symphony in about half of its local concerts as well as almost all of its touring concerts.

The new contract puts him in charge of two of America's most highly regarded symphony orchestras.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

APR 26 1968

Steinberg Guest of Philharmonic

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

We may have imagined that William Steinberg, currently guest conductor of the N. Y. Philharmonic, smiled more — and more quizzicallythan usual last night—on and off the podium to lead Mozart's five-minute Overture to "The Impresario;" the first local performance of Robert Starer's 12-minute "Samson Agonistes;" and Mahler's 60-minute Symphony No. 10 in F-Sharp Major, left unfinished at the composer's death, and completed in this version by Deryck Cooke.

The cat was out of the bag though few probably in the audience at Philharmonic Hall knew it.

After Erich Leinsdorf had resigned as the Boston Symphony's music director, primarily because of too heavy a work load, Steinberg was announced yesterday to replace him starting 1969-70. The big surprise is that he will also keep his present job too—music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Thus, at least for the three-year duration of the Boston contract Steinberg has agreed to live simultaneously in two musical forts each armed by its instruments and the bewildering entourage of ideas emotions conflicts and staggering activity that directorship of two major American orchestras involves. George Szell's commitment as Music Advisor to the N. Y. Philharmonic when Leonard Bernstein leaves as music director doesn't carry with it anything like the load of Steinberg's announced responsibilities.

Brilliant Intellect

Obviously Steinberg will not lead as many concerts as Leinsdorf did and he will not take over all of the latter's activities at Tanglewood but still—Steinberg for all his brilliant intellect and his veritable passion for challenge; his astounding capacity for the maestro's proverbial blend of punishment and ecstacy called work; for his special brand of musical courage—still at 70 which he will be then, will be assuming a staggeringly weighted dual musical life.

Our Debt to Cooke

But what of the concert last night which Steinberg will repeat three times, (final performance, Monday.)?

Starer's "Samson Agonistes" is a revised version of a dance work he originally wrote for Martha Graham in 1961 called "Visionary Recital." The subsequent title for the independent concert version became the present one, and in 1963 the composer completely rewrote the score for concert purposes. It blends various techniques for an arrestingly dissonant result, the music punctuated by several dance rhythms which show its origin. The title relates not to the external Samson, but represents "man in the widest sense," and his conflict between strength and weakness.

The composition is more appealing rhythmically than melodically, but it is brilliantly put together with just the proper interaction between repetition and contrast to sustain interest. The composer was present and took several bows.

We are greatly in debt to Cooke for his painstaking reconstruction of this magnificent final testimony to Mahler's genius. Steinberg, long eminent as a dedicated Mahlerite, gave the symphony a sharply outlined, dynamic interpretation, less tragic in conception than Eugene Ormandy's when the latter first performed it here with the Philadephia Orchestra in 1965, but still validly Mahler, and convincingly Steinberg as well.

145

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,405 SUN. 1,491,701

APR 26 1968

STEINBERG NAMED BOSTONIANS' HEAD

Job Starts in 1969 Season —To Keep Pittsburgh Post

BY THEODORE STRONGIN

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will also be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years starting with the 1969-70 season.

In separate announcements yesterday, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston's board of trustees, disclosed Mr. Steinberg's appointment and John Angle, president of the Pittsburgh, said that Mr. Steinberg had agreed to be director at Pittsburgh for an "indefinite number of seasons to come."

In Boston, Mr. Steinberg will succeed Erich Leinsdorf, who in December announced that he would resign because the orchestra's trustees had refused to reduce his workload.

Responsibilities Listed

In Boston, Mr. Steinberg, who is 68 years old, will provide over-all musical guidance and will conduct about one-half of the symphony's 30-week winter season.

He will also conduct some concerts at Tanglewood, the symphony's summer home in Lenox, Mass., but beyond that his duties at Tanglewood have not yet been determined. Mr. Leinsdorf directed the Tanglewood festival and school while he was music director of the Boston.

At Pittsburgh, Mr. Steinberg will also provide musical guidance — which includes choosing guest artists, selecting musicians for the orchestra and organizing programs — just as he has since he became music director in Pittsburgh in 1952.

Officials of the Boston Symphony would not say whether Mr. Steinberg's appointment was temporary, pending a search for a permanent conductor, or whether they would consider reappointing him at the end of three years.

Seymour Rosen, manager of the Pittsburgh Symphony, said yesterday that he expected Mr. Steinberg to stay with the Pittsburgh indefinitely, as the new agreement states.

In the Boston announcement, Mr. Cabot said that "we are delighted to have the benefit of Mr. Steinberg's wisdom, vast experience and renowned talent."

Mr. Leinsdorf, reached in Boston, said that he was very gratified "that the man who comes to Boston to take charge is not only an eminent musician but an old friend."

Mr. Steinberg was not available for comment yesterday.

HERALD (E)
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
CIRC. 15,450

APR 25 1968

New England Newsclip

Pittsburgh Conductor for Boston Post?

BOSTON (AP)—William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a Boston newspaper reported today.

The Boston Globe's music critic, Michael Steinberg (no relation), said the 68 - year - old Steinberg will be given an interim appointment as music director beginning in the fall of 1969.

The Pittsburgh Post - Gazette also reported the appointment.

Leinsdorf, 55, announced four months ago that he will resign from his post with the BSO effective in the summer of 1969.

BSO officials and Steinberg were not immediately available for confirmation, the Globe said.

The newspaper said it is understood that the conductor will not sever his relations with the Pittsburgh Symphony when he is appointed director of the Boston orchestra.

The BSO's season consists of 24 weeks in Boston and six weeks out of town. Steinberg, the newspaper said, will have to conduct only 12 weeks out of the regular season, allowing guest conductors a chance to show their talent to BSO officials and the audience.

The Globe said the interim appointment is being made to help restore direction and morale to the orchestra while the search goes on for a permanent appointment.

The BSO is the third major symphony orchestra in search of a permanent director. The Chicago Symphony is losing Jean Martinon and the New York Philharmonic is losing Leonard Bernstein.

Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany, and became director of the Cologne Opera in 1924. He left Germany in 1933 because of his Jewish faith, in 1936 became director of the Palestine Symphony, now the Israel Philharmonic.

He came to the United States in 1938 and conducted the NBC Symphony. From 1945 until his Pittsburgh appointment in 1952, he conducted the Buffalo Philharmonic. From 1958 to 1960, he was music director of the London Philharmonic concurrently with his Pittsburgh duties.

SUN (e)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
CIRC. 12,400

APR 25 1968

New England Newsclip

Pittsburgh Conductor To Succeed Leinsdorf

BOSTON (AP)—William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a Boston newspaper reported today.

The Boston Globe's music critic, Michael Steinberg (no relation), said the 68-year-old Steinberg will be given an interim appointment as music director beginning in the fall of 1969.

The Pittsburgh Post - Gazette also reported the appointment.

Leinsdorf, 55, announced four months ago that he will resign from his post with the BSO effective in the summer of 1969.

BSO officials and Steinberg were not immediately available for confirmation, the Globe said.

The newspaper said it is understood that the conductor will not sever his relations with the Pittsburgh Symphony when he is appointed director of the Boston orchestra.

The BSO's season consists of 24 weeks in Boston and six weeks out of town. Steinberg, the newspaper said, will have to conduct only 12 weeks out of the regular season, allowing guest conductors a chance to show their talent to BSO officials and the audience.

The Globe said the interim appointment is being made to help restore direction and morale to the orchestra while the search goes on for a permanent appointment.

The BSO is the third major symphony orchestra in search of a permanent director. The Chicago Symphony is losing Jean Martinon and the New York Philharmonic is losing Leonard Bernstein.

Steinberg was born in Cologne, Germany, and became director of the Cologne Opera in 1924. He left Germany in 1933 because of his Jewish faith, in 1936 became director of the Palestine Symphony, now the Israel Philharmonic.

He came to the United States in 1938 and conducted the NBC Symphony. From 1945 until his Pittsburgh appointment in 1952, he conducted the Buffalo Philharmonic. From 1958 to 1960, he was music director of the London Philharmonic concurrently with his Pittsburgh duties.

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 344,579 SUN. 740,523

APR 25 1968

Dual Role With City

Boston Symphony To Share Steinberg

AGE O

Dr. William Steinberg will become the new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and will sign a new contract with the Pittsburgh Symphony making him music director for an indefinite number of seasons.

He was to announce this afternoon that he will sign a three-year contract with Boston giving him full control of all music policy and conducting there.

The announcement was to be made simultaneously in Pittsburgh by John Angle, Symphony Society, and in Boston by Henry Cabot, president of the board of directors of the Boston Symphony.

His new contract in Pittsburgh will begin in 1969 when his present one expires.

Dr. Steinberg will replace the Boston Symphony's present music director, Eric Leinsdorf.

Dr. Steinberg will accept no other guest conducting engagements.

According to the Pittsburgh Symphony Society, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be under his direction for 15 weeks of the winter season and some of the summer concerts at the Tanglewood Music Festival."

A Society spokesman said that Dr. Steinberg would conduct the Pittsburgh Symphony in about half of its local concerts as well as almost all of its touring concerts.

The new contract puts him in charge of two of America's most highly regarded symphony orchestras.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

APR 26 1968

Steinberg Guest of Philharmonic

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

We may have imagined that William Steinberg, currently guest conductor of the N. Y. Philharmonic, smiled more — and more quizzicallythan usual last night—on and off the podium to lead Mozart's five-minute Overture to "The Impresario;" the first local performance of Robert Starer's 12-minute "Samson Agonistes;" and Mahler's 60-minute Symphony No. 10 in F-Sharp Major, left unfinished at the composer's death, and completed in this version by Deryck Cooke.

The cat was out of the bag though few probably in the audience at Philharmonic Hall knew it.

After Erich Leinsdorf had resigned as the Boston Symphony's music director, primarily because of too heavy a work load, Steinberg was announced yesterday to replace him starting 1969-70. The big surprise is that he will also keep his present job too—music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Thus, at least for the three-year duration of the Boston contract Steinberg has agreed to live simultaneously in two musical forts each armed by its instruments and the bewildering entourage of ideas emotions conflicts and staggering activity that directorship of two major American orchestras involves. George Szell's commitment as Music Advisor to the N. Y. Philharmonic when Leonard Bernstein leaves as music director doesn't carry with it anything like the load of Steinberg's announced responsibilities.

Brilliant Intellect

Obviously Steinberg will not lead as many concerts as Leinsdorf did and he will not take over all of the latter's activities at Tanglewood but still—Steinberg for all his brilliant intellect and his veritable passion for challenge; his astounding capacity for the maestro's proverbial blend of punishment and ecstacy called work; for his special brand of musical courage—still at 70 which he will be then, wil be assuming a staggeringly weighted dual musical life.

Our Debt to Cooke

But what of the concert last night which Steinberg will repeat three times, (final performance, Monday.)?

Starer's "Samson Agonistes" is a revised version of a dance work he originally wrote for Martha Graham in 1961 called "Visionary Recital." The subsequent title for the independent concert version became the present one, and in 1963 the composer completely rewrote the score for concert purposes. It blends various techniques for an arrestingly dissonant result, the music punctuated by several dance rhythms which show its origin. The title relates not to the external Samson, but represents "man in the widest sense," and his conflict between strength and weakness.

The composition is more appealing rhythmically than melodically, but it is brilliantly put together with just the proper interaction between repetition and contrast to sustain interest. The composer was present and took several bows.

We are greatly in debt to Cooke for his painstaking reconstruction of this magnificent final testimony to Mahler's genius. Steinberg, long eminent as a dedicated Mahlerite, gave the symphony a sharply outlined, dynamic interpretation, less tragic in conception than Eugene Ormandy's when the latter first performed it here with the Philadephia Orchestra in 1965, but still validly Mahler, and convincingly Steinberg as well.

JACK BENNY'S CONCERT FEB 11th 1968

146

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
DEC 28 1967
New England Newsclip

BSO Invites Jack Benny To Appear

Erich Leinsdorf and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have invited well known violinist Jack Benny to appear with them at the annual winter Pension Fund concert on Sunday afternoon, February 11.

Pension Fund concerts, of which this will be the 143rd, are a major source of revenue for the Boston Symphony Pension Institution. The Institution annually pays out about a quarter of a million dollars to retired members of the Orchestra or their widows whose numbers are equal to the size of the present Orchestra.

Long one of this country's outstanding radio and television personalities, thirty-nine year old Jack Benny has in recent years enthusiastically performed as violin soloist with many symphony orchestras throughout the nation. For the February concert Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra will play the first half of the program prior to being joined by their guest soloist who will be making his debut with them. At the moment that portion is known only to Mr. Benny, but his encounter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is expected to provide a rare musical treat for those fortunate enough to obtain seats in Symphony Hall.

Further details on the sale of tickets and a complete program will be announced shortly.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
JAN 28 1968
New England Newsclip

JACK BENNY'S DEBUT WITH BSO ON FEB. 11

Jack Benny, the 39-year-old violinist, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Feb. 11 at 3 p.m. This musical happening will take place in Symphony Hall on the occasion of the orchestra's 143rd Pension Fund concert.

Tickets at $10, $8, $7, $6 and $5 for Jack Benny's personal encounter with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on sale at 10 a.m. tomorrow at the Symphony Hall box office. Many seats have already been sold to the orchestra's patrons and subscribers and to be assured of choice locations in Symphony Hall the public is urged to visit the Syphony Hall box office early. Mail orders should be made payable to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and enclosed with a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

For the first portion of the concert Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra will play an orchestral program and then Mr. Benny will come on the scene. From there on it is anyone's guess as to the outcome.

The celebrated 20th-century American violin virtuoso has indicated he will begin his part of the Pension Fund concert with Zigeunerweisen (Gypsy Airs) by the celebrated 19th-century Spanish violin virtuoso, Pablo de Sarasate. Mr. Benny will then launch into the first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and follow with a performance of Capriccio Espagnole by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

CELEBRATED ENTERTAINER Jack Benny, whose exploits as a violin virtuoso are legend has accepted the dare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be soloist at the Pension Fund concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 11.

The soloist has warned the conductor and orchestra to be prepared for anything. In answer to a question about encores Benny said: "Probably, if they're still able to accompany me!"

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400
JAN 14 1968
New England Newsclip

Symphony Pension Func Will Rise With Benny

(See Photograph on Page A 12)

Boston Symphony Orchestra wives were handed a bi project for the first event they have ever been invited to pla for the Orchestra Pension Fund.

They are responsible for the social and financial success o Jack Benny's guest appearance as soloist at the annual Bosto Symphony Pension Concert on February 11 at Symphony Hall It is under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Twice in last week's frigid weather the wives met in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall to do their ful share of committee duties. Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mrs. Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Henry B. Cabot are honorary chairmen. Mrs. Everett Firth and Mrs. Roger Voisin are working co-chairmen.

For the concert preferred seats in Symphony Hall are being reserved at $100 per person. Following the program patrons will join Jack Benny for cocktails and dinner at The Somerset Hotel. Closing date on reservations, limited to 200, is Jan. 20.

Listed among the patrons are Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Nelson S. Bartlett, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Mrs. William C. Cox, Mrs. James Farley, Miss Blance E. Eaton, Mrs. Peter D. Fuller, Mrs. Edwin H. Land, Mrs. Robert L. Moore, Mrs. William B. Moses.

Also Miss Penelope B. Noyes, Mrs. J. Guy Palmer, Miss Mary Parlett, Miss Amelia Peabody, Mrs. Edwin H. Pratt, Mrs. George R. Rowland, Miss Miriam Shaw, Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. Stephen Wheatland and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050
JAN 22 1968
New England Newsclip

Benny's visit to Symphony for free

By MARGO MILLER

Jack Benny holds the record for the longest laugh from a radio audience. In a skit with a hold-up man, all Jack did was pause to consider the demand, "Your money or your life!"

Now when a man has carefully nurtured a reputation as a skinflint, a reporter wants to know if Jack plays charity dates for free.

"For charity, yes," the answer came on the phone from the Beverly Hills office of Jac Productions. "Some people say I'm killing an image," the voice said, low, slow, considering.

The charity in question is the Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Sunday afternoon, Feb. 11. The event is billed as "Jack Benny Meets Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony." Or, if you prefer, "Super-Strad vs. The Big Band," for after halftime Jack is going to try the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto out on the Aristocrat of Orchestras.

No "Love in Bloom"? No "Love in Bloom." Benny was patient.

The Mendelssohn?

"That's the one that's best known, what I do with a strange orchestra."

Jack's old orchestras are the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia, the Chicago, Los Angeles, and his guiding maestros have included Bernstein, Steinberg, Szell, Wallenstein, Ormandy, Solomon and Mehta.

MAESTRO BENNY

And they have laughed all the way to the bank. A $65,000 gross in Chicago, Benny's home town.

"I consider Erich Leinsdorf one of the greats," said Benny of his new conductor.

Would the soloist care to comment on his own interpretation of the Mendelssohn?

"My performance is a little bit foreign. Outside of being conducted by Danny Kaye, when does an orchestra have any fun?"

The word around Symphony Hall is that Jack Benny is a pretty fair violinist. "He did the slow movement of the Bach Double with Stern, you know," says a wind player.

MILLER
Continued on Page 82

15

Skinflint' Jack has Feb. 11 date here

★ MILLER

Continued from Page 77

15

"The Bach is easy," said Benny serenely. The only 39-year-old violinist born on St. Valentine's Day 1894, Jack was the only player in knickerbockers in the pit of Waukegan's Barrison Theater.

He has worked up to Beethoven, Wienawski and the Rondo Capriccioso. And Zigeunerweisen, Sarasate's gyspy airs. And Capriccio Espagnol. But not all on one program. And not all the way through. Just the first movement of the Mendelssohn, for example.

That leaves time for podium conferences, a chat with the concertmaster, a visit with the audience and other pleasantries.

We've had it wrong all these years, you see. We think of Jack Benny as a guy who plays the violin a little but mostly talks. This misconception dates from World War I, when Jack enlisted in the Navy and was assigned to the Great Lakes Revue to raise money for Navy relief. Audiences discovered that Jack Benny could talk. His fiddle became a prop.

"I studied violin when I was a kid. I really had to go out and practice when I decided to do concerts." He still takes lessons, from "a good lady violinist, Gloria Chappell."

But Jack Benny's Feb. 11 date at Symphony is not his first appearance there."

"Years ago" — Symphony Hall says it was May 4, 1955 — "I was sitting at Pops. I just droped in. I had a lousy old suit on and I needed a shave. They called me up from the audience and we fooled around." Benny played "Chardis."

The maestro then was Harry Ellis Dickson, later known as Danny Kaye's conducting teacher. Benny was auditioned for the B.S.O. by orchestra manager Thomas D. Perry Jr., and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, who caught his act last Summer at Carousel.

And now in lieu of a commercial, this public service announcement:

The B.S.O. Pension Institute pays out about a quarter of a million dollars annually to retired players or orchestra widows. Tickets are $5, 6, 7, 8 and 10. The 200 big spenders who pay $100 apiece are invited to dine afterward with the soloist.

JACK BENNY'S CONCERT FEB 11th 1968

146

STAR
WORCESTER, MASS.
DEC 28 1967
New England Newsclip

BSO Invites Jack Benny To Appear

Erich Leinsdorf and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have invited well known violinist Jack Benny to appear with them at the annual winter Pension Fund concert on Sunday afternoon, February 11.

Pension Fund concerts, of which this will be the 143rd, are a major source of revenue for the Boston Symphony Pension Institution. The Institution annually pays out about a quarter of a million dollars to retired members of the Orchestra or their widows whose numbers are equal to the size of the present Orchestra.

Long one of this country's outstanding radio and television personalities, thirty-nine year old Jack Benny has in recent years enthusiastically performed as violin soloist with many symphony orchestras throughout the nation. For the February concert Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra will play the first half of the program prior to being joined by their guest soloist who will be making his debut with them. At the moment that portion is known only to Mr. Benny, but his encounter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is expected to provide a rare musical treat for those fortunate enough to obtain seats in Symphony Hall.

Further details on the sale of tickets and a complete program will be announced shortly.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 310,000
JAN 28 1968
New England Newsclip

JACK BENNY'S DEBUT WITH BSO ON FEB. 11

Jack Benny, the 39-year-old violinist, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Feb. 11 at 3 p.m. This musical happening will take place in Symphony Hall on the occasion of the orchestra's 143rd Pension Fund concert.

Tickets at $10, $8, $7, $6 and $5 for Jack Benny's personal encounter with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on sale at 10 a.m. tomorrow at the Symphony Hall box office. Many seats have already been sold to the orchestra's patrons and subscribers and to be assured of choice locations in Symphony Hall the public is urged to visit the Syphony Hall box office early. Mail orders should be made payable to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and enclosed with a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

For the first portion of the concert Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra will play an orchestral program and then Mr. Benny will come on the scene. From there on it is anyone's guess as to the outcome.

The celebrated 20th-century American violin virtuoso has indicated he will begin his part of the Pension Fund concert with Zigeunerweisen (Gypsy Airs) by the celebrated 19th-century Spanish violin virtuoso, Pablo de Sarasate. Mr. Benny will then launch into the first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and follow with a performance of Capriccio Espagnole by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

CELEBRATED ENTERTAINER Jack Benny, whose exploits as a violin virtuoso are legend has accepted the dare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be soloist at the Pension Fund concert at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 11.

The soloist has warned the conductor and orchestra to be prepared for anything. In answer to a question about encores Benny said: "Probably, if they're still able to accompany me!"

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 416,400
JAN 14 1968
New England Newsclip

Symphony Pension Func Will Rise With Benny

(See Photograph on Page A 12)

Boston Symphony Orchestra wives were handed a bi project for the first event they have ever been invited to pla for the Orchestra Pension Fund.

They are responsible for the social and financial success o Jack Benny's guest appearance as soloist at the annual Bosto Symphony Pension Concert on February 11 at Symphony Hall It is under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Twice in last week's frigid weather the wives met in the Ancient Instrument Room of Symphony Hall to do their ful share of committee duties. Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, Mrs. Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Henry B. Cabot are honorary chairmen. Mrs. Everett Firth and Mrs. Roger Voisin are working co-chairmen.

For the concert preferred seats in Symphony Hall are being reserved at $100 per person. Following the program patrons will join Jack Benny for cocktails and dinner at The Somerset Hotel. Closing date on reservations, limited to 200, is Jan. 20.

Listed among the patrons are Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Nelson S. Bartlett, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Mrs. William C. Cox, Mrs. James Farley, Miss Blance E. Eaton, Mrs. Peter D. Fuller, Mrs. Edwin H. Land, Mrs. Robert L. Moore, Mrs. William B. Moses.

Also Miss Penelope B. Noyes, Mrs. J. Guy Palmer, Miss Mary Parlett, Miss Amelia Peabody, Mrs. Edwin H. Pratt, Mrs. George R. Rowland, Miss Miriam Shaw, Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. Stephen Wheatland and Mrs. Oliver Wolcott.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050
JAN 22 1968
New England Newsclip

Benny's visit to Symphony for free

By MARGO MILLER

Jack Benny holds the record for the longest laugh from a radio audience. In a skit with a hold-up man, all Jack did was pause to consider the demand, "Your money or your life!"

Now when a man has carefully nurtured a reputation as a skinflint, a reporter wants to know if Jack plays charity dates for free.

"For charity, yes," the answer came on the phone from the Beverly Hills office of Jac Productions. "Some people say I'm killing an image," the voice said, low, slow, considering.

The charity in question is the Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Sunday afternoon, Feb. 11. The event is billed as "Jack Benny Meets Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony." Or, if you prefer, "Super-Strad vs. The Big Band," for after halftime Jack is going to try the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto out on the Aristocrat of Orchestras.

No "Love in Bloom"? No "Love in Bloom." Benny was patient.

The Mendelssohn?

"That's the one that's best known, what I do with a strange orchestra."

Jack's old orchestras are the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia, the Chicago, Los Angeles, and his guiding maestros have included Bernstein, Steinberg, Szell, Wallenstein, Ormandy, Solomon and Mehta.

MAESTRO BENNY

And they have laughed all the way to the bank. A $65,000 gross in Chicago, Benny's home town.

"I consider Erich Leinsdorf one of the greats," said Benny of his new conductor.

Would the soloist care to comment on his own interpretation of the Mendelssohn?

"My performance is a little bit foreign. Outside of being conducted by Danny Kaye, when does an orchestra have any fun?"

The word around Symphony Hall is that Jack Benny is a pretty fair violinist. "He did the slow movement of the Bach Double with Stern, you know," says a wind player.

MILLER
Continued on Page 82

15

Skinflint' Jack has Feb. 11 date here

★ MILLER

Continued from Page 77

15

"The Bach is easy," said Benny serenely. The only 39-year-old violinist born on St. Valentine's Day 1894, Jack was the only player in knickerbockers in the pit of Waukegan's Barrison Theater.

He has worked up to Beethoven, Wienawski and the Rondo Capriccioso. And Zigeunerweisen, Sarasate's gyspy airs. And Capriccio Espagnol. But not all on one program. And not all the way through. Just the first movement of the Mendelssohn, for example.

That leaves time for podium conferences, a chat with the concertmaster, a visit with the audience and other pleasantries.

We've had it wrong all these years, you see. We think of Jack Benny as a guy who plays the violin a little but mostly talks. This misconception dates from World War I, when Jack enlisted in the Navy and was assigned to the Great Lakes Revue to raise money for Navy relief. Audiences discovered that Jack Benny could talk. His fiddle became a prop.

"I studied violin when I was a kid. I really had to go out and practice when I decided to do concerts." He still takes lessons, from "a good lady violinist, Gloria Chappell."

But Jack Benny's Feb. 11 date at Symphony is not his first appearance there."

"Years ago" — Symphony Hall says it was May 4, 1955 — "I was sitting at Pops. I just droped in. I had a lousy old suit on and I needed a shave. They called me up from the audience and we fooled around." Benny played "Chardis."

The maestro then was Harry Ellis Dickson, later known as Danny Kaye's conducting teacher. Benny was auditioned for the B.S.O. by orchestra manager Thomas D. Perry Jr., and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, who caught his act last Summer at Carousel.

And now in lieu of a commercial, this public service announcement:

The B.S.O. Pension Institute pays out about a quarter of a million dollars annually to retired players or orchestra widows. Tickets are $5, 6, 7, 8 and 10. The 200 big spenders who pay $100 apiece are invited to dine afterward with the soloist.

147

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 240,000

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Role 'Dignified'

Comic Jack Benny Plays It Serious

By ROBERT M. SMITH

A surprisingly serious Jack Benny talked yesterday about his performance Sunday with the Boston Symphony for its annual Pension Fund concert.

Natty in a blue blazer with a powder blue ascot, Benny puffed on a seven-inch cigar as he explained what makes his celebrated violin playing so entertaining:

"You will see a fellow up there trying to play good. If I play lousy, I can't help it.

"I am not making fun of music . . . or of the violin. It's a humorous concert. I actually try to play well. It's kind of pathetic."

STRAIGHT MEN

The members of the Boston press who turned out for the news conference at the Sheraton Boston fed Benny what seemed the proper straight lines, but the answers were more often serious than comic.

They asked Benny, for example, whether he had ever thought of running for public office.

"No," he said. "In the first place, I don't know enough about politics.

He contrasted his unfamiliarity with politics with what he regards as his knowledgeability of Ronald Reagan. "Actors usually talk about either show business or airplanes," Benny said. "As long as I've known him ... Ronald Reagan would only discuss politics."

Benny said he thinks Reagan has a good chance of becoming president. He said he didn't know whether that would be a good thing or not.

Asked about Vietnam, Benny said, "There must be some reason" that we are there.

"If Harry Truman were younger," he observed at one point, "there'd be no Castro, no Vietnam. He'd just bomb the hell out of them."

Still serious, Benny said that if he had started the violin as a youngster and kept on with it, he "might be a very fine violinist." He added that he had just begun practicing 10 years ago and was now able to play concerts.

'IT WILL BE LOUSY'

On the other hand, he said, "My wife, Mary, says that if you could play pretty good, your concerts wouldn't be that good ... You're not good enough to be a Heifetz, and you wouldn't be bad enough (to be funny)."

Benny is scheduled to play Zigeunerweisen (Gypsy Airs) by Sarasate followed by the first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. There will also be a rendering of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnole. Erich Leinsdorf will be conducting.

"It'll be lousy," Benny said, "but every one will love it."

In the past several years he has made similar appearances with more than 60 orchestras across the nation.

"It's a thing that I enjoy more than all I do in show business," Benny said, "even though I don't get paid. "It's a very dignified background for a comedian, it doesn't fit any other comedian."

At one point, Benny confided that he has been in show business more than 55 years. He said he played the Keith's here when he was in his early twenties. But he said he has no intention of retiring.

Asked for the secret of his longevity, he said, "I'm old, but not that old." As a matter of fact, he said, he is "still 39" and "will be forever."

JACK BENNY
With King-Size (7-Inch) Cigar

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NYACK JOURNAL NEWS
Thursday, February 15, 1968

World's Oldest 39 Snubs 1 More Year

By CYNTHIA LOWRY

NEW YORK (AP) — The world's oldest 39-year-old man —or perhaps its youngest 74-year-old — had a birthday Wednesday, but he was much too busy to pay much attention to it.

"I say I'm 39," said Jack Benny with mock severity. "And anything else you want to guess is entirely up to you."

Jack was stopping over briefly in New York, en route from a concert with the Boston Symphony to a night club date in Miami. He will be one of the guest stars next Sunday in an NBC special saluting his home-state of Illinois, and he recently finished shooting a special comedy program to be shown on March 20, also on NBC. He is now busy polishing up some material for use during a four-week engagement in April at New York's Waldorf Astoria.

Even after a half century in show business, he still prefers the tensions and excitements of the theater.

"A few years ago when we were doing the television series we had a show in which I was finally going to celebrate my 40th birthday," Jack recalled. "Before we got it on the air, we started getting all sorts of mail and there were even editorials in important newspapers, all asking me not to do it. They said that 39 had become a symbol of youth and determination for many people, and they wanted me to stay 39.

"Well, it was too late to drop the show, so we went ahead and showed it. But then we dropped it, forgot it and I went back to being 39."

Benny wears his calendar years lightly. He maintains his enthusiasm for his musical and for playing in concerts. He practices the violin for a couple of hours daily, even when he is away from his Los Angeles home. And he works constantly over his comedy material.

Jack discussed the current use of controversial topical material and the injection of risque material into comedy routines.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,350

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Maestro of Comedy, Violin Ready for Benefit Concert

By NANCY LOWE GRAY
Of The Gazette Staff

BOSTON — The 74-year-old maestro of comedy, Jack Benny, still owning up to being 39, has a Stradivarius and will travel.

In town to bring his celebrated "fiddle" to the stage for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual Winter Pension Fund Concert tomorrow afternoon, Jack was in rare form.

He greeted the press and other news media nattily dressed in a navy blue jacket with brass buttons, a blue shirt with a deeper blue silk ascot and matching handkerchief in his breast pocket.

Discreet Toupee

The ageless comedian, who used a violin as a prop for his vaudeville, radio, movie and TV routines, is slim and has few lines in his face. If he wears a toupee, it's the discreet $500 type.

Jack Benny

It will be Benny's first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past 10 years, he has made similar appearances with more than 60 orchestras across the country, raising about $4 million for them.

Jack's penny-pinching image doesn't stand up for this work.

"Even though I don't get paid for them, the concerts are something I enjoy more than anything else in show business."

Leinsdorf to Conduct

With Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Jack Benny will play Zigeunerweisen (Gypsy Airs) by Sarasate followed by the first movement of Mendelssoh's Violin Concerto. There will also be a rendering of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnole.

Jack will be on stage about an hour.

The comedian has willed his "Strad" to the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. Jack says it is about 1724 vintage.

Ten years ago, he decided to give concerts. His first was at Carnegie Hall.

He's been in show business more than half a century.

"What do you mean did I ever play Worcester?" he quipped. "I played Worcester before any of you here were born."

Questions strayed to what he considered desirable in women.

Likes His Wife

"I like my wife, Mary, very very much," he said.

"Generally, I like women with strong faces and strong personalities. I also like talented women. Talent has a lot to do with sex appeal."

He cited Katharine Hepburn as a good example.

Jack's theme song, "Love in Bloom," is a song that he never particularly liked.

"It was just one of those things," he said.

Asked if he ever considered running for politics, Jack vetoed the thought.

"Take Ronald Reagan," he said. "For years, he discussed politics. At most parties movie stars used to discuss the industry and airplanes. Ronnie was the only one who went in for politics."

Too Much Criticism

He also said too many persons criticize the President.

"These are tough times to be a president," he continued. "If Vietnam is overrun by Communists, then Cambodia will be next and other countries, and we'll have a world war."

Golfing runs close to violin playing as his favorite pastime.

"My golf is as impossible as my violin playing," he said, with his famous deadpan delivery.

Energetic Jack has no idea of retiring and "spending the rest of my life in Palm Springs."

Next month, he has a TV special coming up, with Bob Hope, Lucille Ball, Johnny Carson and Danny Thomas.

His plans also include an appearance with The London Symphony, which will be televised in Great Britain.

148

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 413,250

FEB 10 1968 New England Newsclip

Jack Benny On The Other End Of The Camera, Puts On His Famous Dead-Pan Look At The Sheraton-Boston Hotel
Record American Photo, Kevin Cole

JACK' FOR-REAL CONCERT

Benny in Bloom For BSO Benefit

By GLORIA BOYKIN

Bouncy, bubbly Jack Benny tuned up his Strad at the Sheraton-Boston Hotel on Friday for his for-real concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon.

The maestro of "Love in Bloom" was his gay self as he announced dead-pan that he will render Mendelssohn's concerto for violin (as written) for the benefit of the BSO's pension fund. It will be his first appearance with the BSO, although he has played with 60 symphonies across the nation to raise some $4 million for the musicians.

His casual attire of dark blue sports jacket, light blue shirt and medium blue ascot was impeccable and formed a backdrop of his baby blues.

He said he has been in show business 55 years of his admitted age of 39.

"I DON'T GET PAID"

He talked mostly about the pension found concerts he has played and said: "Even though I don't get paid for them they are something I enjoy more than anything else in show business."

Has he thought of retiring, he was asked. "No, I used to think about it, but I came to realize I couldn't retire and spend the rest of my life in Palm Springs."

He fielded one question of his secret for living so long nad looking so young, with "What do you mean; I'm only 39." That shook up the interviewers.

He was asked if he had his druthers would he choose to be a serious violinist or a comedian. Again he was the straight man. "If right now such a thing as a miracle happened and God said 'Jack, I'll make you a great violinist, but you can't do any more comedy,' I think I would accept.'

He discoursed on politics by saying "I wouldn't enter a career like that because I don't knew enough about politics."

REAGAN HAS CHANCE

The ageless entertainer said he didn't know if his pal, Gov. Ronald Reagan, would make a good President. "But I do think he has a good chance of being President."

Also on the serious side Benny asked for more public sympathy for the President, saying "it's an awful tough position to be in."

That ended the interview and Benny strode from the room in the stride that is part of his trademark.

P. S. The SRO is out for the BSO and its fiddler.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 12 1968 New England Newsclip

Volpe & Benny Duo Strings Guests Along

They might not make it as minstrels in Old Sorrento, but as strolling musicians in Boston, Jack Benny and Gov. Volpe were a hit Sunday.

The governor and the veteran comedian gave an impromptu performance at a reception in the Louis XIV Ballroom of the Somerset Hotel that followed an appearance by Benny as a violin soloist at a benefit concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

While Benny sawed at his violin in the inimitable manner his fans expected, the grinning governor strummed vigorously at a guitar.

The songs were all Volpe's favorite Italian airs — "Oh Marie," "O Sole Mio," and "Arriverderci Roma."

The strolling bit was Benny's idea. "Follow me!", he said, and led the governor off for a brief circuit of one end of the ballroom.

When Volpe fumbled for a chord at one point, Benny arched a famous eyebrow and said—in the tone of mock-horror familiar to generations of fans—"some governor!"

"He plays very well," Benny said later, while packing up his $40,000 Stradivarius violin. The governor played on a more modest instrument. "They don't make Stradivarius guitars," he said.

Asked if his performance with Benny was a warmup for a possible political duet with presidential hopefuls Ronald Reagan or Richard Nixon, the governor grinned but didn't answer.

The Symphony Orchestra's performance, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, was for the benefit of the group's pension fund. The sellout concert grossed $28,500, the largest amount ever raised at a Boston Symphony Hall pension benefit.

In the last 11 years, Benny has raised more than $4.3 million for orchestras across the country through benefit appearances.

(Review of Symphony Hall performance on Page 16.)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Jack Benny's sure touch

One way to a man's purse is through his funny bone, and Jack Benny again has demonstrated that he knows the route by heart.

The $28,500 which his benefit performance grossed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund on Sunday afternoon is no laughing matter. That is hard, cold cash as is the $4.3 million he has raised for orchestras from coast to coast in 11 years.

But Mr. Benny is himself a great comic (and friend of good music) that he even got Gov. Volpe, Conductor Leinsdorf, Concertmaster Silverstein and most of the violin section to clown along with him like old pros.

Mr. Benny has just the right touch, and there is no need to excuse the pun. It is intended.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 58,900

FEB 13 1968 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Mr. Benny In Bloom

By Peter M. Knapp

They laughed when Jack Benny prepared to play the violin at Sunday's Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony. Benny had forgotten his bow.

The Symphony Hall audience kept on laughing as the popular comedian, making his debut with the Boston orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, gagged his way through a program of solos, banter and after-thoughts.

Heifetz, Milstein and Oistrakh are safe from Benny competition — as is the BSO's clarinetist, whom Leinsdorf suggested is a better fiddler than Benny, though he is yet to take his first lesson.

Actually, Benny can play presentably when he wants to, as he showed in a brief encore named "The Bee." And don't forget it takes skill to play such pungently sour notes close to true pitch but just enough off to be parody, or the frantically scrambled runs, the mock-heroic double-stopping, not to mention what must be the laziest glissando in the business.

Concert Clowning

It was all good clean satire, and the orchestra and Leinsdorf laughed as heartily as anyone at Benny's futile struggles with pitch, when he banished Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, then Assistant Concertmaster Alfred Krips and percussionist Thomas Gauger from the stage for intruding on his solos, and when Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" abruptly blossomed into Benny's trademark "Love in Bloom."

"What you've heard today is my best," the comedian declared, disavowing the idea he was purposely mauling the scores. He proudly displayed his instrument, "one of the few Strads made in Japan."

After sliding his way through the first movement (and cut at that) of Mendelssohn's Concerto in e minor, which seemed very minor indeed, Benny took the concertmaster's chair for Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnole" without either improving or damaging the orchestra's string section — even if he finished up a few bars late. Then he cracked up the orchestra with "impressions" of the mannerisms of four greater violinists — Tossy Spivakovsky, Szigeti, Stern and Heifetz.

The Other Half

Yes, there was a purely musical program, too, and it was splendidly performed by the orchestra. There were the high spirits of Rossini's sprightly overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" and a tautly dramatic reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The slashing unisons of the first few bars indicated the orchestra's state of precision in the Beethoven, and all sections contributed heroic ensemble work. The horns, in particular, were in good voice, except for an unfortunate flub in the finale.

Though Leinsdorf's pacing seemed hurried at the opening, his direction carried a good deal of power, grandeur and elucidation of detail. While Leinsdorf has dispensed with the risers, it is good to see he has moved the basses back where they belong near the celli, instead of lining them up behind the orchestra and thereby dispersing the lower voices.

The concert was the 143rd for the Pension Fund, the oldest such program among U.S. orchestras for retired musicians or their widows and probably the most generous. To mark the occasion, the musicians sported apricot-colored boutonnieres supplied by a group of subscribers from Milton headed by Mrs. Edward Watson, and Jack Benny donated his services.

JACK BENNY
. . . Boston Symphony solo

149

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 418,250

FEB 12 1968 New England Newsclip

TEAMS UP WITH LEINSDORF

Jack Benny Wows BSO

By MARY X. SULLIVAN

Violinist Jack Benny wowed them at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon with Comedian Erish Leinsdorf conducting. The audience had a ball, but no one had more fun than the members of the august Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pension Fund Concert of the

The occasion was the 143d BSO, for which Jack contributed his services, and it netted $28,581 for the performance. This brings to $4 million the amount raised by the perenially 39-year-old star of stage, screen and TV for pensions for musicians.

Jack gagged it up with skillful fingering and exquisitely off-key flourishes on the fiddle, to the delight of the audience, in a piece listed as ziegunerweisen by Sarasate although strains of "Love in Bloom" kept sneaking in. He took a violent dislike to the first violinist, turned that hurt, reproachable look on him and finally interrupted to whisper in Liensdorf's ear . . . whereupon the musician was banished to the wings.

The affair got off to a good start as Benny came on stage, bowing modestly from side to side, raised his violin . . . and found he had forgotten his bow. When he broke a few strings on the bow, instead of discarding them he furtively slipped them into his pocket.

He was serious for a moment when he described the BSO as one of the great symphony orchestras of the world and Leinsdorf as one of its three greatest conductors "and a damn good comedien," and semi-serious when he assured the audience that he is a frustrated concert artist and that he really was playing the best he knew how . . . which no one believed.

His second number was a Mendelssohn concerto, which our music critic will review elsewhere, and which was also laden with laughs. Between numbers, he told of celebrating his 41st wedding anniversary, which brought loud applause.

He surprised the musicians by interpolating impersonations of four great violinists which had them roaring and rocking with laughter. He recalled his radio feud with the great Fred Allen and the latter's quip: "When Benny plays the violin you'd think the strings were back in the cat." He talked of his genuine Stradivarius: "If it isn't genuine, I'm out $110."

Leinsdorf played up like a seasoned trouper, expressing bewilderment with Gallic shrugs, and the whole orchestra followed Jack in a wild jazz medley which included "Sweet Georgia Brown."

pe came on stage and presented

At the conclusion Gov. Volpe Benny with a Paul Revere bowl, and promised to bring his guitar to the party which was to follow at the Somerset.

NEWS (e)
SALEM, MASS.
CIRC. 28,550

FEB 16 1968 New England Newsclip

BENNY'S STYLE

Jack Benny's fiddling fills the till and for that he merits the profound graitude of the Boston Symphony orchestra. That he's a man of great fortitude was amply evidenced in the program he chose for the recent Pension Fund Concert at Symphony Hall. Had the soloist been Isaac Stern, even Heifetz, the choice of Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto would have caused no more of a ripple then tossing a glass of water in the Atlantic Ocean. To them, both are standard policy, presenting about the same degree of difficulty as a Kreutzer exercise and any of its attendant variations. Which is to say, none whatsoever.

For one of Mr. Benny's distinctive style and technique, however, perhaps it would not be too unkind to say that something like "Love in Bloom" might be better paced for his unusual talents.

While everything about his violin playing is utterly singular, as one reviewer stated, while his tone is characteristic, his technique without comparison, Jack Benny can be forgiven, for he's still one of the funniest men alive today. Perhaps 'Fiddler on the Goof" would be more to the point. . . . Hmmm.

MONITOR (E)
CONCORD, N. H.
CIRC. 13,100

FEB 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Debut at Symphony Hall

Jack Benny and his Strad

By Harold Rogers

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Once Fred Allen said that "when Jack Benny plays the violin it sounds as if the strings are back in the cat!"

When Mr. Benny — a promising young musician of 39 — made his debut Sunday afternoon with the Boston Symphony, he proved himself to be the undoubted master of the stonatura. He even explained that he would play the first four bars of Schubert's "The Bee" without accompaniment — "I believe you call it acapulco."

"Some critics," said Mr. Benny, "even go so far as to say that I can play better than I do. I take an oath, what you heard today is my best!"

He already had played, with incredible insouciance, the Sarasate "Zigeunerweisen" and the first movement of the Mendelssohn Concerto, plus a dazzling performance as concertmaster in a prestissimo traversal of the Rimsky-Korsakov Capriccio Espagnole. As he lagged behind he called out to Erich Leinsdorf: "Not so fast!" And concluded the piece heroically by himself.

"I have played in Boston before," he explained. "It was after the first World War when I was on the Keith circuit. When I played at Keith's downtown here, I was so bad that I died. Even the Boston newspapers said that I died. Even that Catholic newspaper . . . what's it called?"

Several men from the orchestra shouted, "The Pilot!"

"No, not the Pilot," he answered. "It was the, the . . . oh yes, I remember, The Christian Science Monitor. Even The Christian Science Monitor said that I died. Of course, they had a nicer way of saying it. 'Jack Benny,' they said, 'made the transition peacefully.' "

A nervous performance

He said that he really plays much better at rehearsals. "I get pretty nervous when I walk up to the world's greatest orchestra," he said. When he first walked on stage before the Boston Symphony at this Pension Fund concert, he lifted his right hand only to find the bow missing, whereupon he immediately left the stage to retrieve it.

"And when you think of the three greatest conductors in the world, you naturally must think of Erich Leinsdorf," he went on. "Not only that, he's a good comedian."

At one point an unidentified gentleman came on stage to present Mr. Benny with a shining silver Revere bowl. "Good Lord, it's the Governor!" exclaimed Mr. Benny in surprise, to which Governor Volpe replied: "If they don't know who I am by now, I'd better quit."

What's in a name?

"My real name," he confessed just as he was leaving, "used to be Benjamin Kubelsky. If I had known I was going to be a great violinist, I would have kept it.

"I'd like to tell you one last story, a true one." He said that he had attended a political function in Washington where some 14 dinner tables were set up with one empty chair at each, thus making it possible for President Johnson to visit each table for a few minutes.

"At my table were Mrs. Sargent Shriver and Adlai Stevenson," he explained, "and when President Johnson sat at our table, he kept calling me Mr. Benny. This annoyed me, because no one really calls show people by their last names. They call us Jack or Bob or Danny, you know. . . . Well, after President Johnson left our table, I told the others that I was upset. 'Every president I've ever known,' I told them, 'has always called me Jack.' Then Mrs. Shriver asked me: 'What did Mr. Lincoln call you?' Well, I was so surprised that while I was trying to think of what to say, Adlai Stevenson said: 'Why Lincoln called him Benjamin Kubelsky, of course. That was before Jack changed his name!' "

Benjamin Kubelsky

. . . otherwise known as Jack Benny, made his debut with the Boston Symphony for the orchestra's Pension Fund at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon. His performance is reviewed in the columns above.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 12 1968 New England Newsclip

When Benny plays the BSO...

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Society Editor

(Photo on Page 16)

"This is the best I can do — I'm not fooling" Jack Benny told his sold-out Symphony audience Sunday afternoon, as he lowered his famous violin after the first solo session with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (whose pension fund he boosted by the record sum of $28,581.50).

A master hand at his trade, even if it isn't playing the violin ("slow down" he kept urging conductor Leinsdorf) the Benny bow has earned way over $4 million for symphony orchestras in the last 10 years.

"I didn't know you played so well" John Volpe and Jack Benny said practically in the same breath as Governor John hoisted his guitar into position to join Benny in O sole Mio at the chummy reception at the Somerset.

Longtime Symphony regulars like the Charles Sumner Birds circulated cordially with the latest mini-skirted Symphony wives (they could put on their own revue anytime, those girls) and Benny signed programs destined for "my son in Vietnam," "my brother at prep school," and so on.

The Leinsdorfs watched benignly for a while—Erich got a terrific accolade from maestro Benny, not only for his conducting but for the comedian's timing too. And the orchestra joined the audience in a torrent of applause for Leinsdorf.

Symphony's Thomas Perry and his atractive wife and Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky were helping to keep Benny in motion at the jammed reception. Also on from the hall, which couldn't hold half the people who wanted to hear Jack and that violin, were Symphony stalwarts like the Norman Cahners, the Louis Cabots, the Frank Hatches, the Harris Fahnestocks and Paul Ceresole, the Gerald Blakeleys, the Peter Fullers, the Charles Hoveys, Neil Ayer, the William deF. Manices, the Philip Allens and so many more.

Since there was the usual double-up—on music, too—it meant that people like the Philip Allens, Gov. and Mrs. Volpe, the William Coxes and the Harold Hodgkinsons and a lot more were sponsors for both the Pension Fund Concert and the Metropolitan Opera's Regional Auditions across the street at Jordan Hall.

It was really a shame two such occasions had to clash on time, and loyal audition committee members like Mrs. John Carter and Brooks Potter and his beauteous wife had to miss the fun at Symphony.

No. 1 choice was Rene Rancourt who has sung with the Boston Opera, and his runner-up, who has also sung with the Boston Opera, was Rafael Lebron. Among the pretty girls in the greenroom were Julie Sampson of Hingham, whose mother, the late Mrs. James Sampson, was a founder member of the regional auditions committee.

Mrs. John Cornish, who also helped get this good program off to a flying start, was at Jordan Hall yesterday as were the Sherwin Badgers and a host more.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Saturday, March 16, 1968

Jack Benny's Only Special Of the Season

Oldest 39-Year-Old Still Going Strong

By CYNTHIA LOWRY
The Associated Press

The world's oldest 39-year-old, or perhaps its youngest 74-year-old had a birthday last month, but he was much too busy to pay much attention to it.

"I say I'm 39," said Jack Benny with mock severity. "And anything else you want to guess is entirely up to you."

Jack was stopping over briefly in New York, en route from a concert with the Boston Symphony to a night club date in Miami.

His only TV special is scheduled Wednesday (10 p.m., Channel 8) with guest stars Lucille Ball, Johnny Carson, Ben Blue and Paul Revere and the Riders.

He is busy polishing some material for use during a four-week engagement in April at New York's Waldorf Astoria.

Even after a half century in show business, he still prefers the tensions and excitements of the theater.

Wednesday's special has a carnival theme with a variety of sideshow performers—a sword swallower, a fire-eater, a strongman—singers, dancers and cameo appearances by Bob Hope, Danny Thomas, Dean Martin, the Smothers Brothers, George Burns and Don Drysdale.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 12 1968

New England Newsclip

Benny stole the Symphony show

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Music Critic

You wouldn't think the cost of the soloist's violin would come up during a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—even if he was Jack Benny.

But somehow, it got out ($110). So did his age "39," the name "Fred Allen," and some of the best musical-clowing since the classic Hoffnung Festivals of London.

Benny appeared (one might even say, played) in the orchestra's pension fund concert Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He was marvelous for the players' morale.

He brought out previously unsuspected comic talent in the B.S.O. violin section, and found in Erich Leinsdorf the best straight man he's had since Don Wilson.

For a while it was pretty sticky: Benny seemed to think that concermaster Joseph Silverstein and cymbalist Thomas Gauger were upstaging him (they may well have been). At any rate, after a brief conference, they were excused from their chairs by Leinsdorf. Assistant concertmaster Alfred Krips went the same way shortly, and no one else had the courage to cover Benny's occasional slips.

But all was repaired: Benny sat as concertmaster during a slightly truncated (four-minute) version of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnole." ("Not so fast," he shouted to Leinsdorf as things got brisk.)

Benny has the best-developed portamento I have ever heard. He is not so adept in the notes beginning and ending this effect, but the slide itself is uncanny.

He uses a special edition of Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" which is rather more interesting than the original.

In the first movement of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, he was deadly.

In addition to all this, Benny did imitations of four violinists (Spivakovsky, Szigeti, Stern, and Heifetz), and gave a short apology for his genius:

"I know that people in the audience — and even some music critics — think that I can play better than I do. But I take an oath, that was the best that I can do."

Introducing an encore, "The Bee' by Schubert: "This is a short number, but sometimes I get mixed up, so could I please have a stagehand bring out a stand and the music?"

The "stagehand" was dressed up a little strangely, and was said to resemble Chris Kimber of the orchestra. At any rate, he took Benny's fiddle and tossed off cleanly a phrase Benny had bobbled a bit during his imitations. Benny took it philosophically.

He was given a silver bowl and a certificate by Gov Volpe at the end of the concert, and the orchestra members contributed an engraved violin bow in gatitude for his uremunerated labors.

Leinsdorf stole a little of Benny's thunder at the beginning of the concert by leading Rossini's "Il Signor Bruschino" overture, which is somewhat given to rattlings of stands in places where notes are more usual. He also conducted a broad, lively Beethoven Fifth.

AFTER THE CONCERT—Boston Symphony soloist Jack Benny, chats with pianist John A. Volpe about the state of musical arts.

(Ted Dully Photo)

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Saturday, March 16, 1968

Jack Benny's Only Special Of the Season

Oldest 39-Year-Old Still Going Strong

By CYNTHIA LOWRY
The Associated Press

The world's oldest 39-year-old, or perhaps its youngest 74-year-old had a birthday last month, but he was much too busy to pay much attention to it.

"I say I'm 39," said Jack Benny with mock severity. "And anything else you want to guess is entirely up to you."

Jack was stopping over briefly in New York, en route from a concert with the Boston Symphony to a night club date in Miami.

His only TV special is scheduled Wednesday (10 p.m., Channel 8) with guest stars Lucille Ball, Johnny Carson, Ben Blue and Paul Revere and the Riders.

He is busy polishing some material for use during a four-week engagement in April at New York's Waldorf Astoria.

Even after a half century in show business, he still prefers the tensions and excitements of the theater.

Wednesday's special has a carnival theme with a variety of sideshow performers—a sword swallower, a fire-eater, a strongman—singers, dancers and cameo appearances by Bob Hope, Danny Thomas, Dean Martin, the Smothers Brothers, George Burns and Don Drysdale.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 234,100

FEB 12 1968

New England Newsclip

Benny stole the Symphony show

By DAVID NOBLE
Associate Music Critic

You wouldn't think the cost of the soloist's violin would come up during a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—even if he was Jack Benny.

But somehow, it got out ($110). So did his age "39," the name "Fred Allen," and some of the best musical-clowing since the classic Hoffnung Festivals of London.

Benny appeared (one might even say, played) in the orchestra's pension fund concert Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He was marvelous for the players' morale.

He brought out previously unsuspected comic talent in the B.S.O. violin section, and found in Erich Leinsdorf the best straight man he's had since Don Wilson.

For a while it was pretty sticky: Benny seemed to think that concermaster Joseph Silverstein and cymbalist Thomas Gauger were upstaging him (they may well have been). At any rate, after a brief conference, they were excused from their chairs by Leinsdorf. Assistant concertmaster Alfred Krips went the same way shortly, and no one else had the courage to cover Benny's occasional slips.

But all was repaired: Benny sat as concertmaster during a slightly truncated (four-minute) version of Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Capriccio Espagnole." ("Not so fast," he shouted to Leinsdorf as things got brisk.)

Benny has the best-developed portamento I have ever heard. He is not so adept in the notes beginning and ending this effect, but the slide itself is uncanny.

He uses a special edition of Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" which is rather more interesting than the original.

In the first movement of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, he was deadly.

In addition to all this, Benny did imitations of four violinists (Spivakovsky, Szigeti, Stern, and Heifetz), and gave a short apology for his genius:

"I know that people in the audience — and even some music critics — think that I can play better than I do. But I take an oath, that was the best that I can do."

Introducing an encore, "The Bee' by Schubert: "This is a short number, but sometimes I get mixed up, so could I please have a stagehand bring out a stand and the music?"

The "stagehand" was dressed up a little strangely, and was said to resemble Chris Kimber of the orchestra. At any rate, he took Benny's fiddle and tossed off cleanly a phrase Benny had bobbled a bit during his imitations. Benny took it philosophically.

He was given a silver bowl and a certificate by Gov Volpe at the end of the concert, and the orchestra members contributed an engraved violin bow in gatitude for his uremunerated labors.

Leinsdorf stole a little of Benny's thunder at the beginning of the concert by leading Rossini's "Il Signor Bruschino" overture, which is somewhat given to rattlings of stands in places where notes are more usual. He also conducted a broad, lively Beethoven Fifth.

AFTER THE CONCERT—Boston Symphony soloist Jack Benny, chats with pianist John A. Volpe about the state of musical arts.

(Ted Dully Photo)

151

MISCELLANEOUS

The Sunday Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 390,627

OCT 15 1967

HARRY HOEHN

"Bird" by Harry Hoehn
Drypoint on copper, edition 100, Sept. 1967

A drypoint is made by cutting into a metal plate with a sharp point to raise a burr. It is this burr which holds the ink. It is because of this raised burr that the number of prints usually taken from a dry point is rather small.

Since the character of the drypoint depends on the quality of the burr and the wiping of the surface of the plate, the prints differ from one to another more than in the case of etched or engraved plates.

The state's coming alive with the sound of music...

By HENRY WALLHAUSER

The orchestra holds sway. Let the coming week in New Jersey demonstrate it.

Four major orchestral concerts are scheduled. Friday there is the opening of the New Jersey Symphony's suburban concert series with a program at Montclair High Scool. The orchestra tunes up earlier in the week with a United Nations concert at Symphony Hall,

The Jersey Music Beat

Newark, featuring the young Cranford pianist Elma Adams playing Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

On Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf plays the second of the Septee Series concerts at Symphony Hall.

* * *

On the same night Igor Stravinsky and his protege Robert Craft lead the French National Orchestra in a Rutgers gymnasium concert in New Brunswick.

All this won't dull the luster, of course, of several other programs scheduled this week in the Garden State, among them one at Upsala College Tuesday night with the New York Pro Musica.

But it is safe to say that the greatest attractions in terms of audience will be the orchestral programs. Both the New Jersey Symphony and the Septee Series are assured big audiences through pre-season subscriptions. The Stravinsky-Craft program was close to a sellout in the 3,000-seat Rutgers gymnasium early last week.

That large following, here and all over the nation, wasn't always there. Recitalists, notably the flamboyant keyboard giants from Lizst to Paderewski, held the public imagination in the 19th and early 20th centuries.

Sixty years ago the Golden Age of the Opera was at its peak. Caruso, Farrar, Scotti, Calve —they were household names, and often household voices tinnily reproduced through millions of Victrolas. (A raging musical argument of the period was whether Caruso or Scotti sang the opening measures of "Solenne in quest'ora" from La Forza del Destino; it turned out to be Caruso when Victor settled the argument by printing the opening passage on the back of the record.)

* * *

Ironically it was recordings, which have contributed so much to Americans' contemporary love affair with symphony orchestras, that were a factor in keeping symphonic mucic from the public.

The large symphonic ensemble with its heavy string tones came out of early phonographs sounding as if it were recorded in a tin can. The human voice and the brass band, however, were perfectly suited to the acoustical horn.

Caruso's voice, it has been said, was a recording engineer's dream. Other singers less fortunately endowed came across sounding like Caruso on millions of expensive (up to $7 each) Red Seal records of the day.

The orchestra buff was out of luck. Of Beethoven's large orchestral output, the 1913 Victor catalog listed only the Leonore Overture No. 3 (versions by the Victor Concert Orchestra and Pryor's Band), abbreviated versions of the Adagio from the Fourth Symphony, again by the Victor Concert Orchestra, and a shortened movement from the Emporer Concerto.

Thankfully, all this has changed. Twenty-five major city orchestras and 33 smaller, metropolitan orchestras perform to an American audience of nearly 9 million yearly. More than 1,000 community orchestras flourish; there are about a dozen in North Jersey alone. The Schwann Long Playing Record catalog is bursting with orchestral music.

Some notes on the coming week: Other than the playing of the young Soviet pianist Nicolai Petrov in Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto, the New Jersey Symphony program holds special interest with a performance of Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 in D Minor (new No. 7). The Bohemian composer wrote this symphony after receiving a substantial grant of funds and had been planning a symphony on a grand scale ever since hearing the Third Symphony of Brahms. The Brahms influence was almost overpowering. Except for the last movement, the work sounds more like Brahms than Dvorak.

Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Septee Series concert at Newark's Symphony Hall Saturday

The Boston Symphony concert offers both a popular program (Beethoven's "Prometheus" ballet excerpts, Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony) and the brilliant BSO sound with the precision and clarity that Leinsdorf had added to it.

Listeners will get a rare hearing of the "Prometheus" music. The overture, of 1801 success, remains popular, and the ballet music marks the first appearance of a theme Beethoven was to use again and again, in the "Eroica" Symphony, in the Op. 35 Piano Variations and in his Country Dances.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 300,067 SUN. 351,015

NOV 3 1967

RADIO PREVIEW

Erich Leinsdorf's Superb 'Requiem'

By DONALD MINTZ
Star Staff Writer

There has been some confusion. The program announced in this column for Sunday's Boston Symphony broadcast is incorrect. In its place, listeners will hear a superb performance of Verdi's Requiem.

Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director who returns to the broadcast podium this week, is a controversial conductor. What happens, I think, is that Leinsdorf tends to reject traditional ideas about how a piece should sound. He rethinks things, beginning, it seems, from the beginning as if the score were brand new. He does not necessarily end with a performance that is more faithful to the printed notes than established convention dictates.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Soloists: Martina Arroyo, soprano; Tatiana Troyanos, alto; Michele Molese, tenor; Ezio Flagello, bass. Assisting groups: The Tanglewood Choir, The Berkshire Festival Chorus, Charles Wilson, chorus master. To be broadcast by WGMS, Sunday, Nov. 5, at 2 p.m. Program: Requiem, Verdi (1 hr., 41 min., 10 sec. —played without pause).

Bernie Harrison, The Star's TV Critic, is on vacation. His column will be resumed on his return.

Sometimes, indeed, he is rather less faithful. But whatever he does, he tends toward a sort of distant objectivity that to some listeners sounds like slackness or lack of involvement.

But however that may be, it is hard to see how even Leinsdorf's most consistent detractors could object to this Sunday's performance of the towering Verdi work.

Fine Details

The precision of the details is remarkable — and this, remember, is a "delayed" broadcast, that is a tape of a live performance, not a studio recording. Thus, for example, the cello intonation remains very good as the section moves up to the stratosphere in the Domine Deus. And despite the fact that the performance took place without an intermission, the dotted pattern in the final return of the Requiem is absolutely precise.

What is most striking, however, is Leinsdorf's choice of tempos. There is a paradox here, for what is unusual is not this or that tempo but the fact that one is scarcely aware that tempos do in fact have to be chosen. The Verdi Requiem is a piece that seems to induce— or perhaps seduce—conductors to seek effects. And so almost invariably, there is an extreme tempo here or there.

Not in this performance. The Lachrymosa is a bit slow perhaps, but at Leinsdorf's pace it moves with a heavy slouch that is lost if it goes any faster.

An Orchestral Concept

Leinsdorf's conception is properly orchestral and choral rather than soloistic. For all the work's popularity as a vehicle for opera singers, for all Verdi's use of an essentially operatic style, the Requiem is not really a work for four people who can belt out the high, hard ones with a chorus and orchestra along for support.

Accordingly, the moderate inadequacies of the soloists are not particularly disturbing. Both ladies employ excessive vibrato and Michele Molese, the tenor, sometimes flats above the staff. Ezio Flagello's bass is not really black enough for sections like the Mors stupebit. But all four soloists are better than fair. Given the other merits of the performance, they will do.

The Boston Symphony Recording Trust has done a superb job of capturing a difficult work under concert conditions. Balances are generally very good, and the stereo spacing is excellent. Dynamic range is adequate and it is unfortunate that WGMS's policy of excessive monitoring of volume levels will destroy some of the finest aspects of both performance and recording.

Since there is no pause in the performance that is sufficient for changing tape reels, home recordists will have to go to 3¾ inches per second or arrange to have two machines available.

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 30 SUN. 315,016
NOV 2 1967

RICHARD SHER IS CELLIST

Washington U. Professor at 19

By JOHN BROD PETERS
Globe-Democrat Staff Writer

When 19-year-old mathematician Harvey Friedman became an assistant professor at Stanford University this fall, the academic world was aghast, and the workaday world — people like you and me, who find household math a monthly challenge — stood in awe.

"Friedman," said Life magazine, "is the youngest United States college professor."

Maybe so. But he's got competition on the faculty of Washington University here: 19-year-old Richard Sher, an assistant professor of music.

Young Sher came here this fall to become first cellist with the St. Louis Symphony after having played last year with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

Richard took up the cello at the age of 10 at the behest of his father, who, according to Richard, was apparently enamoured of the "soulful" quality of the instrument.

RICHARD SHER
—Globe-Democrat Photo

TURNING POINT AT 15

By the time he was 13, Richard was studying under Luigi Silva at the preparatory division of the Juilliard School of Music, and he eventually advanced into the school itself.

"I think that the turning point in my training came when I was 15," he commented. "There was a sudden change in my attitude: for the first time, I began to be driven to practice without parental cajolement."

Such inducement came none too soon, for a year later — when he was 16 — Richard made his orchestral debut in New York City. After having played with various chamber-music groups in New York, he spent the summer of 1966 playing at the New Marlboro Music Center in west Massachusetts, after which he successfully auditioned for the Boston Symphony.

While he was playing in Boston, Richard read about an opening in St. Louis for first cellist in the symphony here

GOOD REPUTATION

"I had orchestra experience, even though I was young," he said, "and some of the other applicants hadn't. Besides, the Boston Symphony has a pretty good reputation: the previous first cellist also came from the Boston Symphony."

"I was very pleased when I learned I could become an assistant professor at Washington U.," Richard continued. "I know how difficult it is to become any kind of professor at all."

"I find that teaching is different with each student," he observed, "but I generally enjoy my teaching more when the students practice faithfully. When they don't, one knows it right away, and the lesson is just one big dead end."

"It's always great to deal with talent, although I would rather work with someone who is diligent than with a talent who pines away and does nothing."

FOR THE FUTURE

But when one reaches the top so soon, what accomplishments are left for the future, I asked.

"I would like to be a first-chair player as a career," Richard replied. "I do have some dreams about being a soloist in some capacity — and maybe conducting a little bit, just for fun."

Richard Sher is already widely acclaimed as a first cellist. At twice his present age, he will still be straddling his prime.

What Stanford's Harvey Friedman is to science, Washington U.'s Richard Sher is to the humanities — and personally I prefer musical rhythms to astronomical numbers.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,500
DEC 21 1967
New England Newsclip

Unknown Chopin Manuscript Discovered By Pianist Janis in a French Chateau

NEW YORK—A great musical rarity—a complete previously unknown manuscript by Chopin —has been discovered in a Frence chateau by Byron Janis, the pianist who has specialized in Chopin's music and that of the other great Slavic composers.

The work is Chopin's Waltz in G Flat Major, Opus 70, No. 1, which was published in 1855, six years after the composer's death. With the discovered work was another, in Chopin's handwriting, of the Waltz in E Flat, Opus 18. Two other manuscript copies exist of the E flat waltz.

Both manuscripts have been authenticated by Francois Lesure, the Chopin expert of the Societe Francaise de Musicologie.

Byron Janis

Tanglewood Soloist

(Janis has appeared at Tanglewood as a guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1958 and 1960 he played Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in programs conducted by Pierre Monteaux.)

In the case of the G flat waltz, there are changes from the very first note. The published version begins with a turn followed by three eighth notes. But the manuscript omits the turn and has two eighth notes followed by a dotted 16th.

Janis cites many other such differences. The harmonies and basic melodies are not changed, but the layout is slightly altered, there are different dynamic and pedaling instructions and in Janis's opinion, the manuscript has more charm and subtlety than the publ shed version.

The discovery of the manuscript will help establish more closely the date Chopin composed the work, which up to now has been conjectural. Also it will give musicologists a chance to collate the published version against an authentic source.

Both manuscripts belong to Count Paul de la Panouse, whose family traces ancestry to the 12th century. The great-grandfather of the present count fought with Lafayette during the American Revolution. In the family residence, the Chateau de Thoiry in Yvelines, about 40 miles from Paris, is an enormous, but uncatalogued, archive. It was at Thoiry that the manuscripts were found.

Other Secrets

Last October, the Count de la Panouse showed the manuscripts to Byron Janis. They had turned up in a box marked "old clothes." Among the clothes was nestled a package of letters from Eugene Sue, the famous French writer of the romantic period. And among the letters were the manuscripts.

It is not known if equally important Chopin material reposes at the Chateau de Thoiry. In the archives are known to be letters from French kings and major literary figures, and important Gobelin tapestry and an enormous amount of uncatalogued material. The family traces its history back to 1154, at which time the original part of the chateau was built. The chateau is considered one of the great houses in France.

BULLETIN (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 147,150
DEC 22 1967
New England Newsclip

Messiah, Greatest of Oratorios, To Be Performed on Television

By IRENE JARRY

"The Messiah" by Handel is one of the best oratorios to be heard for Christmas. The complete work will be performed by the Handel & Haydn Society at 7:30 p.m. Sunday on Channel 2. If you have never heard it in its entirety, it will be a thrilling experience. The Handel & Haydn Society has been tops in Boston for more than 80 years. Edward F. Gilday is its present conductor and it includes top singers.

Handel was a dramatic musician, and in the oratorio he wrote on a grand scale, employing the chorus and smaller vocal combinations in a manner calculated to command instant attention and interest. Extremely rapid in composition, Handel is said to have written "The Messiah" in 24 days. For his writing he used a sharp quill and when he completed a page, blotted it, as was then the custom, by sprinkling sand over it. The sand would be shaken off when dry. So rapid was Handel in his work and so stirred by his own inspiration that many of the manuscript pages, which may now be seen in the British Museum, are smeared across their surfaces, so hasty was the composer in dashing the sand from them that he might continue his writing.

"The Messiah", written in 1741, had its first performance in Dublin, Ireland. When the "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung, the king, George II, rose to his feet in a simple gesture of devotion, and, with the audience which followed his example, remained standing throughout the entire number. The custom, so impulsively inaugurated, has continued to this day.

Many of the beautiful arias in the oratorio are often sung in concert solo as art songs. "He Shall Feed His Flock", sung by a contralto, is of peaceful and comforting atmosphere. "Come Unto Me" and "I Know that My Redeemer Liveth", for soprano, and beautiful, characterized by a word of worship triumph; the music may be said to be "composed throughout" in the manner of the art song.

The famous "Hallelujah Chorus" displays Handel's skill in simple and effective choral writing, his use of counterpoint, of brilliant contrasts and climaxes, and a broad majestic style. Features of the chorus, in addition to its supreme worth as a piece of worshipful music, are the responsive shouting back and forth of the "Hallelujah" theme between chorus and accompaniment, unison of both choral forces and accompaniment on the words, "For the Lord Omnipotent reigneth", its grandeur and piling up of noble masses of sound, the impressive vocal figure on the words, "And He Shall Reign Forever," in which voice after voice enter with the culmination of the music on the stirring refrain, and the exciting theme, "King of Kings".

Also on Channel 2 Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony in another Christmas great "L'Enfance du Christ" by Berlioz, on Monday, the 25th, at 2:00 p.m.

Happy listening and Merry Christmas!

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
DEC 22 1967
New England Newsclip

6:30—News and Sports

Handel's Messiah Scheduled For Channel 2 Christmas Eve

Full-length performances of two great Christmas oratorios highlight the Yuletide season on Channel 2.

On Christmas Eve Handel's always-popular "Messiah" begins at 7:30 p.m., while on Christmas Day "L'Enfance du Christ" by Hector Berlioz is performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society under the direction of Charles Munch.

The Berlioz oratorio begins at 2 p.m. on Dec. 25, with soloists Florence Kopleff, contralto; John McCollum, tenor; Theodor Uppman, baritone and Donald Gramm, bass.

"L'Enfance du Christ" is just one of several Christmas programs scheduled for Dec. 25. At 1 p.m. the N.E.T. Festival production "Picasso and His Sculpture" documents the problems faced by Chicago in constructing the monumental sculpture recenlty unveiled at Chicago's Civic Center. An art exhibit meant to be felt as well as seen is the subject of "The Feelies" at 4:30 p.m., and at 5:30 Hans Christian Andersen's fairytale "The Fir Tree" will be dramatized on "What's New." Channed 2's science series "Spectrum" bows to the Yuletide season by recreating Michael Faraday's first Christmas lecture at 7:30 p.m., and at 8 p.m. The French Chef shows how to prepare roast suckling pig, a favorite Yuletide roast in France. Chicago Festival introduces folksingers George and Gerry Armstrong and the Dixie Sleepwalkers in a "Time for Singing" at 8:30 p.m., and also at 4 p.m.

153

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 885,000 SUN. 1,500,000

FEB 18 1968

Pace and 12 Others Named by President To Public TV Board

...ers Are Named ...ncommercial TV

By JACK GOULD

Frank Pace Jr., former Secretary of the Army and former Director of the Bureau of the Budget, was named by President Johnson yesterday to head a 15-man board that will direct the pioneering Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

The corporation is scheduled to receive the first Federal funds appropriated to expand and stabilize a noncommercial TV service as a complement to advertiser-supported networks and stations.

In addition to Mr. Pace, Mr. Johnson named12 other board members, including John D. Rockefeller 3d, chairman of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts; Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, and Jack Valenti, a former aide to Mr. Johnson and now president of the Motion Picture Association of America. He had appointed two other members previously.

Word of the President's selections were announced in Washington, after which Mr. Pace discussed at his home in Greenwich, Conn., his long-range hopes for the corporation.

Mr. Pace, whose probable selection as chairman had been reported last week, cautioned against expectations of overnight miracles by the corporation. He envisioned noncommercial TV as a gradually growing social asset that could add to the nation's awareness of the democracy's strengths and resources in information and the arts.

The corporation's board, ... Culp Hobby, ... Houston ... editor of The ... administration of former President Eisenhower was Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. She has been proposed for a four-year term.

¶Sol Haas, chairman of station KIRO in Seattle. His term would run two years.

¶Joseph D. Hughes, vice president of T. Mellon & Sons and administrative trustee of the Richard King Mellon Foundation in Pittsburgh. He is co-chairman of the Pennsylvania Committee for Public Television. His term would be for four years.

¶Mr. Leinsdorf, who was nominated for a two-year term, has been conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York. In Boston, in addition to serving with the Boston Symphony, he is a trustee of the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

¶Mr. Rockefeller, who is one of the foremost figures in New York's cultural life. In addition to his chairmanship of Lincoln Center, he is chairman of the Rockefeller Foundation and has been a past trustee of New York's educational station on Channel 13. He has been nominated for two years.

2 Others Named Earlier

¶Carl Sanders, former Governor of Georgia and currently a member of the National Commission on Urban Problems. He has been proposed for a four-year term.

¶Frank E. Schooley, director of broadcasting and an associate professor of radio and television at the University of Illinois, and former president of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters. He is up for a two-year term.

¶Mr. Valenti, a former advertising man, became a special assistant to President Johnson in 1963. He accepted the presidency of the Motion Picture Association of America in 1966. He has been proposed for a six-year term.

Harris & Ewing

Frank Pace Jr., who was named head of organization.

Prior to yesterday's announcement, the President appointed Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president emeritus of Johns Hopkins University, and Dr. James R. Killian Jr., chairman of the corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Both have been proposed for six-year terms.

Dr. Killian was the architect of last year's report of the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television. The report, originally encouraged by President Johnson, was in large measure the basis of the legislation for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Mr. Pace stressed in the interview that expansion of noncommercial TV to its full potential could not be solely a corporation undertaking, urging active support by private business and the individual viewer. Such a three-way partnership, he said, would demonstrate how several forces together can achieve national goals beyond the capability of one force alone.

Donations Promised

Senate confirmation of the appointments make take up to a month. Articles of incorporation will then be filed in the District of Columbia, a step that will make immediately available separate $1-million donations promised by the Columbia Broadcasting System and the Carnegie Corporation.

It was understood that the corporation, probably with White House concurrence, may ask Congress for initial "seed money" of $9-million, as originally proposed in last year's passage of the Public Broadcasting Act. This would differ from the recommendation of $4-million in the President's budget message, which proposed that for the following fiscal year there be a further grant of $20-million.

The altered strategy would eliminate the need for amending provisions of the corporation act and presumably assure that the more complex problem—permanent governmental financing with adequate safeguards against Congressional intrusion in program content—could be deferred until after the Presidential election in November.

Mr. Pace said that one of the tasks confronting the 15-man board would be the selection of a paid president responsible for day-by-day operations.

He indicated that all candidates would be carefully screened in accordance with the board's wishes for what he called the long-range positioning of the corporation's policies. In this connection, he stressed that the 130-odd individual educational stations would have to be the prime activists in program preparations and not expect Washington to relieve them of their creative obligations.

Continued on Page 68, Column 3

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

FEB 11 1968

New England Newsclip

Tommy of the big bang

Symphony loses one of its finest

By MARGO MILLER

Harold Thompson was perhaps the most visible player in the Boston Symphony. He was a tall, bulky man with a ruddy complexion under his crewcut and he played cymbals. Percussion players move around a lot tending their batterie of the stage. Sometimes they carry their music around and always they are counting.

But they are always in the right place at the right time. You would see Tommy come to rest before a stack of cymbals, slide into the hand straps, lift the metal discs, check the coductor. Tommy's large frame, nodding to the beat, then hefted the cymbals, crashed them before him and arms arcing outward made cymbals and Symphony Hall ring to the echo.

This was the big bang of cymbal playing, its razzle-dazzle heroics. There were of course other techniques, as the music might demand: The clash and abrupt stifling of sound, or the wash-wash of cymbals scrubbed against one another tight and dry, or the gay, warm jangle, funny and loose, or the feathery, mysterious shimmer.

Tommy did them all. He was a master colorist, working with the 18-inchers up to the big ones, two feet across, that took quite a man to control. "He was one of our finest artists", says Vic Firth, B.S.O. timpanist, who was speaking for music in general.

Thompson, 53, was fatally injured last Monday on the Brighton part of the Massachusetts Pike. Inspecting minor damage to his car, he was hit by a truck.

At the B.S.O. concerts, they played Gluck's Dance of the Sacred Spirits. "Well I guess something with cymbals would be out of place," said a lameter. "Goddam senseless accident."

Another: "Tommy was a wild man but a very gentle wild man."

Who took his trout down Maine. "I never got a line out like that," reminisced Robert Zildjian whose firm in Quincy makes cymbals and who regards Thompson as he Menuhin of the instrument. "He thought like an artist. And he knew the answers before the question was asked. A certainty to everything, like the time we went to a store to look at those life preservers, those life rings you inflate and you put your feet in. And Tommy blew one up in the middle of the store and began telling me how you could float down stream casting."

Tommy was a belote player and master of the bluff. Players who didn't know his card stratagems would find Tommy taking hands on very little, "just for the hell of it."

And he gave. To B.S.O. conductor Erich Leinsdorf a letter by Daniel Webster. To B.S.O. archivist Laning Humphrey, two Norse figures with poleaxes, "something he'd found."

He was generous about other players' innovations, calling the Globe once to have us send a reporter over to see a new bass drum which Vic Firth and Leinsdorf had had made in London. Or writing to tell us that Artie Press, not Tommy, as reported, had come up with the ironwork to sound King Henry's sword in Boston's "Lohengrin" recording.

Zildjian: "We make cymbals for universal taste. We've learned a lot from Tommy and he learned from us. With him, it would be cymbals for special problems, or cymbals for some buddy wanting a special sound. He had a sensitivity to sound beyond the normal ear and what you don't often see in percussion, an all-round musician."

Charles Munch got Tommy for the Boston Symphony, in 1953. Zildjian thinks this cymbal sound changed the whole essence of the B.S.O. Tommy played Pops, too, and it was he who "auditioned" the beat-up portable which his collegue Charlie Smith plays in "The Typewriter."

Tommy was a talker, in a gravelled, highish voice. It came out sometimes with boyish amazement ("How about that!") and often in floods of jazz talk. Tommy, born in Akron, trained at the Cincinnati Conservatory and cymbalist with the Cincinnati Symphony, had begun at 12 with the jazz drummer Charlie Wilcox. He knocked about, playing medicine shows, cabaret, the pit for opera and ballet and musicals.

And here in Boston, when the Boston Ballet first did "Road of The Phoebe Snow," Tommy who was playing the "straight" part of the evening, was eager to hear what Herb Pomeroy and Duke Ellington had arranged from Ellington's score.

I remember Tommy at this intermission. He was in his orchestra tails and spouting about Ellington's bag and lead sheets and a lot of other things I didn't quite dig. In this enthusiastic chatter he bumped into a small, neat, quiet man, in a small, tidy double-breasted blazer. Apologies began, then we were introduced all around, with Tommy identifying the man as John Taras of the New York City Ballet, up to see the Boston do his piece.

And Tommy was off on how nice that was and how hard the kids had worked on it and wasn't it splendid what they were doing and what a nice evening it was for everyone.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

COLUMBUS EVENING DISPATCH
COLUMBUS, O. 43216
P.M. CIRC. 229,549

MAR-15-68

Senate OKs Directors Of Public Broadcasting

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Johnson's nominations of 15 directors for the new Public Broadcasting Corp., created to assist educational television and radio development, have been confirmed by the Senate.

Former Secretary of the Army Frank Pace Jr., designated by Johnson as chairman of the corporation, and 14 other directors were confirmed Tuesday.

The others are:

- Joseph A. Beirne, president of the United Electric and Communications Workers of America.
- Robert S. Benjamin, board chairman of United Artists Corp.
- Roscue C. Carroll of the Golden State Line Insurance Co., Los Angeles.
- Michael A. Gammino of Providence, R.I., president of the Columbus National Bank of Rhode Island.
- Oveta Culp Hobby, president and editor of the Houston Post and former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.
- Saul Haas of Seattle, Wash., board chairman of Kiro, Inc., broadcasters.
- Joseph D. Hughes of Pittsburgh, governor and vice president of T. Mellon & Sons and administrative trustee of Richard King Mellon Foundation.
- Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
- John D. Rockefeller III, board chairman of the Rockefeller Foundation.
- Former Gov. Carl Sanders of Georgia.
- Frank E. Schooley, director of university broadcasting, University of Illinois.
- Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association of America and former special assistant to President Johnson.
- Dr. Milton Eisenhower, president-emeritus of Johns Hopkins University.
- Dr. James Killian Jr., of the Massachusette Institute of Technology.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEW CRUSADER
W CIRC N AVAIL

FEB 10 1968

"Lincoln's Portrait" Slated For Orchestral Performance On TV

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" with Senator Edward M. Kennedy as narrator on WTTW/Channel 11's BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS Sunday, February 11 at 9:30 p.m. Also featured will be Misha Dichter performing Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto.

Mr. Leinsdorf will also be seen in a rehearsal session with the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music as they perform the third movement of Mahler's First Symphony on NET FESTIVAL — "Leinsdorf Recreates" Tuesday, February 13 at 9 p.m. The session was specially arranged for this telecast, but considered by the Conservatory as part of the training program for its students. Maestro Leinsdorf selected the third movement of Mahler's Symphony No. 1 to rehearse, feeling it would give the orchestra a full workout in ensemble as well as individual instrumental excellence. During the course of the program Leinsdorf describes his personal approach to conducting, to a given work itself, to the effect of hall acoustics, and to the mood of a given work itself, to the effect of hall acoustics, and to the mood of a given occasion. The final part of the program brings Leinsdorf and the young players back to their positions for a complete performance of the piece.

15

12 Others Are Named To Unit for Noncommercial TV

Continued From Page 1, Col. 6

which is subject to confirmation by the Senate, is virtually nonpartisan in political balance. It contains individuals from many geographical areas engaged in cultural activities, philanthropy, labor, banking, business, commercial and noncommercial broadcasting, journalism and education.

Following is the list of board members as released by the White House:

¶ Mr. Pace, who has been proposed for a six-year term. He is president of the National Institute of Social Science and a member of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board. He said he would apportion his time between his private positions and the chairmanship of the TV corporation.

¶ Joseph A. Beirne, president of the United Electrical and Communications Workers of America and a vice president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. He has been proposed for a four-year term.

¶ Robert S. Benjamin, chairman of the United Artists Corporation, a major element in the film industry; general partner in the New York law firm of Phillips, Nizer, Benjamin, Krim and Ballon, and a trustee of Brandeis University. He was nominated for a six-year term.

¶ Roscoe C. Carroll, general counsel for the Golden State Life Insurance Company of Los Angeles and a member of the board of the Welfare Planning Council for the Watts area of Los Angeles. His appointment would run for two years.

¶ Michael A. Gammino, president of the Columbus National Bank of Rhode Island, who is a trustee and treasurer of the Newport Metropolitan Opera Festival and a trustee for the repertory theater in Rhode Island. He has been proposed for a four-year term.

¶ Mrs. Oveta Culp Hobby, president and editor of The Houston Post, who in the administration of former President Eisenhower was Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare. She has been proposed for a four-year term.

¶ Sol Haas, chairman of station KIRO in Seattle. His term would run two years.

¶ Joseph D. Hughes, vice president of T. Mellon & Sons and administrative trustee of the Richard King Mellon Foundation in Pittsburgh. He is co-chairman of the Pennsylvania Committee for Public Television. His term would be for four years.

¶ Mr. Leinsdorf, who was nominated for a two-year term, has been conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York. In Boston, in addition to serving with the Boston Symphony, he is a trustee of the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

¶ Mr. Rockefeller, who is one of the foremost figures in New York's cultural life. In addition to his chairmanship of Lincoln Center, he is chairman of the Rockefeller Foundation and has been a past trustee of New York's educational station on Channel 13. He has been nominated for two years.

2 Others Named Earlier

¶ Carl Sanders, former Governor of Georgia and currently a member of the National Commission on Urban Problems. He has been proposed for a four-year term.

¶ Frank E. Schooley, director of broadcasting and an associate professor of radio and television at the University of Illinois, and former president of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters. He is up for a two-year term.

¶ Mr. Valenti, a former advertising man, became a special assistant to President Johnson in 1963. He accepted the presidency of the Motion Picture Association of America in 1966. He has been proposed for a six-year term.

Harris & Ewing

Frank Pace Jr., who was named head of organization.

Prior to yesterday's announcement, the President appointed Dr. Milton S. Eisenhower, president emeritus of Johns Hopkins University, and Dr. James R. Killian Jr., chairman of the corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Both have been proposed for six-year terms.

Dr. Killian was the architect of last year's report of the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television. The report, originally encouraged by President Johnson, was in large measure the basis of the legislation for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Mr. Pace stressed in the interview that expansion of noncommercial TV to its full potential could not be solely a corporation undertaking, urging active support by private business and the individual viewer. Such a three-way partnership, he said, would demonstrate how several forces together can achieve national goals beyond the capability of one force alone.

Donations Promised

Senate confirmation of the appointments make take up to a month. Articles of incorporation will then be filed in the District of Columbia, a step that will make immediately available separate $1-million donations promised by the Columbia Broadcasting System and the Carnegie Corporation.

It was understood that the corporation, probably with White House concurrence, may ask Congress for initial "seed money" of $9-million, as originally proposed in last year's passage of the Public Broadcasting Act. This would differ from the recommendation of $4-million in the President's budget message, which proposed that for the following fiscal year there be a further grant of $20-million.

The altered strategy would eliminate the need for amending provisions of the corporation act and presumably assure that the more complex problem—permanent governmental financing with adequate safeguards against Congressional intrusion in program content—could be deferred until after the Presidential election in November.

Mr. Pace said that one of the tasks confronting the 15-man board would be the selection of a paid president responsible for day-by-day operations.

He indicated that all candidates would be carefully screened in accordance with the board's wishes for what he called the long-range positioning of the corporation's policies. In this connection, he stressed that the 130-odd individual educational stations would have to be the prime activists in program preparations and not expect Washington to relieve them of their creative obligations.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 537,050

FEB 11 1968

New England Newsclip

Tommy of the big bang

Symphony loses one of its finest

By MARGO MILLER

Harold Thompson was perhaps the most visible player in the Boston Symphony. He was a tall, bulky man with a ruddy complexion under his crewcut and he played cymbals. Percussion players move around a lot tending their batterie of the stage. Sometimes they carry their music around and always they are counting.

But they are always in the right place at the right time. You would see Tommy come to rest before a stack of cymbals, slide into the hand straps, lift the metal discs, check the coductor. Tommy's large frame, nodding to the beat, then hefted the cymbals, crashed them before him and arms arcing outward made cymbals and Symphony Hall ring to the echo.

This was the big bang of cymbal playing, its razzle-dazzle heroics. There were of course other techniques, as the music might demand: The clash and abrupt stifling of sound, or the wash-wash of cymbals scrubbed against one another tight and dry, or the gay, warm jangle, funny and loose, or the feathery, mysterious shimmer.

Tommy did them all. He was a master colorist, working with the 18-inchers up to the big ones, two feet across, that took quite a man to control. "He was one of our finest artists", says Vic Firth, B.S.O. timpanist, who was speaking for music in general.

Thompson, 53, was fatally injured last Monday on the Brighton part of the Massachusetts Pike. Inspecting minor damage to his car, he was hit by a truck.

At the B.S.O. concerts, they played Gluck's Dance of the Sacred Spirits. "Well I guess something with cymbals would be out of place," said a lameter. "Goddam senseless accident."

Another: "Tommy was a wild man but a very gentle wild man."

Who took his trout down Maine. "I never got a line out like that," reminisced Robert Zildjian whose firm in Quincy makes cymbals and who regards Thompson as he Menuhin of the instrument. "He thought like an artist. And he knew the answers before the question was asked. A certainty to everything, like the time we went to a store to look at those life preservers, those life rings you inflate and you put your feet in. And Tommy blew one up in the middle of the store and began telling me how you could float down stream casting."

Tommy was a belote player and master of the bluff. Players who didn't know his card stratagems would find Tommy taking hands on very little, "just for the hell of it."

And he gave. To B.S.O. conductor Erich Leinsdorf a letter by Daniel Webster. To B.S.O. archivist Laning Humphrey, two Norse figures with poleaxes, "something he'd found."

He was generous about other players' innovations, calling the Globe once to have us send a reporter over to see a new bass drum which Vic Firth and Leinsdorf had had made in London. Or writing to tell us that Artie Press, not Tommy, as reported, had come up with the ironwork to sound King Henry's sword in Boston's "Lohengrin" recording.

Zildjian: "We make cymbals for universal taste. We've learned a lot from Tommy and he learned from us. With him, it would be cymbals for special problems, or cymbals for some buddy wanting a special sound. He had a sensitivity to sound beyond the normal ear and what you don't often see in percussion, an all-round musician."

Charles Munch got Tommy for the Boston Symphony, in 1953. Zildjian thinks this cymbal sound changed the whole essence of the B.S.O. Tommy played Pops, too, and it was he who "auditioned" the beat-up portable which his collegue Charlie Smith plays in "The Typewriter."

Tommy was a talker, in a gravelled, highish voice. It came out sometimes with boyish amazement ("How about that!") and often in floods of jazz talk. Tommy, born in Akron, trained at the Cincinnati Conservatory and cymbalist with the Cincinnati Symphony, had begun at 12 with the jazz drummer Charlie Wilcox. He knocked about, playing medicine shows, cabaret, the pit for opera and ballet and musicals.

And here in Boston, when the Boston Ballet first did "Road of The Phoebe Snow," Tommy who was playing the "straight" part of the evening, was eager to hear what Herb Pomeroy and Duke Ellington had arranged from Ellington's score.

I remember Tommy at this intermission. He was in his orchestra tails and spouting about Ellington's bag and lead sheets and a lot of other things I didn't quite dig. In this enthusiastic chatter he bumped into a small, neat, quiet man, in a small, tidy double-breasted blazer. Apologies began, then we were introduced all around, with Tommy identifying the man as John Taras of the New York City Ballet, up to see the Boston do his piece.

And Tommy was off on how nice that was and how hard the kids had worked on it and wasn't it splendid what they were doing and what a nice evening it was for everyone.

THE OHIO NEWS BUREAU COMPANY
Cleveland 15, Ohio
First Clipping Bureau In Ohio

COLUMBUS EVENING DISPATCH
COLUMBUS, O. 43216
P.M. CIRC. 229,549

MAR-15-68

Senate OKs Directors Of Public Broadcasting

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Johnson's nominations of 15 directors for the new Public Broadcasting Corp., created to assist educational television and radio development, have been confirmed by the Senate.

Former Secretary of the Army Frank Pace Jr., designated by Johnson as chairman of the corporation, and 14 other directors were confirmed Tuesday.

The others are:

- Joseph A. Beirne, president of the United Electric and Communications Workers of America.
- Robert S. Benjamin, board chairman of United Artists Corp.
- Roscue C. Carroll of the Golden State Line Insurance Co., Los Angeles.
- Michael A. Gammino of Providence, R.I., president of the Columbus National Bank of Rhode Island.
- Oveta Culp Hobby, president and editor of the Houston Post and former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.
- Saul Haas of Seattle, Wash., board chairman of Kiro, Inc., broadcasters.
- Joseph D. Hughes of Pittsburgh, governor and vice president of T. Mellon & Sons and administrative trustee of Richard King Mellon Foundation.
- Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
- John D. Rockefeller III, board chairman of the Rockefeller Foundation.
- Former Gov. Carl Sanders of Georgia.
- Frank E. Schooley, director of university broadcasting, University of Illinois.
- Jack Valenti, president of the Motion Picture Association of America and former special assistant to President Johnson.
- Dr. Milton Eisenhower, president-emeritus of Johns Hopkins University.
- Dr. James Killian Jr., of the Massachusette Institute of Technology.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEW CRUSADER
W C·RC N AVAIL

FEB 10 1968

"Lincoln's Portrait" Slated For Orchestral Performance On TV

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" with Senator Edward M. Kennedy as narrator on WTTW/Channel 11's BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS Sunday, February 11 at 9:30 p.m. Also featured will be Misha Dichter performing Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto.

Mr. Leinsdorf will also be seen in a rehearsal session with the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music as they perform the third movement of Mahler's First Symphony on NET FESTIVAL — "Leinsdorf Recreates" Tuesday, February 13 at 9 p.m. The session was specially arranged for this telecast, but considered by the Conservatory as part of the training program for its students. Maestro Leinsdorf selected the third movement of Mahler's Symphony No. 1 to rehearse, feeling it would give the orchestra a full workout in ensemble as well as individual instrumental excellence. During the course of the program Leinsdorf describes his personal approach to conducting, to a given work itself, to the effect of hall acoustics, and to the mood of a given work itself, to the effect of hall acoustics, and to the mood of a given occasion. The final part of the program brings Leinsdorf and the young players back to their positions for a complete performance of the piece.

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 119

Tanglewood

1968 - 1969

TANGLEWOOD

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL-1968

PRE-SEASON — PAGE

General Announcements — 1

Opening Exercises — 7

BMC Auditions — 11

General Broadcasting Announcements — 13

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS — 15

PG.
Week 1 - 15
Week 2 - 25
Week 3 - 33
Week 4 - 40
Week 5 - 49
Week 6 - 58
Week 7 - 65
Week 8 - 75
Lincoln Center Festival '68 - Koussevitsky Foundation Concert - 86

CHAMBER CONCERTS — 87

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

Orchestra, Chorus and Associated Institutions of Boston University and the New England Concervatory of Music — 89

Festival of Contemporary Music -FROMM WEEK — 95

Music Educators National Conference - including later articles inspired by the MENC Tanglewood activities. — 107

SPECIAL EVENTS

Pops Concert — 109

Tanglewood-on-Parade — 111

Contemporary Trends Concerts — 115

Jazz/Folk - 117
Music from India- 120
Rock- 122

TANGLEWOOD MISCELLANEOUS

The story of Tanglewood — 125

Tanglewood and the Massachusetts Arts Council — 133

Tanglewood trips and tours — 134

A Day in the Arts — 135

Tanglewood among the Festivals — 139

Friends of Tanglewood — 146

Tabulations and Evaluations — 147

Leinsdorf Wedding — 149

Weissenstein-Tanglewood Photographs — 150

PRE-SEASON

SENTINEL (e)
ANSONIA, CONN.
CIRC. 16,300

JUN 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Music festival to open July 5 at Tanglewood

The 8-week Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open July 5 at Tanglewood.

During its 1968 season at Lenox, Mass., the Boston Symphony will be heard in 24 major festival programs. Eight guest conductors will share the podium with Music Director Erich Leinsdorf.

The first two weeks will consist of chamber orchestra programs including a performance of Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass and the Tanglewood debut of the young violinist James Oliver Buswell IV.

Tanglewood's weekend schedule begins each Friday at 7 p.m. with the "Weekend Preludes," provided at no extra cost to ticket holders for the major program at 9 p.m. Saturday programs begin at 8 p.m. and Sunday major concerts are at 2:30 p.m.

Sunday morning chamber music, long a popular feature of the Tanglewood summer, will be given by ensembles of the Boston Symphony. Trios, quartets and larger ensembles will be heard at 10:30 a.m.

On four Wednesday evenings the festival will present contemporary programs. They will begin July 10, with a musical satire program. Others will be July 17, folk-rock music; July 24, non-Western music, and July 31, jazz.

Guest Conductors

Festival guest conductors will be Aaron Copland, Aug. 23; Sixten Ehrling, Aug. 2; Josef Krips, July 28; Charles Munch, Aug. 17; Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, July 19; William Steinberg, Aug. 4; Charles Wilson, Aug. 9, and David Zinman, July 12.

Pianists performing with the orchestra will be Gina Bachauer, Aug. 9, 10, 11; Jorge Bolet, July 26, Aug. 2, 4; Van Cliburn, July 20; Malcolm Frager, July 26, Aug. 3; Claude Frank, July 7; Grant Johannesen, July 19, 21; Lilian Kallir, July 5, Aug. 16.

In addition to Buswell, on July 5, violin soloists will be Alfred Krips, July 14; Joseph Silverstein, July 12; Aug. 18; cellists, Martin Hoherman, July 14, and Zara Zelsova, July 19; flute, James Pappoutsakis, July 14.

Singers in solo roles will be Helen Boatwright, July 27; Saramae Endich, July 13; Rosalind Elias, Aug. 17; Enrico DiGiuseppe, July 13; Hanne - Lore Kuhse, Aug. 24; Sherrill Milnes, July 27; Paul Plishka, July 13; Jerold Siena, Aug. 17; Beverly Sills, July 6; Jess Thomas, Aug. 24; Giorgio Tozzi, Aug. 17; David Ward, Aug. 24, and Beverly Wolff, July 13, 14.

Four choruses will take part in the programs. The Berkshire Boy Choir will present a prelude program Aug. 9. Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir will participate in Brahms Requiem July 27 and in three Brahms choral works Aug. 25. The Chorus pro Musica will sing Romeo et Juliette by Berlioz, with Munch conducting, on Aug. 17. The Tanglewood Choir will also participate in a performance of Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass July 13.

The complete schedule, programs and ticket information may be obtained by writing to the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240.

Service—Use Sentinel Want Ads

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 133,303

MAY 26 1968

Orchestra plans 31st Tanglewood season

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the 31st Berkshire Festival at its summer home, Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass., on July 5. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, who begins his sixth season as the festival's director, will conduct the opening concert, a Mozart program, in the 6,000 seat Music Shed.

The initial two weeks of the Tanglewood season will consist of chamber orchestra concerts with three all-Mozart programs and three to include works by Bach, Boccherini, Handel, Haydn and Telemann. David Zinman will conduct the concert of July 12 with the five other chamber orchestra programs under the direction of Leinsdorf.

Other guest conductors at this summer's Berkshire Festival are Aaron Copland, Aug. 23; Sixten Ehrling, Aug. 2; Josef Krips, July 28; Charles Munch, Aug. 17; Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, July 19; William Steinberg, Aug. 4; and the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Charles Wilson, Aug. 9. Krips; Wilson's and Zinman's appearances will be their first with the orchestra at Tanglewood. Charles Munch will conduct Berlioz' "Romeon and Juliet" with Rosalind Elias, Jerold Siena and Georgio Tozzi as soloists at this concert Aug. 17.

Leinsdorf conducts a performance of Haydn's "Nelson Mass" on July 13, Brahms' "Requiem" on July 27, and an all-Wagner program on Aug. 24 to include the first concert performance of the finale of "Das Rheingold" with Hanne-Lore Kuhse and Jess Thomas.

Pianist Gina Bachauer is to play at each of the Aug. 9, 10, 11 concerts, and on Aug. 3 Malcolm Frager will play a version of Schumann's Piano Concerto he recently discovered.

Arthur Fiedler makes his annual appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra for the Boston Symphony Pension Fund on Aug. 14 and the Berkshire Music Center benefit, Tanglewood - on - Parade, is scheduled for Aug. 21.

Each weekend through Aug. 25 the orchestra presents concerts on Friday's at 9 p.m. Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. As in the past two summers the Orchestra again offers Weekend Preludes beginning at 7 p.m. for early arrivals to the Friday evening symphony concerts. On Sunday mornings this summer, the ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chamber groups of Symphony players, will give chamber music programs at 10:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre.

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

The Saga of Tanglewood

A newcomer's recent telephone request concerning the genesis of the music festival each summer at Tanglewood led me to believe that, perhaps, there are others in the Albany Area to whom Tanglewood is some kind of recreational center in Massachusetts, although, virtually, in our own back yard.

The great music festival grew from a local project for outdoor concerts in the Lenox, Mass. area.

It was launched in 1934 by the citizens of Berkshire County. At first, an orchestra recruited from The New York Philharmonic Symphony Society was engaged under the direction of the late Henry Hadley. The slogan was: "Music Under the Stars."

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, June 26, 1968

Two years later, the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the late Serge Koussevitzky was brought from their home city, with a shell for the musicians under a canvas tent for the audience. I still remember one concert under that tent and the terrific lightening, thunder and rain which drowned out the orchestra being broadcast on a coast-to-coast network. This was Wagner with sound effects provided by Nature. After several unsuccessful attempts to continue the concert during the lulls in storm, the maestro threw up his hands in despair. He told the trustees that never again would he appear in a tent.

The next step was brought about by a gift to the Boston Symphony Orchestra of a 200-acre estate, known as "Tanglewood" by the family of William Tappen, a Boston banker and merchant. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived there from 1851 to 1853. It was here that the author planned his "Tanglewood Tales," wrote the "Wonder Book" and assembled material for "The House of the Seven Gables." The house in which he lived burned in 1890. A replica on the original site was built in 1948 and presented to the orchestra by the National Federation of Music Clubs for use as a studio by the Berkshire Music Center and its hundreds of students from most of the countries on the globe.

The late Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York City, a summer resident in Lenox, made an appeal following one of the concerts to finance the erection of a shed. She raised nearly $100,000 and the present auditorium, seating 6,000 became a reality. There is a smaller Theater-Concert hall for operatic performances by the students, and a still smaller building for chamber music concerts. Incidentally, Dr. Koussevitzky is buried in the small cemetery back of the white church on the hill in Lenox.

It is amazing to me how many Albany music lovers have never attended any Tanglewood concerts but will drive farther than the 30-odd miles from this city to enjoy a good dinner. Not to have taken advantage of one of the great music festivals of the world in the beautiful New England atmosphere, surrounded by the Berkshire mountains is akin to going to Buffalo without continuing on to Niagara Falls.

To use a baseball term, it will be "fielders choice" come August with the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, the oBstonians starting July 5th. In either case, it will be a great spiritual and recreational experience. Call Lenox 637-1600 for information or tickets.

2.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, June 24, 1968

Berkshire Festival Promises Interesting, Varied Season

LENOX, Mass. — The Berkshire Festival plans a variety of musical offerings this season at its Tanglewood home.

There will be 24 regular festival programs, beginning July 5 and ending Aug. 25, by the Boston Symphony, resident orchestra. In addition, the practice will be continued this year of Weekend Preludes preceding each Friday evening concert. In these participate soloists, members of the orchestra and others.

There is no extra cost for these preludes.

Also to be continued are the Sunday morning chamber music concerts, long a popular portion of a Tanglewood summer. Trios, quartets, and larger ensembles are drawn from the orchestra and play each Sunday at 10:30 a.m.

Tanglewood-on-Parade will return again, with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Aug. 14 in a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

On four Wednesday evenings, the festival will bring to Tanglewood musical groups that represent several important trends in contemporary music. On July 10, it will consist of musical satire; July 17, folk-rock; July 24, non-western music; and July 31, jazz.

These concerts will be an extension of the five-year-old Festival of Contemporary American Music presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

In its regular concerts, the Boston Symphony will display much variety also.

The first two weeks will be given over to chamber orchestra programs including a performance of Haydn's "Lord Nelson Mass." Later in the season, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will present much of Brahms choral music, including "Ein Deutches Requiem," "Gesang de Parzen," and "Schicksalslied."

Pianist Gina Bachauer will appear at each concert on Aug. 9, 10, 11, playing Brahms and Rachmaninoff concerti.

Act 1 from Wagner's "Die Walkure" will be heard on Aug. 24. This will be preceded on the same day by the finale of "Das Rheingold," not previously done in concert. Among the Wagner soloists will be Hanne-Lore Kuhse, returning for her second successive Berkshire Festival season.

On Aug. 3 Malcolm Frager will play a version of the Schumann Piano Concerto which he recently discovered.

Mr. Leinsdorf will share the Boston Symphony podium with eight guest conductors this season: David Zinman, July 12; Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, July 19; Josef Krips, July 28; Sixten Ehrling, Aug. 2; William Steinberg, Aug. 4; Charles Wilson, Aug. 9; Charles Munch, Aug. 17; and Aaron Copland, Aug. 23.

Pianio soloists will include, besides Miss Bachauer and Mr. Frager, Lillian Kallir, July 5 and Aug. 16; Claude Frank, July 7; Grant Johannesen, July 19 and 21; Van Cliburn, July 20; Jorge Bolet, July 26 and Aug. 2, 4. Violinists: James Oliver Buswell 4th, July 5; Joseph Silverstein, July 12 and Aug. 18; Alfred Krips, July 14. Cellists: Martin Hoherman, July 14, and Zara Zelsova, July 19. And Flute: James Pappoutsakis, July 14.

Singers who will sing with the orchestra include, besides Hanne-Lore Kuhse: Beverly Cills, soprano, July 6; Saramae Endich, soprano; Ernrico DeGiuseppe, tenor; Paul Plishka, bass; and Beverly Wolff, mezzo-soprano, July 13; Helen Boatwright, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone, July 27; Roslaind Elias, mezzo-soprano; Jerold Siena, tenor; and Giorgio Tozzi, bass, Aug. 17; and Miss Kuhse, Jess Thomas, tenor, and David Ward, bass, Aug. 24.

July 5, 6, and 7 will be all-Mozart programs. In addition, there will be Beethoven programs July 21 and Aug. 18; Brahms programs Aug. 11 and 25; A. Mendelssohn program Aug. 16; a Wagner program Aug. 24.

Tanglewood Festival

Since being engaged as one of several guest conductors for this year's Berkshire Music Festival, which opens this week, William Steinberg was chosen to succeed Erich Leinsdorf next year as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the whole Tanglewood establishment. Thus his single appearance at the Aug. 4 concert will have special significance.

Mr. Steinberg is no stranger there. He conducted twice last summer, one all-Beethoven program and one all-Russian, as well as two concerts in 1964. Thus the veteran leader of the Pittsburg Symphony, who will continue in that position even after taking charge at Boston, is well known to Tanglewood audiences and to the Boston musicians, and is quite familiar with the conditions and demands.

Mr. Leinsdorf, however, whose retirement does not take effect until after the 1969 Tanglewood festival, will conduct 16 of this summer's 24 concerts in the Music Shed, and presumably most of next summer's, too. Having succeeded Charles Munch as head of the Boston Symphony in the fall of 1962, this is his sixth Tanglewood season.

Whatever Mr. Leinsdorf's future plans may be, he doubtless will be available for guest appearances with the "BSO," both at Symphony and at Tanglewood. Mr. Steinberg, dividing his time between two authorities is likely to make fewer appearances elsewhere. At the time of his Boston appointment it was stated that his tenure there was tentatively for three years.

After that the Boston orchestra's future could conceivably be entrusted permanently to some younger man. A somewhat similar situation exists with the New York Philharmonic, where the Cleveland maestro George Szell will also serve as adviser and guest conductor for "an interim period" after Leonard Bernstein retires next year.

Besides Mr. Steinberg, guest conductors at Tanglewood during the next few weeks will include Aaron Copland, Sixten Ehrling, Josef Krips, Charles Munch, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, Charles Wilson and David Zinman, podium debuts there for Krips, Wilson and Zinman. Van Cliburn heads the list of guest pianists, which also includes Malcolm Frager, Jorge Bolet, Grant Johannesen, Gina Bachauer and others.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will perform two violin concertos. Much vocal music is being heard at Tanglewood nowadays more than formerly.

The Music Shed concerts are only one facade of the festival, however, and of the Berkshire Music Center edifice, which provides study and practice, with expert instruction, as well as consummate performance. This year's opening date, July 5, is the latest since 1963.

Tanglewood Is Treat Within Easy Reach

By GERRY RAKER

Tanglewood is a treat within easy reach and one which will provide many delightful memories long after one can recall passages of the music. About to begin its 87th season, the Boston Symphony will perform the 31st Berkshire Festival this summer.

Our suggestion is to take a picnic, whether you plan to take in an evening or Sunday afternoon concert. There are picnic tables set up under a roof. Paper napkins are offered and hot and cold drinks may be purchased. There are also complete box lunches, prepared by a restaurant chain, which may be bought. The grounds are lush and green and spacious enough to provide picnickers who prefer it, a place to spread a blanket and dine on the lawns.

If there's a particular concert you wish to attend you will probably do well to send ahead for reservations. However, one of the nicest aspects of attending Tanglewood concerts, is that there are usually tickets at the box office for a seat for each performance and many prefer to listen to the music from a blanket on the grass for which admission is reasonable. These spaces are almost always available.

Take Extra Wear

Before leaving home be sure you've taken an extra sweater or jacket because the night air is cool in the Berkshires. This is good advice whether you buy seats in the shed or sit on the ground. We have also found that the ground gets damp toward evening, and a plastic tablecloth used for your picnic, would serve nicely under your blanket during the concert.

Informal clothing for both men and women is acceptable. One sees everything worn there.

There are so many exceptionally appealing aspects of a trip to Tanglewood, it's difficult to say which is the most special, but surely in the forefront are the views as one drives north on the Taconic Pakway. Head up that way and try to leave yourself enough time to take it all in if it's a clear day. There are several lookouts along the way.

At the end of the Taconic take the Berkshire spur of the New York Thruway going East and exit after the first toll. If you ask at the toll gate for directions to Tanglewood you will be handed a map especially printed for that purpose which will make the rest of your trip simple. If you allow yourself one and one half hours from Poughkeepsie, you'll be fine.

Scenery Beautiful

The scenery at Tanglewood is beautiful and after you've picnicked you'll want to walk around a bit. If you aren't going to buy the more expensive seats in the shed, but still want to get a look at the orchestra and conductor as they perform, you can take a folding chair or your blanket to the side lawn, which is small, but if you're early you'll find a few blades of grass for yourself, and from there you can get a fair look at the stage. There is much to be said for either viewing and listening from inside or out under the stars.

A pair of binoculars helps if you're one of those who enjoys seeing the expressions on the musicians' faces or seeks a better acquaintance with conductor or soloist.

During a brief intermission you may want to get a cold or hot drink in the picnic table area previously mentioned. This is a superbly organized coffee break, with many hundreds of people in four intertwining lines being served within the space of 10 or 20 minutes. If you find your coffee so hot you can't get it down fast enough, or if you were one of those who made up your mind to get someting at the last second and brought up the rear of the line, you may find that as you approach the shed, the concert is already underway again. (If you are on the lawn, this should prove no problem, provided you can step gingerly enough to avoid trampling other music lovers.

As you approach the shed, you will find velvet ropes keeping you back, and an overseer with flashlight who will not admit you to your seat unless you can show your stubs. Hang on to those Stubs!

After you've bravo'ed and applauded and collected your things and found your way back to your car, be prepared to sti a bit, or move slowly at best. Despite numerous policemen and others directing traffic, there is a tie-up, so relax and talk over the pleasures of a wonderful afternoon or evening.

Poughkeepsie Journal
FAMILY FUN Saturday, June 8, 1968 Page 6

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 327,594 SUN. 356,929
JUN 8 1968

Berkshire Season To Open July 5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the thirty-first Berkshire Festival at its summer home, Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) on July 5. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, who begins his sixth season as the Festival's director, will conduct the opening concert, a Mozart program, in the 6000-seat Music Shed.

Each weekend through Aug. 25 the orchestra presents concerts on Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. As in the past two summers the orchestra again offers Weekend Preludes beginning at 7 p.m. for early arrivals to the Friday evening Symphony concerts. On Sunday mornings this summer the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, chamber groups of symphony players, will give chamber music programs

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950
JUN 30 1968
New England Newsclip

PABLO CASALS will be joined by similarly inspired fellow-artists at the Marlboro Festival

HERALDING THE FESTIVALS

Don't I hear waltzes, songs, overtures, symphonies, singers, concerti, and soft summer breezes?

ERICH LEINSDORF once more masterminds the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

SARATOGA (above) is summer home of Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet

NANCY WILSON (top left) and Bobbie Gentry (center) are among stars of Forest Hills Music Festival; Harry Belafonte (below left) is one of the celebrities in the Garden State Arts Center Festival

"CONDUCTED" trips! — Outdoor music is now as much a part of vacations as are birds, bees, bugs, butterflies, and let's-get-away-and-into-it-all. Three more potentially major fêtes champêtres make bows this year: in New Jersey, the Waterloo Village Music Festival and the Garden State Arts Center Festival; in Pennsylvania, the Temple University Music Festival/Institute. ► At the "restored hamlet" of Waterloo Village (the Andover Forge of the 1700's), the New Jersey Symphony and its new conductor, Henry Lewis, feature such performers as Marian Anderson and Gold and Fizdale (June 29); Guiomar Novaes (July 6); Janos Starker (July 13); Eugene Istomin (July 20); Gina Bachauer (Aug. 3); Van Cliburn (Aug. 17); and, climactically, Marilyn Horne (Aug. 31). . . . ► The Garden State Arts Center evenings, now in progress, are notable for versatility. Sample these samplings: Mr. Lewis and the New Jersey Symphony with soprano Patricia Brooks and "Carmina Burana" (June 24); that conductor and orchestra with Roberta Peters and Jan Peerce (July 1); Victor Borge, Leonid Hambro (July 5, 6); Peter, Paul, and Mary (July 12); Judy Collins, Arlo Guthrie (July 13); Antal Dorati leading the Royal Philharmonic (July 15); Diana Ross, the Supremes, George Kirby (July 22-27); Harry Belafonte (July 30-Aug. 3); Andy Williams, Peter Nero (Aug. 5-10); and this reporter's favorite dancers, the Joffrey Ballet (Aug. 21-24, Aug. 26-31). . . . ► The Temple University Festival (near Philadelphia) can boast of such as the Lenox Quartet (June 26; July 3, 10, 17); the fast-developing Pennsylvania Ballet Company (June 27; July 4, 11, 18); Duke Ellington (July 25); Leonard Rose, Eugene Istomin (July 5); Ella Fitzgerald (July 12, 13); Elisabeth Schwarzkopf (July 19, 21); Richard Tucker (Aug. 2, 4); and others.

The classical stalwarts—again—are Marlboro, Tanglewood, and Saratoga. ► The Marlboro weekends open an eighteenth season on July 6 and conclude on August 16. Pablo Casals, now 91, will be in residence, but when he may conduct is not now known. Participating artists will include Rudolf Serkin, Mieczyslaw Horszowski, Ruth Laredo, Pina Carmirelli, Jaime Laredo, Alexander Schneider, Boris Kroyt, Madeline Foley, Mischa Schneider, Bethany Beardslee, Benita Valente, and Thomas Paul—they and associative performers having partaken of the Casals charisma. . . . ► Weekends at Tanglewood begin July 5 and conclude on August 25. Although Erich Leinsdorf shepherds most of the programs, guest conductors include Stanislaw Skrowaczewski (July 19); Josef Krips (July 28); Sixten Ehrling (Aug. 2); William Steinberg (Aug. 4); Charles Munch (Aug. 17); and Aaron Copland (Aug. 23). Composers represented run a gamut from Bach to Strauss and Wagner and Mahler to Stravinsky and other contemporaries. . . . ► At Saratoga, the New York City Balanchine ballet troupe presents its glitter (July 4-7, 9-14, 16-21, 23-28); its co-resident, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy and guest conductors, also is headlined (Aug. 1-4, 8-11, 15-18, 22-25). Some of the other Saratoga people are Ray Charles (June 26); Dinah Shore (June 27); Al Hirt (July 15); Ravi Shankar and India Festival (Aug. 6, 7); Simon and Garfunkel (Aug. 19); and Rowan and Martin (Aug. 31, Sept. 1).

The Newport Jazz Festival (July 4-7) jumps with Count Basie, Cannonball Adderley, Nina Simone, others (July 4); a "Big Band Salute" (Basie, Duke Ellington, Dizzy Gillespie, Woody Herman, Benny Carter, others—July 5); Ellington, Dionne Warwick, Hugh Masekela, others (July 6); Wes Montgomery, Ramsey Lewis, Don Ellis, others (July 7). Afternoon bashes include those by Ray Charles (July 7) and Duke Ellington and Tal Farlow (July 6). . . . ► At Newport's Folk Festival (July 23-28), you'll find the Kweskin Jug Band, a sing-along Hootenanny, workshops, Tim Buckley, John Hartford, and others. Is Newport going commercial?—it lists, in a $3.75-$7.50 price range, Harry Belafonte (July 20); Andy Williams (Aug. 3); The Tijuana Brass (Aug. 10).

In the RC Cola/Forest Hills Music Festival, vaudeville lives on. Through the demonstrative crowds, look for Nancy Wilson and the Fifth Dimension (June 27); Judy Collins, Arlo Guthrie (June 29); Peter, Paul, and Mary (July 13); Trini Lopez, Lainie Kazan (July 20); Bobbie Gentry and The Four Seasons (July 27); Diana Ross, the Supremes (Aug. 3); Simon and Garfunkel (Aug. 17); and others.

Wherever you go, from molten city pavements propelled, music reigns. ► The Provincetown Music Festival stars Jeanne-Marie Darré on July 8; Indrani and dancers and musicians of India, July 26; Odetta, Aug. 10; and the New York Pro Musica, Aug. 31. . . . ► The Lake George Opera Company promises Rossini's "Otello" with Frances Bible (July 13) and stagings of Benjamin Britten's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and a premiere of David Amram's "Twelfth Night." Melodious Shakespeare. . . . ► Far to the north (in Stratford, Ontario), that annual convocation sings with Rossini's "La Cenerentola" in English (Avon Theatre, July 6) and proceeds to such as Duke Ellington (July 7); Daniel Barenboim, Jacqueline Du Pré, the English Chamber Orchestra (July 14); Judith Raskin and conductor George Schick (Aug. 4).

Performers ail, are vulnerable, and cancel when it's necessary. See Cue's listings always when making plans. But if festively we pass, wave in tempo.

—GREER JOHNSON

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

JUN 22 1968

From Van Cliburn to Tiny Tim

N.E. summer theater has everything

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — Attractions ranging from Imogene Coca to Tiny Tim and Carmel Quinn to Van Cliburn will enliven New England's straw hat and turtleneck sweater circuit this summer.

Pick about any star from Broadway, television, night clubs, the movies or the concert stage. More than likely the name will appear on a poster somewhere in the six states.

Music and drama, as usual, will dominate the entertainment scene but a circus from Europe will be one added feature in Boston - area summer theatres this year.

One of the most - anticipated pre - Broadway events will be the five-week premiere engagement in Boston of Ervin Drake's new musical, "Her First Roman," opening July 29 at an in-town theater. Based on George Bernard Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," it stars Tony Award winners Richard Kiley and Leslie Uggams.

Hans Conreid and Dody Goodman will offer "Don't Drink the Water" and Chita Rivera will headline "Sweet Charity."

Other Broadway Hits

Also from Broadway, John Raitt will star as "The Music Man." Ann Corio and Sherry Briton each will have a burlesque show. And there will be in-the-round revivals of the perennial hits, "The Sound of Music" and "West Side Story."

Noel Harrison will represent the English music halls in "Half a Sixpence."

Hollywood favorites Tom Poston and Dan Dailey will compete with their own medium by appearing in "The Odd Couple," which now also is a current feature picture.

Also from the night club and TV world come Danny Kaye; Ed Ames; Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca; Allan Sherman and Carmel Quinn; the New Christy Minstrels; the Cowsills; Judy Collins; Liberace; Tiny Tim; Theodore Bikel; the Young Rascals; Ray Charles, and Andy Williams with Peter Nero.

For younger showgoers there will be Hetzer's European Circus; The Mad Shoe; Jimmie Hendrix; Vanilla Fudge; The Union Gap; the Ultimate Spinach, and Tammy Grimes.

Elsewhere in Massachusetts, the eight - weekend Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf. Among the guest conductors will be Aaron Copland, Josef Krips, Charles Munch, the orchestra's director — emeritus, and William Steinberg, who will succeed Leinsdorf in the fall of 1969. Soloists at Tanglewood will include pianists Cliburn, Jorge Bolet and Gina Bachauer and opera singers Beverly Sills, Rosalind Elias, Jess Thomas and Giorgio Tozzi.

The Oberlin College Players will stage Gilbert and Sullivan operettas at Highfield and Falmouth. Chamber music, instrumental, vocal or orchestral concerts are planned also at Gloucester, Ipswich, Nantucket, New Marlboro, Northampton, Pittsfield and Provincetown.

In Rhode Island, the four-day Newport Jazz Festival will open July 4, featuring Count Basie, Duke Ellington, Ramsey Lewis, Nina Simone and Dionne Warwick. The Newport Folk Festival from July 23 to 28 has booked Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Pete Seegar, Roy Acuff, Arlo Guthrie and Bikel.

More Musicals

The other New England states also scheduled many musical and dramatic events. Summer-long Pops concerts will be held at the Yale Bowl in New Haven.

In Maine, Bar Harbor Festival concerts will be given July 24 to Aug. 2; the Monteux Festival, named for the late conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be held in Hancock from July 14 to Aug. 25; and Bowdoin College will offer chamber music concerts from July 11 to Aug. 15.

The New Hampshire Music Festival will run from July 11 to Aug. 15 at Center Harbor and the Hopkins Center of Dartmouth College has scheduled chamber music and orchestra concerts through Aug. 31.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

JUN 26 1968

New England Newsclip

Summer Programs Announced For Tanglewood, Saratoga

By BERNARD LOTH

The time has come again to think of the infinite variety of concerts, opera and musical comedy available to music lovers with an evening's drive from THE EVENING NEWS area.

Starting with the greatest driving distance, we have a two-hour plus drive to Saratoga Springs or to Tanglewood.

To reach Saratoga in the alloted time, one must take the Thruway and the Northway.

The Saratoga schedule offers the widest possible range of programs, from the New York City Ballet nightly except Mondays from July 4 to July 28 and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy and guest conductors with outstanding soloists appearing Thursdays through Sundays from Aug. 1 to 25 to the Supremes on Aug. 5, Simon and Garfunkel on Aug. 19 and Rowan and Martin "Laff in" on Aug. 31 and Sept. 1. In addition chamber music will be performed most Mondays by groups from the New York City Ballet Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra, by the Cardiff (Wales) Polyphonic Choir, the McGill Chamber Orchestra and many solo artists.

The other lighter programs scheduled include two evenings with Victor Borge and the Ballet Orchestra, Shankar, Ray Charles, The Fifth Dimension, Dinah Shore, and Peter, Paul and Mary.

The full program can be secured by writing to the Performning Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. 12866.

Among the ballets to be performed by the New York City Ballet will be their world-famous version of "The Nutcracker" during the first week, "The Jewels" which created great excitement in its debut performances last winter and an all-Stravinsky program including "Firebird" during the second week; "Swan Lake and an all Tschaikovsky program the third week; and a variety of programs the fourth week and sprinkled in during the second and third weeks.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will offer considerable variety in its programs with the North American premiere of Ginastera's Psalm 150 for chorus and orchestra and Mahler's first Symphony on Aug. 1, William Steinberg conducting a Beethoven program on Aug. 2 with Rudolf Firkusny playing the third Piano Concerto, a popular all-Russian program on Aug. 3 and Arthur Fiedler and Richard Rogers sharing the podium on Sunday, Aug. 4, in a Rodgers and Hammerstein evening with soloists and chorus.

Other programs include Van Cliburn playing Rachmaninoff and Grieg; John Browing playing Prokofieff, Earl Wild playing Gershwin; Benny Goodman playing Mozart, Martina Arroyo singing Richard and Johann Strauss and Julius Rudel conducting "Carmen" in concert form with artists of the New York City Opera.

The other two hour plus mecca of music, Tanglewood, can be reached either by the Thruway and the Massachusetts spur or by route 9 and the Taconic. Here the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, gives concerts from July 5 to Aug. 25th inclusive on Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Preceding the Friday concerts at 7 p.m. and free to those holding tickets for the Friday evening concert, soloists and members of the orchestra appear in Weekend Preludes. Chamber music is also presented on Sundays at 10:30 a.m.

Contemporary music is featured with "exciting musical groups" on four Wednesday evenings starting July 10 when Musical Satire will be demonstrated; on July 17th Folk-Rock Music; on the 24th Non-Western Music,,' and on the 31st, Jazz.

The Symphony schedule lists eight guest conductors, including Aaron Copland who will be a guest conductor of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic next season, seven pianists, three violinists, two cellists, one flautist, 13 singers, one narrator and four choruses. The first two weeks feature chamber works of Mozart, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Boccherini and Teleman. The third week will feature Cliburn playing Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto on Saturday and Johannesen playing Beethoven's Emperor Concerto on Sunday.

On July 27 Brahm's "Requiem" will be presented. Gina Bachauer will be featured on Aug. 9 in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 on Aug. 10 in Rachmaninoff's 2nd and on Aug. 11 in Brahm's second Piano Concert. On Aug. 17 the Berlioz Opera "Romeo and Juliet" will be performed with Rosalind Elias, mezzo, Jerold Siena, tenor and Giorgio Tozzi bass. Aaron Copland will conduct on Aug. 23. Leindorf will conduct scene from wagner on the 24 and the season will close on Aug. 25 with a Brahms program.

For information write Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

NEWBURGH-BEACON NEWS
Wednesday, May 29, 1968

PABLO CASALS will be joined by similarly inspired fellow-artists at the Marlboro Festival

HERALDING THE FESTIVALS

Don't I hear waltzes, songs, overtures, symphonies, singers, concerti, and soft summer breezes?

ERICH LEINSDORF once more masterminds the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

SARATOGA (above) is summer home of Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet

NANCY WILSON (top left) and Bobbie Gentry (center) are among stars of Forest Hills Music Festival; Harry Belafonte (below left) is one of the celebrities in the Garden State Arts Center Festival

"CONDUCTED" trips! — Outdoor music is now as much a part of vacations as are birds, bees, bugs, butterflies, and let's-get-away-and-into-it-all. Three more potentially major fêtes champêtres make bows this year: in New Jersey, the Waterloo Village Music Festival and the Garden State Arts Center Festival; in Pennsylvania, the Temple University Music Festival/Institute. ► At the "restored hamlet" of Waterloo Village (the Andover Forge of the 1700's), the New Jersey Symphony and its new conductor, Henry Lewis, feature such performers as Marian Anderson and Gold and Fizdale (June 29); Guiomar Novaes (July 6); Janos Starker (July 13); Eugene Istomin (July 20); Gina Bachauer (Aug. 3); Van Cliburn (Aug. 17); and, climactically, Marilyn Horne (Aug. 31). . . . ► The Garden State Arts Center evenings, now in progress, are notable for versatility. Sample these samplings: Mr. Lewis and the New Jersey Symphony with soprano Patricia Brooks and "Carmina Burana" (June 24); that conductor and orchestra with Roberta Peters and Jan Peerce (July 1); Victor Borge, Leonid Hambro (July 5, 6); Peter, Paul, and Mary (July 12); Judy Collins, Arlo Guthrie (July 13); Antal Dorati leading the Royal Philharmonic (July 15); Diana Ross, the Supremes, George Kirby (July 22-27); Harry Belafonte (July 30-Aug. 3); Andy Williams, Peter Nero (Aug. 5-10); and this reporter's favorite dancers, the Joffrey Ballet (Aug. 21-24, Aug. 26-31). . . . ► The Temple University Festival (near Philadelphia) can boast of such as the Lenox Quartet (June 26; July 3, 10, 17); the fast-developing Pennsylvania Ballet Company (June 27; July 4, 11, 18); Duke Ellington (July 25); Leonard Rose, Eugene Istomin (July 5); Ella Fitzgerald (July 12, 13); Elisabeth Schwarzkopf (July 19, 21); Richard Tucker (Aug. 2, 4); and others.

The classical stalwarts—again—are Marlboro, Tanglewood, and Saratoga. ► The Marlboro weekends open an eighteenth season on July 6 and conclude on August 16. Pablo Casals, now 91, will be in residence, but when he may conduct is not now known. Participating artists will include Rudolf Serkin, Mieczyslaw Horszowski, Ruth Laredo, Pina Carmirelli, Jaime Laredo, Alexander Schneider, Boris Kroyt, Madeline Foley, Mischa Schneider, Bethany Beardslee, Benita Valente, and Thomas Paul—they and associative performers having partaken of the Casals charisma. . . . ► Weekends at Tanglewood begin July 5 and conclude on August 25. Although Erich Leinsdorf shepherds most of the programs, guest conductors include Stanislaw Skrowaczewski (July 19); Josef Krips (July 28); Sixten Ehrling (Aug. 2); William Steinberg (Aug. 4); Charles Munch (Aug. 17); and Aaron Copland (Aug. 23). Composers represented run a gamut from Bach to Strauss and Wagner and Mahler to Stravinsky and other contemporaries. . . . ► At Saratoga, the New York City Balanchine ballet troupe presents its glitter (July 4-7, 9-14, 16-21, 23-28); its co-resident, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy and guest conductors, also is headlined (Aug. 1-4, 8-11, 15-18, 22-25). Some of the other Saratoga people are Ray Charles (June 26); Dinah Shore (June 27); Al Hirt (July 15); Ravi Shankar and India Festival (Aug. 6, 7); Simon and Garfunkel (Aug. 19); and Rowan and Martin (Aug. 31, Sept. 1).

The Newport Jazz Festival (July 4-7) jumps with Count Basie, Cannonball Adderley, Nina Simone, others (July 4); a "Big Band Salute" (Basie, Duke Ellington, Dizzy Gillespie, Woody Herman, Benny Carter, others—July 5); Ellington, Dionne Warwick, Hugh Masekela, others (July 6); Wes Montgomery, Ramsey Lewis, Don Ellis, others (July 7). Afternoon bashes include those by Ray Charles (July 7) and Duke Ellington and Tal Farlow (July 6). . . . ► At Newport's Folk Festival (July 23-28), you'll find the Kweskin Jug Band, a sing-along Hootenanny, workshops, Tim Buckley, John Hartford, and others. Is Newport going commercial?—it lists, in a $3.75-$7.50 price range, Harry Belafonte (July 20); Andy Williams (Aug. 3); The Tijuana Brass (Aug. 10).

In the RC Cola/Forest Hills Music Festival, vaudeville lives on. Through the demonstrative crowds, look for Nancy Wilson and the Fifth Dimension (June 27); Judy Collins, Arlo Guthrie (June 29); Peter, Paul, and Mary (July 13); Trini Lopez, Lainie Kazan (July 20); Bobbie Gentry and The Four Seasons (July 27); Diana Ross, the Supremes (Aug. 3); Simon and Garfunkel (Aug. 17); and others.

Wherever you go, from molten city pavements propelled, music reigns. ► The Provincetown Music Festival stars Jeanne-Marie Darré on July 8; Indrani and dancers and musicians of India, July 26; Odetta, Aug. 10; and the New York Pro Musica, Aug. 31. . . . ► The Lake George Opera Company promises Rossini's "Otello" with Frances Bible (July 13) and stagings of Benjamin Britten's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and a premiere of David Amram's "Twelfth Night." Melodious Shakespeare. . . . ► Far to the north (in Stratford, Ontario), that annual convocation sings with Rossini's "La Cenerentola" in English (Avon Theatre, July 6) and proceeds to such as Duke Ellington (July 7); Daniel Barenboim, Jacqueline Du Pré, the English Chamber Orchestra (July 14); Judith Raskin and conductor George Schick (Aug. 4).

Performers ail, are vulnerable, and cancel when it's necessary. See Cue's listings always when making plans. But if festively we pass, wave in tempo.

—GREER JOHNSON

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

JUN 22 1968

From Van Cliburn to Tiny Tim

N.E. summer theater has everything

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — Attractions ranging from Imogene Coca to Tiny Tim and Carmel Quinn to Van Cliburn will enliven New England's straw hat and turtleneck sweater circuit this summer.

Pick about any star from Broadway, television, night clubs, the movies or the concert stage. More than likely the name will appear on a poster somewhere in the six states.

Music and drama, as usual, will dominate the entertainment scene but a circus from Europe will be one added feature in Boston - area summer theatres this year.

One of the most - anticipated pre - Broadway events will be the five-week premiere engagement in Boston of Ervin Drake's new musical, "Her First Roman," opening July 29 at an in-town theater. Based on George Bernard Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," it stars Tony Award winners Richard Kiley and Leslie Uggams.

Hans Conreid and Dody Goodman will offer "Don't Drink the Water" and Chita Rivera will headline "Sweet Charity."

Other Broadway Hits

Also from Broadway, John Raitt will star as "The Music Man." Ann Corio and Sherry Briton each will have a burlesque show. And there will be in-the-round revivals of the perennial hits, "The Sound of Music" and "West Side Story."

Noel Harrison will represent the English music halls in "Half a Sixpence."

Hollywood favorites Tom Poston and Dan Dailey will compete with their own medium by appearing in "The Odd Couple," which now also is a current feature picture.

Also from the night club and TV world come Danny Kaye; Ed Ames; Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca; Allan Sherman and Carmel Quinn; the New Christy Minstrels; the Cowsills; Judy Collins; Liberace; Tiny Tim; Theodore Bikel; the Young Rascals; Ray Charles, and Andy Williams with Peter Nero.

For younger showgoers there will be Hetzer's European Circus; The Mad Shoe; Jimmie Hendrix; Vanilla Fudge; The Union Gap; the Ultimate Spinach, and Tammy Grimes.

Elsewhere in Massachusetts, the eight - weekend Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Erich Leinsdorf. Among the guest conductors will be Aaron Copland, Josef Krips, Charles Munch, the orchestra's director — emeritus, and William Steinberg, who will succeed Leinsdorf in the fall of 1969. Soloists at Tanglewood will include pianists Cliburn, Jorge Bolet and Gina Bachauer and opera singers Beverly Sills, Rosalind Elias, Jess Thomas and Giorgio Tozzi.

The Oberlin College Players will stage Gilbert and Sullivan operettas at Highfield and Falmouth. Chamber music, instrumental, vocal or orchestral concerts are planned also at Gloucester, Ipswich, Nantucket, New Marlboro, Northampton, Pittsfield and Provincetown.

In Rhode Island, the four-day Newport Jazz Festival will open July 4, featuring Count Basie, Duke Ellington, Ramsey Lewis, Nina Simone and Dionne Warwick. The Newport Folk Festival from July 23 to 28 has booked Joan Baez, Bob Dylan, Pete Seegar, Roy Acuff, Arlo Guthrie and Bikel.

More Musicals

The other New England states also scheduled many musical and dramatic events. Summer-long Pops concerts will be held at the Yale Bowl in New Haven.

In Maine, Bar Harbor Festival concerts will be given July 24 to Aug. 2; the Monteux Festival, named for the late conductor of the Boston Symphony, will be held in Hancock from July 14 to Aug. 25; and Bowdoin College will offer chamber music concerts from July 11 to Aug. 15.

The New Hampshire Music Festival will run from July 11 to Aug. 15 at Center Harbor and the Hopkins Center of Dartmouth College has scheduled chamber music and orchestra concerts through Aug. 31.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

JUN 26 1968

New England Newsclip

Summer Programs Announced For Tanglewood, Saratoga

By BERNARD LOTH

The time has come again to think of the infinite variety of concerts, opera and musical comedy available to music lovers with an evening's drive from THE EVENING NEWS area.

Starting with the greatest driving distance, we have a two-hour plus drive to Saratoga Springs or to Tanglewood.

To reach Saratoga in the alloted time, one must take the Thruway and the Northway.

The Saratoga schedule offers the widest possible range of programs, from the New York City Ballet nightly except Mondays from July 4 to July 28 and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy and guest conductors with outstanding soloists appearing Thursdays through Sundays from Aug. 1 to 25 to the Supremes on Aug. 5, Simon and Garfunkel on Aug. 19 and Rowan and Martin "Laff in" on Aug. 31 and Sept. 1. In addition chamber music will be performed most Mondays by groups from the New York City Ballet Orchestra and the Philadelphia Orchestra, by the Cardiff (Wales) Polyphonic Choir, the McGill Chamber Orchestra and many solo artists.

The other lighter programs scheduled include two evenings with Victor Borge and the Ballet Orchestra, Shankar, Ray Charles, The Fifth Dimension, Dinah Shore, and Peter, Paul and Mary.

The full program can be secured by writing to the Performning Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. 12866.

Among the ballets to be performed by the New York City Ballet will be their world-famous version of "The Nutcracker" during the first week, "The Jewels" which created great excitement in its debut performances last winter and an all-Stravinsky program including "Firebird" during the second week; "Swan Lake and an all Tschaikovsky program the third week; and a variety of programs the fourth week and sprinkled in during the second and third weeks.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will offer considerable variety in its programs with the North American premiere of Ginastera's Psalm 150 for chorus and orchestra and Mahler's first Symphony on Aug. 1, William Steinberg conducting a Beethoven program on Aug. 2 with Rudolf Firkusny playing the third Piano Concerto, a popular all-Russian program on Aug. 3 and Arthur Fiedler and Richard Rogers sharing the podium on Sunday, Aug. 4, in a Rodgers and Hammerstein evening with soloists and chorus.

Other programs include Van Cliburn playing Rachmaninoff and Grieg; John Browing playing Prokofieff, Earl Wild playing Gershwin; Benny Goodman playing Mozart, Martina Arroyo singing Richard and Johann Strauss and Julius Rudel conducting "Carmen" in concert form with artists of the New York City Opera.

The other two hour plus mecca of music, Tanglewood, can be reached either by the Thruway and the Massachusetts spur or by route 9 and the Taconic. Here the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director, gives concerts from July 5 to Aug. 25th inclusive on Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Preceding the Friday concerts at 7 p.m. and free to those holding tickets for the Friday evening concert, soloists and members of the orchestra appear in Weekend Preludes. Chamber music is also presented on Sundays at 10:30 a.m.

Contemporary music is featured with "exciting musical groups" on four Wednesday evenings starting July 10 when Musical Satire will be demonstrated; on July 17th Folk-Rock Music; on the 24th Non-Western Music,' and on the 31st, Jazz.

The Symphony schedule lists eight guest conductors, including Aaron Copland who will be a guest conductor of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic next season, seven pianists, three violinists, two cellists, one flautist, 13 singers, one narrator and four choruses. The first two weeks feature chamber works of Mozart, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Boccherini and Teleman. The third week will feature Cliburn playing Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto on Saturday and Johannesen playing Beethoven's Emperor Concerto on Sunday.

On July 27 Brahm's "Requiem" will be presented. Gina Bachauer will be featured on Aug. 9 in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 on Aug. 10 in Rachmaninoff's 2nd and on Aug. 11 in Brahm's second Piano Concert. On Aug. 17 the Berlioz Opera "Romeo and Juliet" will be performed with Rosalind Elias, mezzo, Jerold Siena, tenor and Giorgio Tozzi bass. Aaron Copland will conduct on Aug. 23. Leindorf will conduct scene from wagner on the 24 and the season will close on Aug. 25 with a Brahms program.

For information write Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

NEWBURGH-BEACON NEWS
Wednesday, May 29, 1968

News Of Music

'Under The Stars' Series Starts Season Sunday

Szor To Direct In Zoo Amphitheater; Bollin Announced As Commentator

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

The "Music Under the Stars" series of free concerts, featuring classical and popular band numbers, will open Sunday, July 7, at 8 p.m. in the Toledo Zoo Amphitheater.

Samuel P. Szor again will direct the summer concerts, which last season attracted 50,000 listeners. The outdoor concerts are sponsored by the Toledo Edison Co.

Thomas Bollin will be the commentator.

Park Series To Present Tony Celeste Orchestra

The Tony Celeste Orchestra, just returned from a tour with the Bobby Hackett Show, will be the attraction next Sunday afternoon at 4 in the Music-in-the-Park series in Ottawa Park near the shelter house, sponsored by the city recreation division.

Mr.Celeste will build the musical program of the afternoon as the program progresses. The concert, presented through the Music Performance Trust Fund of the Recording Industries, will feature the new sounds of the "big band." Open and free to the public.

Young Toledoans Helen C. Fitts, Lucy Dasher, April Edith Graham, and Mrs. Joseph Kiss are among the students studying at the St. Louis Institute of Music this summer. All are students of Arietta C. Beinke, of Columbia Street.

Alicia de Larrocha, Spanish pianist who was scheduled to perform in Ann Arbor's Rackham Auditorium Thursday night, has a broken thumb and will be unable to appear.

Music Educators Work Under $1.3 Million Grant

The Music Educators National Conference will continue and expand its Contemporary Music Project under a five-year grant of $1,340,000 from the Ford project has placed 3 young Foundation.

Since its inception in 1959, this project has placed 73 young composers in public school systems to compose with and for music educators and students of music at all grade levels. One result of this program is the offering of some 500 works by these composers in the CMP Library, from which manuscripts are made available through micro-filming and other copying methods.

Festival To Open On Michigan Campus

Meadow Brook Festival opens its fifth season Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in its own setting on the campus of Oakland University in Rochester, Mich., north of Detroit.

The concert will launch an eight-week schedule of 34 major musical events, featuring the Detroit Symphony Orchestra with Sixten Ehrling conducting, guest conductors, and a large list of guest artists.

The bells of Beaumont Tower will ring as Michigan State University in East Lansing begins its carillon concerts, played by Wendell Westcott thrice weekly — Tuesday and Thursday at 4 p.m. and Sunday at 8 p.m. until July 30. Following each concert there will be a tour of the belfry.

Ravinia Festival Starting In Chicago

Thursday will mark the start of another season of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago. There will be symphony concerts, 13 celebrated pianists, 5 violinists, 3 cellists, and 3 vocalists, plus dancers, chamber music, guest conductors, and 13 jazz-folk programs with singing and instrumental groups. In residence will be the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

The Boston ymphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., opens its season Sunday with an impressive listing of guest soloists, the Fellow hip Program with 150 pre-porfessional musicians, and the institute, comprising various programs. Gunther Schuller, distinguished composer and head of the New England Conservatory of Music in bBoston, again heads the Contemporary Music activities.

Congregation Of Arts Slated At Dartmouth

Also opening Sunday and running through Aug. 31 is the sixth Dartmouth Congregation of the Arts at the Hopkins Center in Hanover, N.H. Argentine composer Alberto Ginastera will be the composer-in-residence, with Mario di Bonaventura conducting the Dartmouth Symphony Orchestra.

July 3 heralds the opening of the 32nd season of the Brevard Music Center in North Carolina. Under the direction of Henry Janiec, it comprises four symphony orchestras, a resident opera company, bands and choral organizations, and the usual vocal and instrumental ensembles. There are some 300 students, aged 12-21, and a faculty of 100.

Dvorak: Symphony No. 6 in D, opus 60; Slavonic Dances, No. 2 in E minor, No. 8 in A-flat, opus 72. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA-Victor LM-3017.

One does not hear half enough of Dvorak's music these days, when his heavenly naturalness can give a lift to the spirit encumbered by the mere technicians. This is an unusualy felicitous recording of Dvorak's Symphony, formerly known as the No. 1, and two of those commissioned dances by his publisher Simrock a la Brahms' Hungarian Dances, which burst forth with Dvorak's usual enthusiasm and lyricism.

Perfect music for a summer day, or for any day for that matter, and highly recommended.

Brahms: Serenade in A, opus 16. New York Philharmonic, Leonard Bernstein conducting. Columbia MS-7312.

A beautiful recording of a beautiful work, which pleased the composer very much as it did Clara Schumann, whose comments he had sought. This is Brahms' second serenade written in the year 1859, composed as he roamed the Teutoburger Forest near Detmold. It is a tender sister — as critic Eduard Hanslick suggested — to the peaceful, dreamy, garden-mood of the Serenade in D. The richness of sound is due no doubt not only to the marvelously colored woodwind writing, but also the the complete absence of the violins. Violas, cellos, and double basses give rich sound to the work.

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphony No. 2, opus 8 (Antar): Miaskovsky: Symphony No. 21, opus 51. Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Morton Gould conducting. RCA-Victor LM-3022.

Despite the fact that "Antar" is a frankly programatic work, based on a story by Syenkovsky about a Seventh-century poet who was the son of an Abyssinian slave, and the Miaskovsky music is purely abstract in inspiration, there does exist a great and genuine stylistic affinity.

Rimsky was to become one of the great influences on the prolific Soviet symphonist Miaskovsky (1181-1950), who "preserved the continuity of Russian musical tradition." The orchestra sounds very good and Gould keeps things moving. A unusual dip into lesser heard Russian music.

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Sibelius: Symphony No. 5 in E-flat, opus 82; Night Rise & Sunrise, opus 55. New Philharmonia Orchestra, Georges Pretre conducting. RCA-Victor LM-2996.

First performed in 1915 on Sibelius' 50th birthday, this subsequently revised composition ranks alongside his Second Symphony as the most popular of his works. The rarely heard companion-piece stems from the year 1909, when Sibelius wrote a tone poem depicting his impressions of a journey taken to Italy 8 years before.

Both works show Sibelius trademarks: kinetic energizing of the orchestra with alternating bucolic, austere, and somber themes. What makes this recording different is the debut by young French conductor Pretre, and he lives up to his reputation as one of the most painstaking of conductors. There is a concentration here and an obviously superb cooperation between conductor and orchestra, and Sibelius emerges triumphant.

Ginastera: Concerto for Piano & Orchestra (1961), Joao Carlos Martins, piano; Variaciones Concertantes, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA-Victor LM-3029.

The now 54-year-old Argentinian composer Alberto Ginastera has long been recognized as an outstanding composer but also as an active teacher, organizer, and promoter of contemporary music in his native land and a founder-director of several conservatories. Ginastera's music always surprises as being not only technically virtuostic, but also truly creative and original. The Piano Concerto proves a rousing experience.

Martins, who gave the premiere of the work when he was 20, plays it now, seven years later, with steel fingers in a most exciting manner. Both works make use of the theme and variations idea which gives rise to infinite and deft shades of orchestral color, all manner of sound effects, and an exhilarating originality. And Leinsdorf and the orchestra add to the headlong impetus of the whole work. A very exciting recording of talent-at-large.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,118
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817

JUN-26-68

Summer is a Musical Festival All Over U.S.

By PAUL HUME, The Washington Post

Memorial Day marks the official opening of vacations that put hundreds of thousands of music lovers on wheels for a few months and it is always exciting to see who is going to make music in the summer and in what new or old surroundings.

This year, there are more new festivals opening than I can remember in any previous year. I have marked as "new" those that come in this category.

Festival Casals, Puerto Rico, May 29 through June 12, with Casals as both conductor such famous names as Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Schneider, Eugene Ormandy, and Mieczyslaw Horszowski. Details from Festival Casals, San Juan, P.R., G.p.o. box 2350.

(New) at Sarasota, Fla., New College's five concerts between June 1 and 15. Chamber music, with a closing orchestral program. Unusual repertoire and noted performers. Information: New College, P.O. Box 1898, Sarasota, Fla., 33578.

Sarasota reminds us of Daytona Beach's festival centering again around the London Symphony Orchestra with famous soloists, guest conductors, and chamber music. Information from the Florida International Music Festival, Daytona Beach, Fla. It opens in July.

Julius Redel is music director of the Caramoor Festival again this year, between June 16 and July 7, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Monteverdi's "Coronation of Poppaea," and a rich variety of other kinds of programs. Information from Audrey Michaels, 315 W. 70th St., New York City 10023.

OF SPECIAL SIGNIFICANCE will be the fourth Inter-American Music Festival in Washington. Between June 19 and 30 there will be 10 concerts, all free, with orchestral, chamber, choral, and solo works by more than 50 composers of this hemisphere. Information from the music division of the Pan American Union.

As soon as the Inter-American Festival is over, The National Symphony will proceed into its first full summer season in its new pavilion at Columbia, Md. It is bringing back the New York City Ballet, and an array of famous soloists. Special interest is directed toward the British cellist Jacqueline DePre and conductor - pianist - husband, Daniel Barenboim. Ticket information from the National Symphony.

(New) One of the largest newcomers to the summer scene is Temple University's new festival institute located at Upper Dublin, about 18 miles north of Philadelphia. In a new multi-million dollar setting, Temple is offering both full musical instruction and a gala series of concerts of all kinds. Information from Temple University Festival, Philadelphia, Penn., 19122.

ON OUR SOUTHERN flank is the Eastern Music Festival at Guilford College, now in its seventh season, with Sheldon Morgenstern as music director, an orchestra in residence, and conerts between June 27 and Aug. 1. Details from the festival, 808 N. Elm St., Greensboro, N.C., 27401.

Ravinia, in the green beauty of Chicago's northern suburbs, runs from June 27 to Aug. 10, with Seiji Ozawa putting together an enviable list of programs, artists, and unusual lures. Information from the Festival Association, 11 S. LaSalle St., Chicago, Ill.

(New) and of particular promise is the Waterloo Village Festival in northern New Jersey. Among the sponsors of the new venture are Serkin, Stern, Mme. Olga Koussevitsky, and the Henry Steinways. A 2,000-seat tent with room for a thousand more outside on the lawn will house the New Jersey symphony and its new conductor, Henry Lewis. Dates are June 29 through Sept. 1. Details from Waterloo Music Festival, care of Nat Dorfman, 165 West 46th St., New York City, 10036.

July 2 will bring the reopening of the Opera House in Sante Fe, N.M., replacing the one that burned last summer. Now enlarged to seat 1,500, the new house, directed by John Crosby, will present a schedule that includes "Butterfly," "Magic Flute," "Rosenkavalier," a new opera by Henze, and several others. Information from Edgar Vincent Associates, 156 East 52nd St., New York City, 10022.

ERICH LEINSDORF AND the Boston Symphony open the country's renowned Tanglewood Concerts on July 5, when they will stay busy until Aug. 25. Information and tickets from Festival Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240.

Marlboro, Vt., opens its 18th season on July 6. Pablo Casals will again be on hand for his eighth summer at the splendid, small center where such great music is made in unusual circumstances. For details write the Marlboro Festival, 129 West 56th St., New York City.

New Hampshire, offers a peripatetic music festival that plays in Center Harbor, Meredith, Wolfeboro, and Tamworth. For details on this unusual arrangement, write to New Hampshire Music Festival, P.O. Box 147, Center Harbor, N.H., 03226. Concerts are between July 11 and Aug. 15.

One of the biggest new spots which I have not even mentioned will be the Cleveland Orchestra's new Blossom Music Center which is scheduled to open on July 19 with a Czell-conducted Beethoven Ninth. Thus far I have no details from Cleveland and many other festivals.

ROCHESTER DEM. CHRONICLE
Sunday, May 26, 1968

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 1968

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 31st season at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., opens July 5 for eight weeks with an all-Mozart program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The major work will be the Violin Concerto No. 1 with Harvard student James Oliver Buswell IV the soloist. Concerts of special interest are additional all-Mozart programs July 6 and 7; Joseph Silverstein playing the Bach Violin Concerto in E Major on July 12; Van Cliburn, July 20; all-Beethoven programs, Symphony No. 1 and No. 8 and Piano Concerto No. 5 on July 21, and Symphony No. 5 and the Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein, on August 18;, the Brahms Requiem July 27; all-Brahms, the Haydn Variations and the Second Piano Concerto on August 11, and Symphony No. 1, August 25; all-Mendelssohn August 16; Berlioz's choral symphony Roméo et Juliette, August 17; Aaron Copland conducting a varied program including his own works, Inscape and Billy the Kid, August 23; all-Wagner on August 24. Concerts on Fridays at 9:00, Saturdays at 8:00, and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. Open rehearsals at 10:30 a.m. Saturdays from July 6 through August 24. Tickets, $3.50-$7.50, from the Berkshire Festival Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240. Open rehearsal tickets, $2.00, at the door. 413-637-1600.

Joseph Silverstein

4.

News Of Music

'Under The Stars' Series Starts Season Sunday

Szor To Direct In Zoo Amphitheater; Bollin Announced As Commentator

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

The "Music Under the Stars" series of free concerts, featuring classical and popular band numbers, will open Sunday, July 7, at 8 p.m. in the Toledo Zoo Amphitheater.

Samuel P. Szor again will direct the summer concerts, which last season attracted 50,000 listeners. The outdoor concerts are sponsored by the Toledo Edison Co.

Thomas Bollin will be the commentator.

Park Series To Present Tony Celeste Orchestra

The Tony Celeste Orchestra, just returned from a tour with the Bobby Hackett Show, will be the attraction next Sunday afternoon at 4 in the Music-in-the-Park series in Ottawa Park near the shelter house, sponsored by the city recreation division.

Mr.Celeste will build the musical program of the afternoon as the program progresses. The concert, presented through the Music Performance Trust Fund of the Recording Industries, will feature the new sounds of the "big band." Open and free to the public.

Young Toledoans Helen C. Fitts, Lucy Dasher, April Edith Graham, and Mrs. Joseph Kiss are among the students studying at the St. Louis Institute of Music this summer. All are students of Arietta C. Beinke, of Columbia Street.

Alicia de Larrocha, Spanish pianist who was scheduled to perform in Ann Arbor's Rackham Auditorium Thursday night, has a broken thumb and will be unable to appear.

Music Educators Work Under $1.3 Million Grant

The Music Educators National Conference will continue and expand its Contemporary Music Project under a five-year grant of $1,340,000 from the Ford Foundation.

Since its inception in 1959, this project has placed 73 young composers in public school systems to compose with and for music educators and students of music at all grade levels. One result of this program is the offering of some 500 works by these composers in the CMP Library, from which manuscripts are made available through micro-filming and other copying methods.

Festival To Open On Michigan Campus

Meadow Brook Festival opens its fifth season Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in its own setting on the campus of Oakland University in Rochester, Mich., north of Detroit.

The concert will launch an eight-week schedule of 34 major musical events, featuring the Detroit Symphony Orchestra with Sixten Ehrling conducting, guest conductors, and a large list of guest artists.

The bells of Beaumont Tower will ring as Michigan State University in East Lansing begins its carillon concerts, played by Wendell Westcott thrice weekly — Tuesday and Thursday at 4 p.m. and Sunday at 8 p.m. until July 30. Following each concert there will be a tour of the belfry.

Ravinia Festival Starting In Chicago

Thursday will mark the start of another season of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago. There will be symphony concerts, 13 celebrated pianists, 5 violinists, 3 cellists, and 3 vocalists, plus dancers, chamber music, guest conductors, and 13 jazz-folk programs with singing and instrumental groups. In residence will be the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

The Boston ymphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., opens its season Sunday with an impressive listing of guest soloists, the Fellow hip Program with 150 pre-porfessional musicians, and the institute, comprising various programs. Gunther Schuller, distinguished composer and head of the New England Conservatory of Music in bBoston, again heads the Contemporary Music activities.

Congregation Of Arts Slated At Dartmouth

Also opening Sunday and running through Aug. 31 is the sixth Dartmouth Congregation of the Arts at the Hopkins Center in Hanover, N.H. Argentine composer Alberto Ginastera will be the composer-in-residence, with Mario di Bonaventura conducting the Dartmouth Symphony Orchestra.

July 3 heralds the opening of the 32nd season of the Brevard Music Center in North Carolina. Under the direction of Henry Janiec, it comprises four symphony orchestras, a resident opera company, bands and choral organizations, and the usual vocal and instrumental ensembles. There are some 300 students, aged 12-21, and a faculty of 100.

Dvorak: Symphony No. 6 in D, opus 60; Slavonic Dances, No. 2 in E minor, No. 8 in A-flat, opus 72. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA-Victor LM-3017.

One does not hear half enough of Dvorak's music these days, when his heavenly naturalness can give a lift to the spirit encumbered by the mere technicians. This is an unusualy felicitous recording of Dvorak's Symphony, formerly known as the No. 1, and two of those commissioned dances by his publisher Simrock a la Brahms' Hungarian Dances, which burst forth with Dvorak's usual enthusiasm and lyricism.

Perfect music for a summer day, or for any day for that matter, and highly recommended.

Brahms: Serenade in A, opus 16. New York Philharmonic, Leonard Bernstein conducting. Columbia MS-7312.

A beautiful recording of a beautiful work, which pleased the composer very much as it did Clara Schumann, whose comments he had sought. This is Brahms' second serenade written in the year 1859, composed as he roamed the Teutoburger Forest near Detmold. It is a tender sister — as critic Eduard Hanslick suggested — to the peaceful, dreamy, garden-mood of the Serenade in D. The richness of sound is due no doubt not only to the marvelously colored woodwind writing, but also the the complete absence of the violins. Violas, cellos, and double basses give rich sound to the work.

Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphony No. 2, opus 8 (Antar); Miaskovsky: Symphony No. 21, opus 51. Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Morton Gould conducting. RCA-Victor LM-3022.

Despite the fact that "Antar" is a frankly programatic work, based on a story by Syenkovsky about a Seventh-century poet who was the son of an Abyssinian slave, and the Miaskovsky music is purely abstract in inspiration, there does exist a great and genuine stylistic affinity.

Rimsky was to become one of the great influences on the prolific Soviet symphonist Miaskovsky (1181-1950), who "preserved the continuity of Russian musical tradition." The orchestra sounds very good and Gould keeps things moving. A unusual dip into lesser heard Russian music.

'On Record'

A weekly look at specially recommended recordings.

Sibelius: Symphony No. 5 in E-flat, opus 82; Night Rise & Sunrise, opus 55. New Philharmonia Orchestra, Georges Pretre conducting. RCA-Victor LM-2996.

First performed in 1915 on Sibelius' 50th birthday, this subsequently revised composition ranks alongside his Second Symphony as the most popular of his works. The rarely heard companion-piece stems from the year 1909, when Sibelius wrote a tone poem depicting his impressions of a journey taken to Italy 8 years before.

Both works show Sibelius trademarks: kinetic energizing of the orchestra with alternating bucolic, austere, and somber themes. What makes this recording different is the debut by young French conductor Pretre, and he lives up to his reputation as one of the most painstaking of conductors. There is a concentration here and an obviously superb cooperation between conductor and orchestra, and Sibelius emerges triumphant.

Ginastera: Concerto for Piano & Orchestra (1961), Joao Carlos Martins, piano; Variaciones Concertantes, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. RCA-Victor LM-3029.

The now 54-year-old Argentinian composer Alberto Ginastera has long been recognized as an outstanding composer but also as an active teacher, organizer, and promoter of contemporary music in his native land and a founder-director of several conservatories. Ginastera's music always surprises as being not only technically virtuostic, but also truly creative and original. The Piano Concerto proves a rousing experience.

Martins, who gave the premiere of the work when he was 20, plays it now, seven years later, with steel fingers in a most exciting manner. Both works make use of the theme and variations idea which gives rise to infinite and deft shades of orchestral color, all manner of sound effects, and an exhilarating originality. And Leinsdorf and the orchestra add to the headlong impetus of the whole work. A very exciting recording of talent-at-large.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,118
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817

JUN-26-68

Summer is a Musical Festival All Over U.S.

By PAUL HUME, The Washington Post

Memorial Day marks the official opening of vacations that put hundreds of thousands of music lovers on wheels for a few months and it is always exciting to see who is going to make music in the summer and in what new or old surroundings.

This year, there are more new festivals opening than I can remember in any previous year. I have marked as "new" those that come in this category.

Festival Casals, Puerto Rico, May 29 through June 12, with Casals as both conductor such famous names as Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Schneider, Eugene Ormandy, and Mieczyslaw Horszowski. Details from Festival Casals, San Juan, P.R., G.p.o. box 2350.

(New) at Sarasota, Fla., New College's five concerts between June 1 and 15. Chamber music, with a closing orchestral program. Unusual repertoire and noted performers. Information: New College, P.O. Box 1898, Sarasota, Fla., 33578.

Sarasota reminds us of Daytona Beach's festival centering again around the London Symphony Orchestra with famous soloists, guest conductors, and chamber music. Information from the Florida International Music Festival, Daytona Beach, Fla. It opens in July.

Julius Redel is music director of the Ceramoor Festival again this year, between June 16 and July 7, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Monteverdi's "Coronation of Poppaea," and a rich variety of other kinds of programs. Information from Audrey Michaels, 315 W. 70th St., New York City 10023.

OF SPECIAL SIGNIFICANCE will be the fourth Inter-American Music Festival in Washington. Between June 19 and 30 there will be 10 concerts, all free, with orchestral, chamber, choral, and solo works by more than 50 composers of this hemisphere. Information from the music division of the Pan American Union.

As soon as the Inter-American Festival is over, The National Symphony will proceed into its first full summer season in its new pavilion at Columbia, Md. It is bringing back the New York City Ballet, and an array of famous soloists. Special interest is directed toward the British cellist Jacqueline DePre and conductor - pianist - husband, Daniel Barenboim. Ticket information from the National Symphony.

(New) One of the largest newcomers to the summer scene is Temple University's new festival institute located at Upper Dublin, about 18 miles north of Philadelphia. In a new multi-million dollar setting, Temple is offering both full musical instruction and a gala series of concerts of all kinds. Information from Temple University Festival, Philadelphia, Penn., 19122.

ON OUR SOUTHERN flank is the Eastern Music Festival at Guilford College, now in its seventh season, with Sheldon Morgenstern as music director, an orchestra in residence, and conerts between June 27 and Aug. 1. Details from the festival, 808 N. Elm St., Greensboro, N.C., 27401.

Ravinia, in the green beauty of Chicago's northern suburbs, runs from June 27 to Aug. 10, with Seiji Ozawa putting together an enviable list of programs, artists, and unusual lures. Information from the Festival Association, 11 S. LaSalle St., Chicago, Ill.

(New) and of particular promise is the Waterloo Village Festival in northern New Jersey. Among the sponsors of the new venture are Serkin, Stern, Mme. Olga Koussevitsky, and the Henry Steinways. A 2,000-seat tent with room for a thousand more outside on the lawn will house the New Jersey symphony and its new conductor, Henry Lewis. Dates are June 29 through Sept. 1. Details from Waterloo Music Festival, care of Nat Dorfman, 165 West 46th St., New York City, 10036.

July 2 will bring the reopening of the Opera House in Sante Fe, N.M., replacing the one that burned last summer. Now enlarged to seat 1,500, the new house, directed by John Crosby, will present a schedule that includes "Butterfly," "Magic Flute," "Rosenkavalier," a new opera by Henze, and several others. Information from Edgar Vincent Associates, 156 East 52nd St., New York City, 10022.

NE

ERICH LEINSDORF AND the Boston Symphony open the country's renowned Tanglewood Concerts on July 5, when they will stay busy until Aug. 25. Information and tickets from Festival Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240.

Marlboro, Vt., opens its 18th season on July 6. Pablo Casals will again be on hand for his eighth summer at the splendid, small center where such great music is made in unusual circumstances. For details write the Marlboro Festival, 129 West 56th St., New York City.

New Hampshire, offers a peripatetic music festival that plays in Center Harbor, Meredith, Wolfeboro, and Tamworth. For details on this unusual arrangement, write to New Hampshire Music Festival, P.O. Box 147, Center Harbor, N.H., 03226. Concerts are between July 11 and Aug. 15.

One of the biggest new spots which I have not even mentioned will be the Cleveland Orchestra's new Blossom Music Center which is scheduled to open on July 19 with a Czell-conducted Beethoven Ninth. Thus far I have no details from Cleveland and many other festivals.

ROCHESTER DEM. CHRONICLE
Sunday, May 26, 1968

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 1968

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 31st season at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., opens July 5 for eight weeks with an all-Mozart program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The major work will be the Violin Concerto No. 1 with Harvard student James Oliver Buswell IV the soloist. Concerts of special interest are additional all-Mozart programs July 6 and 7; Joseph Silverstein playing the Bach Violin Concerto in E Major on July 12; Van Cliburn, July 20; all-Beethoven programs, Symphony No. 1 and No. 8 and Piano Concerto No. 5 on July 21, and Symphony No. 5 and the Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein, on August 18;, the Brahms Requiem July 27; all-Brahms, the Haydn Variations and the Second Piano Concerto on August 11, and Symphony No. 1, August 25; all-Mendelssohn August 16; Berlioz's choral symphony Roméo et Juliette, August 17; Aaron Copland conducting a varied program including his own works, Inscape and Billy the Kid, August 23; all-Wagner on August 24. Concerts on Fridays at 9:00, Saturdays at 8:00, and Sundays at 2:30 p.m. Open rehearsals at 10:30 a.m. Saturdays from July 6 through August 24. Tickets, $3.50-$7.50, from the Berkshire Festival Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240. Open rehearsal tickets, $2.00, at the door. 413-637-1600.

Joseph Silverstein

The Hills Are Alive With Sounds...

PORT CHESTER ITEM
Wednesday, June 19, 1968

If you are a music buff and inclined to take to the road one of these nice weekends, there are many music festivals opening early in July, at points not too distant from Westchester County.

At the Hopkins Center on the campus of Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H., the summer music festival opens with a chamber concert on Thursday, July 4 featuring original music by Alberto Ginastera, composers - in - residence, as well as the old masters Bach and Beethoven.

For the four successive Thursday and Sunday evening concerts programs will feature works by well-known composers in addition to original compositions by Mr. Ginastera, Easley Blackwood, also a composer-in-residence, and by Walter Piston, visiting composer.

During the month of August, lectures, symposiums and memorial exhibitions will highlight the center's fourth international Webern festival. Additional guests appearing during August will include Andrew Imbrie, visiting composer, and Niels Viggo Bentzon, composer-in-residence.

The much heralded Tanglewood Festival in Lenox, Mass. opens its eight week season July 5. Under the musical direction of former Westchester resident, Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are heard Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons in the Music Shed. The opening week program will be devoted to the music of Mozart and subsequent programs will offer a variety of composers' works as well as excerpts from some of the better known and lesser known operas.

Closer to home, yet outside of the county, eleven concerts will be given in a tent, erected for the series on the grounds of C.W. Post College in Brookville, L.I.

The opening concert, Monday, July 8, will feature Daniel Barenboim leading his English Chamber Orchestra. Mr. Barenboim also will double as soloist and play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 2. Anshel Brusow, conductor of the Chamber Symphony of Philadelphia resident orchestra of the Ambler, Pa., Festival, will conduct the orchestra on July 12, when Eugene Istomin, pianist, will be soloist; July 19 in an all-Beethoven program featuring violinst Itzhak Perlman; July 28, with Erick Friedman as violin soloist, and July 31, when a Shostakovich concerto for piano, trumpet and strings will be the highlight of the evening.

Subsequent programs will feature pianist Alexis Weissenberg, July 13; Antal Dorati, conducting the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, founded by Sir Thomas Beecham, on July 25; the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Henry Lewis, and piano soloist Misha Dichter on Aug. 10, and Byron Janis on Aug. 17.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006
JUN 23 1968

. . . Music and Dance

Planning Charts Exciting Course

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The Capitaland summer festival season has generally been termed a bore and taken at a glance it does look that way.

But with the sheer wealth (in terms of numbers if nothing else) of dance and music entertainment being put forth in the next ten weeks it seems that some careful planning could yield a very successful and exciting course through what some have called a labyrinth of mediocrity.

There are twenty-seven music festivals and two dance festivals within the area, most of these running for the season which varies between six and ten weeks. Taking into consideration the factors of time, travel and money which influence the decisions of the average concert-goer, an individual will be able to sample only a very small portion of what is offered.

With so much to choose from he needn't curse his luck at being offered so much Beethoven - Tchaikowsky - Rachmaninoff at Tanglewood and the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

One of the faults that veterans are finding with the season is that it includes so many hard-core traditional performances. For the veterans this might be a valid complaint but for the more casual concert-goer this is an ideal way to catch up on some things that should be seen or heard sometime.

Prime Examples

There are prime examples within the season's scheduling for the New York City Ballet at Saratoga July 4 through 28.

"The Nutcracker," which will open the season, hardly needs to be mentioned. This is a must sometime during the career of any ballet observer and it is very seldom seen outside of New York. To pass up the chance would be like eating French food without wine.

In the same category is "Swan Lake." The New York City Ballet does only the second act but it contains much of the essence of the full ballet. It has been included during the summer season each year because of its tremendous popularity, and again is a work that should be seen sometime.

Across the park and still with the New York City Ballet is the local premiere of "Midsummer Night's Dream" which opens the SPAC Film Festival in the theater on Tuesday. This is the first full length American ballet movie and it has been well-received throughout the country since its premiere a year ago.

The production presented in the film is basically that which the company opened the Performing Arts Center with two years ago.

The remainder of the ballet schedule comes pretty much from its solid and most proven portion of its repretoire. There is variety without actually including anything too new or advanced.

A special attraction, with the dates to be announced later, will be the presentation of the up-dated version of George Balanchine's "Slaughter On Tenth Avenue" which he did originally for "On Your Toes" in 1947.

The opening performance of Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra on August 1 holds interest because of its performers which include the Capitol Hill Choral Society of Albany even though the program, beyond the North American premiere of Alberto Ginastera's setting for Psalm 150, will be quite routine. This will also be the big social evening of the season at Saratoga.

See MUSIC, Page 8

Music: Planning Can Map Exciting Course

Continued from Page 1

For tastes that tend toward the light and older type of entertainment there are particular attractions in the Rodgers and Hammerstein program to be conducted by Richard Rodgers and Arthur Fiedler and the all-Gershwin program also conducted by Fiedler.

Among the special attractions is the appearance of Dinah Shore on Thursday which also falls in this category.

Possibly the most interesting of the theme concerts for the SPAC season will be the "American Concert" on August 11. The big draw for this program at the box office will be Van Cliburn playing MacDowell's Piano Concerto No. 2. Copland, Bloch and Carter are the other composers represented.

Young Pop Tastes

Special attractions at SPAC are aimed generally at the young pop tastes with such diverse talents as Pete Seeger and Ravi Shankar included in the roll.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood offers some familiar choices and some new ones. The appearance of William Steinberg as guest conductor with the orchestra on August 4 will be of particular interest in view of his plans to succeed Erich Leinsdorf as music director at the end of next season.

Musically a good choice would be the performance of Brahms Requiel on July 27. This is the sort of thing that is almost invariably impeccably staged at Tanglewood.

In the one essentially modern program of the season Aaron Copland will conduct the BSO in works by Carter, Faure, Chavez, Stravinsky and, of course, Copland on August 23.

Festivity in Festival

For those who like festivity in their festival Tanglewood really produces it twice each summer. The first is the annual appearance of the Boston Pops on traditionally one of the gayest and most successful events of the season.

The second is the "Tanglewood - On - Parade" gala which honors the students of the Berkshire Music School at Tanglewood. This is generally light and boistrous in content and resembles a music marathon beginning sometimes in the afternoon and running through the evening.

Chamber music concerts offer a limited choice to a more specialized audience at both Saratoga and Tanglewood as well as several chamber festivals including Music Mountain in Connecticut and the Maverick Concerts in Woodstock.

Chamber groups represented are generally good to excellent with their feet solidly in the classics. Good musical entertainment can be counted on, but not too much experiment.

In opera the main entry is the Lake George Opera Festival in Queensbury which is presenting a "Shakespeare Opera Festival" this year. The schedule nevertheless has a little bit of everything.

There is something new, David Amram's "Twelfth Night" with the composer expected to be present for the opening. There is something old, "Romeo and Juliet" and "Merry Wives of Windsor."

And there is something different, Rossini's "Otello," not the familiar Verdi version. This one has a happy ending.

Completing the season is Benjamin Britten's "Midsummer Night's Dream," a relatively new and completely fascinating work.

Turneau Opera offers more of the traditionals from its repertoire plus a Grand Opera Gala and a week of two short productions, "L'Enfant Prodique" and "The Scarf."

Musicians' Festival

The Marlboro Music Festival in Marlboro Vermont is primarily a musicians' festival. The interest and activity centers on rehearsals (many of which are open to the public) and self-improvement for the many musicians who take part under the general direction of Rudolf Serkin.

The chief interest to the non-studying is the appearance of cellist Pablo Casals. Casals will be present and working at the festival again this season but his appearances will not be announced in advance. Audiences will just have to take their chances.

Jacob's Pillow offers its usual style of dance festival intermingling ballet with ethnic and modern dancing for an often widely varied and interesting program. In contrast to the company emphasis of the New York City Ballet at Saratoga, Jacob's Pillow places a premium on the individual and the limited performance.

Among the Best . . .

Among the best to appear at Jacob's Pillow this season will be Edward Villella and Patricia McBride, Niels Kehlet of the Royal Danish Ballet and Eleanor d'Antuono of American Ballet Theater.

Companies to note are the Pennsylvania Ballet during the week of July 23 and the Boston Ballet during the week of August 6.

This listing most likely surpasses the average individual's attendance at concerts and dance programs this summer and still it only skims the surface.

It will be generally a traditional season, with few premieres and nothing terribly startling and on the whole tailored to the interests indicated by the majority of ticket buyers.

In other words it is a sure thing.

Summer Theater Opens Soon In N.E.

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — Attractions ranging from Imogene Coca to Tiny Tim and Carmel Quinn to Van Cliburn will enliven New England's straw hat and turtleneck sweater circuit this summer.

Pick about any star from Broadway, television, night clubs, the movies or the concert stage. More than likely the name will appear on a poster somewhere in the six states.

Music and drama, as usual, will dominate the entertainment scene but a circus from Europe will be one added feature in Boston-area summer theatres this year.

One of the most-anticipated pre-Broadway events will be the five-week premiere engagement in Boston of Ervin Drake's new musical, "Her First Roman," opening July 29 at an in-town theater. Based on George Bernard Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," it stars Tony Award winners Richard Kiley and Leslie Uggams.

Hans Conreid and Dody Goodman will offer "Don't Drink the Water" and Chita Rivera will headline "Sweet Charity."

SUMMER THEATRE

(Continued on Page Three)

ITEM (e)
CLINTON, MASS.
CIRC. 3,550
JUN 25 1968
New England Newsclip

Summer

(Continued from Page One)

Other Broadway Hits

Also from Broadway, John Raitt will star as "The Music Man." Ann Corio and Sherry Briton each will have a burlesque show. And there will be in-the-round revivals of the perennial hits, "The Sound of Music" and "West Side Story."

Noel Harrison will represent the English music halls in "Half a Sixpence."

Hollywood favorites Tom Poston and Dan Dailey will complete with their own medium by appearing in "The Odd Couple," which now also is a current feature picture.

Also from the night club and TV world come Danny Kaye; Ed Ames; Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca; Alan Sherman and Carmel Quinn; the New Christy Minstrels; the Cowsills; Judy Collins; Liberace; Tiny Tim; Theodore Bikel; the Young Rascals; Ray Charles and Andy Williams with Peter Nero.

For younger showgoers there will be Hetzer's European Circus; The Mad Shoe; Jimmi Hendrix; Vanilla Fudge; The Union Gap; the Ultimate Spinach, and Tammy Grimes.

BSO At Lenox

